Teddy was a good companion and a good protector; but he was a city-raised dog, chained and kept in the back yard and accustomed to seeing other dogs and animals tied or cooped up. So when Teddy got into the country and was unchained, although his own joy was unbounded, it seemed to him altogether out of place to see dogs, cats, pigs, chickens and cows loose on the highway and in the open fields.

It was all new and strange to him, and, according to his city experience, entirely wrong. So Teddy took it seriously upon himself to set things straight and punish these other animals for what seemed to him to be their lawless freedom. At the sight of these creatures off Teddy would go and chase every cat and dog, every calf and pig, and give them a run for their lives; and, seizing any one of these, he would hang on by the ear or leg and never let go, until Mr. Bowie himself would have to burn his nose with a live match. He was always punished; but, as his intentions were good, his spirit remained unbroken.

One day Teddy, to his sorrow, chased a porcupine. He came back to the camp with his cheeks, mouth and chin covered with quills. Some of these had gone as much as an inch deep in his flesh. Teddy was a piteous sight, but he meekly sat on his haunches and only groaned while Mr. and Mrs. Bowie pulled the quills from his flesh. The operation must have been very painful and lasted for several hours, but he sat uncomplainingly, simply licking the sore places where the quills had been pulled out. But Teddy chased no more porcupines.

Once he caught sight of a proud turkey gobbler with his wide-spreading tail. To Teddy this was a challenge. Away he went after that now badly scared gobbler, and soon came proudly trotting back with every tail feather of that humbled gobbler in his spacious mouth. It did seem that he would have to be killed; that he was not the dog to be a helper and associated with the Bible missionaries; but he had some splendid noble qualities, and Mr. and Mrs. Bowie could hardly find it in their hearts to let him go. Yet he became an increasing terror to all animals along the country road, and finally an incident occurred which brought about his dismissal from Bible work.

For several days he had been chained to the wagon, but one evening, as Mr. and Mrs. Bowie were nearing their camp, they took the collar off and let him free. He proudly trotted along in front of the team and held his head high and seemed proud of leading the procession; but he soon caught sight of a cow and calf in an open field. Like a flash he was after them. He first took hold of the calf's ear and hung on. Of all the bellowing! That calf was scared almost to death. The mother cow came to its protection and on her horns she tossed that dog a dozen times from the ground; but still he held on to the calf.

Mr. Bowie had come across the field and was seeking to get him loosened. He finally let go of the calf and ran after the cow. He grabbed her ear and held on like grim death. Around and around in a circle they sped, when here came the owner of the cow and calf and his hired man, an Irishman. Together they got Teddy loose, but not before he had ripped the cow's ear. The owner's temper was flaming. He said that the dog would have to be killed, and that a Bible man had no business to have such a dog.

Mr. Bowie agreed; yet it grieved him to see the dog shot. However, he thought that there was nothing else to do. So, after sending for a veterinary doctor to sew the cow's ear, he got a gun and gave it to the Irishman and told him to kill the dog. Teddy had slunk away under the wagon, and Mr. Bowie said that, for the first time in Teddy's life, the dog seemed to be conscience-stricken over what he had done; and hiding under the wagon, he appeared crestfallen, afraid, and entirely broken in spirit. But it was decided that Teddy should be shot.

The Irishman took the gun and crawled under the wagon to shoot Teddy; but, seeing the dog's apparent repentance spirit, the Irishman did not have the heart to kill him, and he crawled back from under the wagon and said, "Begorry, it's a shame to kill such a sorry dog, and it's not in me heart to shoot him. If ye'll give him to me, I'll take him to me cabin in the mountains, and he can watch the camp and hunt the wildcats and chase the jack-rabbits all he pleases." Mr. Bowie was only too glad to give the dog to the hired man; and Teddy, who had "zeal, but not according to knowledge," good intentions, but misdirected energies, went to live contented and happy in the foothills of the Sierra mountains, giving the jack-rabbits and coyotes wild runs as pantingly he chases them from his wooded domain.—Bible Society Record.

The Song of the South Wind.

Now rouse ye, all ye little rills,
I come to end your sleep!
Make music in the silent hills,
Tinkle and run and leap!
How merrily you'll laugh and sing
When you have heard the news I bring
Behind me—listen! comes the spring!

Wake, lakes and ponds that dormant lie!
For you must mirror soon
Soft, silvery clouds, and budding boughs,
And the white April moon!
Rouse all the little frogs that sleep
Cradled so cold, cradled so deep,
And tell them they must learn to sing
Their sweet, high song to greet the spring!

Poor, ice-bound rivers, mute and white,
I come to set you free!
Glide on, glad rivers, day and night,
And find your goal, the sea!
Whisper my tidings as you go,
To vines and branches, bending low;
And river-reeds beneath the snow.
. . . . . .
For up from the south, through the heaven's deep hollow,
With glad wings about her, and bright wings to follow,
With bluebird and whitethroat and robin and swallow,
Comes to us—listen!—the spring!
—Maud Going, in St. Nicholas.

The South's Best Book Store

HUNTER & CO

105 E. Broad Street
Richmond, Va.

Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen
Prompt and Reliable Service

Spring Styles
NOW READY
Have Your Old Hat Fixed Like New

Many customers use their old hats by having them made over for their children. We specialize on children's hats.

PARCEL POST DEPARTMENT AT YOUR SERVICE.

VERRA HAT WORKS
211 NORTH FIRST STREET
RANDOLPH 90

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS
FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG
S. T. Beveridge & Co.
Office: 1217 East Cary Street
Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd
Richmond, Va.

"The Store that Pleases"
FOR FURNITURE
Jones Bros. & Co.
Incorporated
1418-20 E. Main St., Richmond, Va

Jno. L. Williams & Sons
BANKERS and BROKERS
Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565)
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds.

NAVAJO SANITARIUM
"In the Land of Waterfalls"
Conducted by
Thomas J. Sunmey, M. D.
Brevard, N. C.

A private hospital for chronic nervous and mild mental cases and heart affection.
On strictly ethical lines. Equipped to care for a limited number of patients. In town and mountains.
Strict attention given to dietetics.

Leake Printing Co.
ENGRAVING, PRINTING, EMBOSSING.
Special attention to out-of-town orders
Samples sent upon request.
615 East Main Street. Richmond, Va

Cuticura Soap
SHAVES
Without Mug
Cuticura Soap is the favorite for safety razor shaving.

Sacramental Wine
Absolutely Pure Grape Wine
Made expressly for use at the Communion Table
Established 1857
Phone, Write or Call Tel. Cortlandt 3001
H.T. Dewey & Sons Co.
Address Either
138 Fulton Street, New York City
or Cellars, Egg Harbor, New Jersey

SILK HOSE
DIRECT TO YOU
Saves you 25c to 60c a pair. Our leader—Ladies' full-fashioned, highest grade pure silk stockings, five-thread linen spliced heel and toe: $2.60 a pair, three pairs $6.00. Strongest and best wearing hosiery on the market. Money back if not satisfied.
Free Samples showing colors and quality of silk.
Write for these today with new descriptive Price List of our full line of Silk, Silk Lisle, Fibre Silk and Cotton hosiery for women, misses, men and children—all at our direct-to-you money-saving prices.
HARTLEY HOSIERY CO., Louisville, Ky.

OXFORD TEACHERS' BIBLES
You will find an OXFORD TEACHERS' BIBLE, with its wonderful References and Helps, an invaluable aid in Bible study and in preparing your Sunday School lessons. The Helps are arranged in alphabetical order, like a dictionary. They are accurate, comprehensive and up-to-date.
AT ALL BOOKSELLERS
CATALOG UPON REQUEST
Oxford University Press American Branch
35 West 32nd Street New York City

RELIGIOUS BOOK WEEK
March 13-20—Put good books in your home, especially an OXFORD BIBLE, for every member of the family

An Eskimo Game.

One sport that amuses the Eskimo boys is reindeer hunting. Having found a long and gentle slope on the side of a hill, they place along the bottom of the hill a number of reindeer antlers. These are stuck upright in the snow, singly or in groups, in such a manner that a sled, when well guided, can be run between them without knocking any of them down, the number of open spaces between the groups being equal to at least the number of sleds.

The quantity of reindeer antlers they can thus arrange will, of course, depend upon their fathers' success the autumn before in reindeer hunting; but there are nearly always enough antlers to give two or three to each fearless young coaster.

The boys with their sleds, numbering from four to six in a fair-sized village, gather on the top of a hill, each boy having with him two or three spears, or a bow with as many arrows.

They start together, each boy's object being to knock down as many antlers as possible and not be the first to reach the bottom of the hill. You can see that, in such a case, the slower they go when they are passing the antlers the better.

They must knock over the antlers with their spears or arrows only, as those thrown down by the sledge or with the bow or spear in the hand do not count.

They begin to shoot their arrows and throw their spears as soon as they can get within effective shooting distance, and, even after they have passed between the rows of antlers the more active boys will turn around on their flying sleds and hurl back a spear or an arrow with sufficient force to bring down an antler.

When all have reached the bottom of the hill they return to the row of antlers, where each boy picks out those he has rightfully captured and places them in a pile to themselves.

Then those accidentally knocked over by the sledges are again put in place and the boys return for another dash down the hill until all the antlers have been "speared."

Sometimes there is but one antler left, and when there are five or six contesting sleds the race becomes very exciting, for their speed counts in reaching the antler first. When all are down, the boys count their winnings and the victor is, of course, the one who has obtained the greatest number of antlers.

For the Southern Churchman.

John's Adventure.

Charlotte S. Lee, Age Seven.

There was once a boy named John. John was eight years old. One day he and his father and mother were invited to a wedding. John could hardly wait to go, because it was the wedding of his aunt. At last it was time to go, and they went.

John sat still a minute, but soon he found himself in a trapdoor. He looked around and saw a gun, and he picked it up, but there were no shots for it. Just then he saw a man creeping along near the wall. He followed the man, and the man went down some stairs and into a room and out of it into a long hall, and suddenly he disappeared, and so John went on alone.

He came to another room, and in it were boxes and boxes of gems and money, and when he got out he got all the money, and so he was given some money, and he lived happily ever after.

Reliance
"Perfect Protection"
Continuous Income Means

$50 per week, for 52 weeks, while confined by sickness.
$50 per week, for 104 weeks, while disabled by accident.
$100 per month, for life, is totally and permanently disabled, by either accident or disease. No further premiums to pay in event of disability. No deductions from face of policy to offset indemnity received unde this lause.
$50 per month to your beneficiary, for life—commencing immediately after your death, and $10,000 to your estate, or whomever you may designate, payable immediat ly upon death of above mentioned beneficiary.
$10,000 to your beneficiary in addition to all of above benefits in event your death results from accident.

H. S. RAWLINGS, General Agent
511 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.

Can You Afford to Deny Yourself Such Protection?

R. Geissler, Inc.
56 West Eighth Street, New York
Memorials
FOR THE CHURCH
Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

HOW DOCTORS TREAT COLDS AND THE FLU

First Step in Treatment Is a Brisk Purgative With Calotabs, the Purified and Refined Calomel Tablets that are Nausealess, Safe and Sure.

Doctors have found by experience that no medicine for colds and influenza can be depended upon for full effectiveness until the liver is made thoroughly active. That is why the first step in the treatment is the new, nausealess colomel tablets called Calotabs, which are free from the sickening and weakening effects of the old style calomel. Doctors also point out the fact that an active liver may go a long way towards preventing influenza and is one of the most important factors in enabling the patient to successfully withstand an attack and ward off pneumonia.

One Calotab on the tongue at bed time with a swallow of water—that's all. No salts, no nausea nor the slightest interference with your eating, pleasure or work. Next morning your cold has vanished, your liver is active, your system is purified, and you are feeling fine, with a hearty appetite for breakfast. Druggists sell Calotabs only in original sealed packages, price thirty-five cents. Your money will be cheerfully refunded if you do not find them delightful.—(Adv.)

WANTED Commission Agents And Dealers

To sell Nursery Stock—all kinds of fruit trees, ornamentals and plants. Beautiful illustrations supplied with full information on growing trees and plants. Two propositions offered. Commission agreement and confidential terms to dealers. Big profits. Only TRUSTWORTHY men need apply. Write today.

THE HOWARD-HICKORY CO.,
Box 584, Hickory, N. C.

The Wing-Foot Electric Shoe Repair Shop

ALL KINDS OF GENERAL REPAIRING

Mail Orders a Specialty

Owned and Managed by T. A. BUNNELL
311 N. Second St. Phone Ran. 1286-W

To Serve You

We stand ready, and shall esteem it a pleasure to have you call on us.

We serve our customers in the manner in which they wish to be served.

The Union Bank of Richmond

11 4 East Main Street

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson
Security Storage Company, Inc.

Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage

Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor
Richmond, Va.

NOW

is the time for all good

GARDENERS

to plant

DIGGS & BEADLES

Early English Peas, Radish, Beets, Kale, Cabbage, Onion Sets, Irish Potatoes, Asparagus, and many other vegetable and Farm Seeds.

Ask for our catalogue, which tells

How, When, and Why

DIGGS & BEADLES, Inc.

SEED MERCHANTS

Three Stores, Richmond Va.

Headquarters for Superior Seeds

The Emerson Shoe

HONEST ALL THROUGH

Black and Dark Tan Men's Vici Kid Shoes
THE CORRECTOR
And
EMERSON LASTS
A $10.00 Shoe, Extra Special
at $7.25

Send us your size

Woodall & Quarles

7 E. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

R. L. Christian & Company

514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.

Leading Fancy Grocer

AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROW CANDIES

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.
Catalogue mailed on application.

WHEN WRITING OUR ADVERTISERS PLEASE MENTION THIS PUBLICATION

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

FAMINE RELIEF.

For the convenience of our readers we publish the addresses of the treasurers of the various Relief Funds whose appeals for the starving, and especially for starving children, are so urgent and touching. The Southern Churchman will forward contributions to any of these, but to save time, postage and possibility of miscarriage, checks would better be sent directly to the treasurers as below:

Near East Relief (formerly "Armenian and Syrian Relief")—Cleaveland H. Dodge, No. 1 Madison Ave., New York City.

European Relief (Central and Eastern Europe)—Franklin K. Lane, 42 Broadway, New York City; or locally for Virginia, DeSoto Fitzgerald, 218 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.

Chinese Famine Relief—Remit through Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer, Presiding Bishop and Council, 281 Fourth Ave., New York City.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

We acknowledge the following additional contributions to the fund for the relief of the sufferers from famine in China:

Hermitage Public School, Bedford, Va. $10.00
William Hart Harrison, Prince George, Va. 2.00

PIPE ORGANS

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID in building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York

SPECIAL NOTICE.

DON'T TRY ON YOUR NEW DRESSES over your old corset. Let us help you select and fit to you the corset that does greatest justice to your figure. The Corset Shop, 317 N. Fifth St. Mrs. A. J. Pyle, Prop. Phone Ran. 3397.

Doll Skirts Accordion Pleated Free. ASHBY B. PYLE, 315 N. 5th St. Hemstitching, Pinking and Button Covering.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER

Invites you to inspect her line of GAGE Tailored HATS. Also the ADVANCE Showing of Spring Hats in the most attractive shapes.
209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

STAR CLEANING CO.

Richmond, Va., Cleaning, Pressing, Dyeing and Repairing. Prices reasonable; workmanship the best. Special attention given parcel post orders.

CATHEDRAL STUDIO, ENGLISH Church embroideries and materials. Stoles with crosses, $7; plain, $5.50; handsome gift stoles, $12 up; burse and veil, $15, $20. Surplices and exquisite altar linens. L. V. Mackrille, 2604 Thirty-sixth St., N. W., Washington, D. C. Tel. Chev. 1915.

NIAGARA METAL WEATHER STRIPS Saves 25 per cent. Fuel, Prevents Rattling Windows, keeps out Dust, Dirt and Storm.
CINCINNATI REWIRABLE METAL AND WOOD FRAME SCREENS.
L. F. HEROLD,
2 N. 11th St., Richmond, Va.
Phone Randolph 3550.

SEEDS AND CARDS

25 POST CARDS, and FIVE 10-cent Packages Garden Seeeds, 25 cents, postpaid; 100 Post Cards, twenty 10-cent Packages Garden Seeds, Atlas New Europe, $1.00, postpaid. Address HOWARD SEED HOUSE, Windfall, Indiana.

HELP WANTED

YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCATION AND refinement wanted to enter the St. John's Hospital Training School for Nurses (Episcopal), Brooklyn, N. Y. Applicants required to have one year of high school or its equivalent. Course three years. A registered school of high standing. Nurses receive remuneration. Many social privileges. Home life pleasant. Graduates are now receiving $6.00 per day. Apply to St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED FOR 1921-22 AS MASTER IN the Grammer Department of a Church school, an unmarried man with teaching and playground experience. Apply St Albans School, Washington, D. C.

LADY OF REFINEMENT DESIRES position in Church school as House-Mother; Experienced hostess. Address "Hostess" care Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

WANTED—BY A GRADUATE NURSE, A resident position in a school or with an invalid. R. N., care of this office.

WANTED—POSITION AS RESIDENT nurse in Church school for next term. Address Miss Blanche Corling, R. N., 714 Church St., Lynchburg, Va.

WANTED—MOTHER'S HELPER, ELDERly lady preferred; refined surroundings. Will pay expense of interview. Address Box 184, Alexandria, Va.

WANTED—A GOOD, REFINED, MIDDLEaged woman, who wants a good home on a farm as mother's helper in family with two small children Give references. Address Mrs. W. Holmes Robertson, Gainesville, Va.

CULTURED, EXPERIENCED TEACHER wishes to instruct small children during two or three summer months, three of two hours daily. Terms $15 per month and board; or state your price soon. Address Miss D., care Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

WANTED—BY AMIABLE AND REFINED young lady, position as companion and nurse for invalid or semi-invalid. References exchanged. Address Miss M. B. F., care Southern Churchman.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

Warren: In the hope of a blessed immortality, SALLIE WRIGHT WARREN, daughter of the late Thomas and Sallie Wright Warren, departed this life on February 24, 1921, at Edenton, S. C.

She possessed a personality of many virtues, and her life was one of loyalty and service to those she loved.

This simple tribute is from one who knew and loved her from childhood.

J. W. H.

Drummond: Entered into rest eternal, February 16, 1921, at the home of her niece, Miss Annie Fletcher, of Cape Charles, Va., MISS SARAH JANE DRUMMOND, daughter of William S. Drummond and Ann Talbot Foster. Born in Norfolk, Va., February 28, 1843. She had the rare gift of true friendship, and was loved and honored by her family and a large circle of friends.

"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

M.

ROBERT BURWELL WILLIAMSON.

In remembrance of a valued friend and associate:

The clergy and vestry of the Archdeaconry of Southwestern Virginia record the profound sense of loss they have sustained in the death, which occurred in the evening of January 16 last, of ROBERT BURWELL WILLIAMSON.

For years he served with Christian faithfulness as a vestryman in the church; he was a trustee of the Diocese and frequently a delegate to Diocesan Councils.

To his warm interest in all matters that pertained to the parish, his assiduity in attending upon the services of the church, his generous liberality as a parishioner, his discriminating judgment and never failing courtesy to all who held personal or official relations with him, we offer this tribute and testimony of our appreciation and affection.

Nor was it alone to his church that his sympathies and efforts were given, but they reached widely into the life and activities of the entire community; he had a broad sense of Christian duty, endowed with the qualities of encouragement, aid and comprehensive charity.

He has gone to his rest, crowned with many honors, and been gathered into the garner where eternal peace and joy await those who, in humility, have been faithful unto the end.

"Eternal rest grant unto him, O! Lord, and light faithful shine upon him."

Graham, Va., Feb. 12, 1921.

MRS. REBECCA COLLINS WOOD.

In the death of MRS. REBECCA COLLINS WOOD, wife of Frank Wood, of Edenton, N. C., a large circle of relatives and friends have been deeply bereaved. She departed this life at Edenton on the 23d of February, 1921, after a suffering illness, which she bore with Christian fortitude, desiring to depart and to be with Christ.

Mrs. Wood was the daughter of Major George Pumpelly Collins and Annie Ruffin Cameron, of Hillsborough, N. C., and was born on the 8th of October, 1864. Her married life was spent in Edenton in what had been the "Collins Homestead" for several generations of her family. Well did she maintain the tradition of the gracious hospitality which was associated with the "before-the-war" period of that home.

In her connection with the broader relations of community life, she was sympathetic and efficient, a useful member of society.

As a member of St. Paul's Parish, interested, intelligent, faithful and very helpful, she is missed from the work of the parochial societies, and from the less frequented appointments of the church, as well as from the Sunday services. Her abiding interest in the church and her good will to the work of the parish are evinced by a bequest entrusted to the vestry.

Mrs. Wood's life here contributed an element of strength which is more than a memory; other lives are stronger thereby.

We thank God for her good example, and we tenderly cherish her dear memory.

D.

Easter Sunday Will Be an Ideal Time to Install an Individual Communion Service

In solid silver or fine silver plate; durable and dependable

POCKET COMMUNION SETS

for administering to the sick

ALMS BASINS,
BRASS VASES,
BRONZE TABLETS

C. LUMSDEN & SON,
Jewelers and Silversmiths
731 Main St., Richmond, Va.

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS
Largest stock in the South
We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival
The Couper Marble Works
(Established 65 years)
264-268 Bank St., Norfolk, Va.

Counsels for the Times.

History records an upward progression of ideals and morals with the passing of the centuries, and we may be assured there will be no reversion of this procedure until the purpose of the over-ruling Providence guiding and directing it shall have been fulfilled. True, this progression has been intermittent, but every cessation has incubated incentive for, and given birth to, a period of greater activity for the establishment of good and the overthrow of evil. And while in this age practices contrary to the law of God and perversive of human happiness prevail, and at present seem almost to possess the earth, they are not, as formerly, generally recognized and condoned as necessary conditions of life.

They are under indictment and condemnation in every respected world-court of public opinion, and the realization of human happiness is absolutely dependent upon the verdict of this court being satisfied by action for the banishment of these prevailing evil agencies from all individual, national and international existence.

For this action there must be united will, and this will and its exercise God is everywhere invoking, but especially so here in our land, where He has given so bountifully and from which He is reasonably expecting corresponding responsiveness. He thus calls us as an expression of His favor towards us. Let us not deceive ourselves. We are not indispensable to Him and the final accomplishment of His purpose to make this earth a place of peace and good will. He is affording us the opportunity, as He afforded other nations before us. They failed Him and perished. But that was only an incident to Him. His plans are perfect and His march of progress to the goal of accomplishment is eternal, no matter whom He may have to set up, because of others falling by the way. If He cannot work and win through us, He will work and win without us and through our successors. His aim is victory, in which we may share if we will, but in which we shall have no part if we merely wish and will not.

As individuals we must forsake idleness and extravagance and put on habits of toil and thrift.

As home is the highest idea we have of heaven beyond, we must strive to realize heaven in the purity and sanctity of our home life here.

In our business dealings of whatsoever kind, we must be upright and square, satisfied with legitimate returns, making honest contracts, and always meeting them to the limit of our power, thus "swearing unto our neighbor, and disappointing him not, though it be to our own hurt" (Ps. 15:5).

Both capital and labor must be productive, and to this end capital must recognize labor as capital and labor must recognize capital as labor, mutually agreeing on a fair day's wage for a fair day's work, nothing less and nothing more on either side, and living up to the agreement on both sides.

Above all, we must have that practical faith in God that finds full and free expression in love for our fellowmen—in adversity no less than in prosperity—and even more in the former than in the latter.—Bishop Murray, in Convention Address.

TREMENDOUS VALUE FOR 10c.
Leading Weekly Paper of Nation's Capital Makes Remarkably Attractive Offer.

Washington, D. C., Special.—People in every section of the country are hurrying to take advantage of the Pathfinder's wonderful offer to send that splendid illustrated review of the whole world eight weeks for 10 cents. It costs the editor a lot of money to do this, but he says it pays to invest in new friends, and in spite of the high cost of paper and postage he will keep this rare offer open for a short time longer. You will like this paper; it is 28 years old and now better than ever; splendid stories and rare miscellany. Only a dime mailed at once to Pathfinder, 139 Langdon Sta., Washington, D. C., will keep your whole family informed, entertained, helped and inspired for the next two months.—Adv.

JOHN M. DOYLE
MEMORIAL TABLETS
14 S. THIRD ST. PHILADELPHIA
CATALOGUE ON REQUEST

JUST READY

More "FIVE-MINUTE TALKS"

By Walter R. Bowie, D.D.

SUNNY WINDOWS

Author of "The Children's Year"

AND OTHER SERMONS

Here is another volume of Dr. Bowie's talks to youngsters, all attractively suited to the child mind. The subjects are arresting themes, calculated to almost invariably catch the attention of boy or girl—while the treatment thereof is simplicity itself.

As the Record of Christian Work said: "Dr. Bowie's talks are capital—straight to the hearts of children, clever, interesting, helpful."

Cloth, $1.25 net

For Sale by

Southern Churchman Co., Richmond, Va.

Easter Fashions

Sounding a New Price Note

Easter is symbolical of awaking. It is applicable to the Easter season in the Store—a veritable hive of industry, ideas and fresh new apparel for the glorious Spring Season.

Interest has awakened anew in the Store's goods with the re-appearance of good-looking merchandise of recognized QUALITY and authoritative STYLE at prices strikingly moderate. There is no reason why any one should forego the pleasures of a charming Easter outfit with prices sounding this welcome note.

Women, Misses, Children—all are invited to view the radiant richness of the new modes.

Those who reside too far from the Store to visit it in person are invited to use our Mail Order Department. Write us for what you want.

Miller & Rhoads

"The Shopping Center" RICHMOND, VA.

The Evangelical Education Society
Of the Protestant Episcopal Church

Office: The Church House, Twelfth and Walnut Streets, Philadelphia

AIDS STUDENTS FOR THE MINISTRY AND DISTRIBUTES EVANGELICAL LITERATURE

President: WILLIAM S. HARVEY, ESQ.

Active Vice-President: The Rt. Rev. THOMAS J. GARLAND, D. D.

General Counsel HAROLD GOODWIN, Esq. Treasurer ALFRED LEE, Esq. General Secretary Rev. S. LORD GILBERSON, M. A.

FORM OF BEQUEST

I give and bequeath to "THE EVANGELICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH," incorporated by the legislature of Pennsylvania, the first Monday in November, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine, ———— dollars, or ———— real estate, to be used for the general purpose of the Society.

Who Prepares the Confirmation Class?

As the Bishop goes about for confirmations, and classes of six or eight are presented in parishes where there may be as many as two or three hundred communicants, he asks himself whether the necessary work for preparation for the confirmation has been done. Of course, numbers are not the main thing to be thought about. A small class sometimes represents the best that can be done. There are communities in which the number of children is not large. There are towns where the influences are against the Church; indeed, in most places the other churches in influence overshadow us, so that small numbers can be explained. It will not do, however, to regard small congregations and small confirmation classes as a testimony to the superior quality of the work which is being done.

It is proper to say that the confirmation class is presented not only by the rector, but by the parish. The people in the parish ought to make the conditions favorable for young persons to come on naturally to their confirmation, and for persons who have neglected it to feel drawn towards a decision to become communicants in the church. The spiritual tone and condition of a parish ought to be drawing people to confirmation, and to full service in the church. It is quite unfair to criticize the work of a rector when the people have not done their part towards helping him. The confirmation generally reveals not only the diligence and careful work of the rector, but it reveals the spirit and character of the parish. A good many lay people are disposed to find fault with the rector for not doing their work.

It is a fair question, however, whether the work of preparation for the confirmation ought not to be going on all the time with the special instructions, beginning further back than they do and with ample time for personal interviews. As a rule, every unconfirmed person in a parish of proper age ought far in advance of the coming of the Bishop to have the subject of confirmation presented not in such a way as to irritate or make any one uncomfortable, but in a kindly, courteous manner. A neighbor or friend might often do this as hopefully as a clergyman.

The time to begin the preparation for the next confirmation is the day on which the preceding confirmation is held, for there are generally persons who have nearly made up their minds, and who really wish in their hearts that they had made the decision of which their consciences approve. A full list of all the unconfirmed people and of the children coming to the proper age for confirmation ought to be upon the desk of every rector, or better still, in his book in his pocket. Sometimes when personal interviews are difficult, the right kind of a letter is very effective. Sometimes men and women have put off their confirmation long, or have had scruples about coming to confirmation, not thinking themselves quite good enough, as the expression often is, and they have a feeling concerning coming with the children to perform a long-neglected duty which ought to be regarded, and the bishops are always ready to help.

It must be said that this part of the work of the church, and other parts also, are not done with the thoroughness with which successful business goes on in the world, and the Lord's business surely deserves closer attention than that of a department store.—Newark Churchman.

Memorials or gifts to be in place for this great Festival should be considered promptly so designs may be prepared for criticism and accepted and the work executed and erected in ample time for dedication.

J. & R. LAMB

Studios 23-25-27 Sixth Avenue, New York

EASY, PLEASANT, PROFITABLE

Others Find It So, Why Not You?

Here is your chance. If you have an hour or two a week to spare you can turn every minute of it into money by taking orders for subscriptions to the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN, the oldest Episcopal church paper published in America; endorsed by Bishops and Clergy, and by churchmen everywhere. Every dollar raised by subscription to be devoted to the betterment of the paper.

Liberal commission paid on each order and a generous bonus on your production.

JUST CLIP AND MAIL THIS COUPON

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY,
815 E. Grace Street, Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen: Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name_____ Town_____

Street, or R. F. D._____ State_____

The Universality of Law.

One of the chief reasons why there is so little conventional religion among us, writes the Archbishop of Caledonia in the Guardian, is because of the false conception which so largely prevails as to how God works. The popular idea is that it is only as an external power, occasionally breaking in upon us and interfering with the laws of nature, like some mighty grappling-iron let down from the skies, that God can be recognized as working among us. As this so seldom happens in our experience, it is no wonder that God counts for so little in our lives. God is not the author of confusion. What we call the laws of Nature, including the laws of the mind and the laws of the spirit, are the discoveries we have made as to the way in which God works. There may be still higher laws, which we have not yet fully recognized, which will explain much which at present seems to us to be mysterious, but of one thing we may be certain, God will never contradict the laws which He has stamped upon the constitution of things, for He can never contradict Himself. The reign of law is universal. The variety in the universe is beyond human calculation, but the unity of the universe is supreme, because God reigns.

God does not work upon us as an external mechanical force in some extraordinary manner. He works in us as a vital spiritual influence in accordance with the laws of the social life, the laws of the human mind, and the laws of the creative spirit. It is far more honoring to God to believe that He is constantly working in us in a natural way, than to believe that He only occasionally works upon us in a miraculous manner.

True religion, as distinguished from conventional religion, is the life of God in the souls of men, women and children. The life of God in the soul of man has its fullest manifestation in the person of Christ, and we all know that the Spirit of Christ is the spirit of unselfish love. Since this life of God in the souls of men flows from one and the same source, it follows of necessity that wherever there is true religion it will tend to bind men of all classes, races and nations together as ministering members of the one great Family of God. This is the infallible test of true religion. Whenever we find a force which tends to estrange individuals, split up families, set class against class, or race against race, in selfish antagonism, whether this be a false nationalism, or a one-sided unionism, or a sectarian denominationalism, or an ignorant Bibliolatry, or an ecclesiastical dogmatism, there we may be sure that the Spirit of Christ is lacking. It is an outrage on humanity to call anything like this religion.

If, instead of relegating God to some distant star and making Him a far-off, languid spectator of our human affairs, we would only enthrone Him in our hearts and give the influence of His Spirit of love and goodness full sway in our souls to work in us and through us in accordance with the laws of the human mind and the laws of the social life, such as the power of the attention, the force of suggestion, the principle of associated ideas, the sympathetic radiation of feeling, the inspiration of fellowship, and the interpenetration of personality, religion would become to us all the greatest reality in the universe.

So long as we love, we serve; so long as we are loved by others. I would almost say that we are indispensable; and no man is useless while he has a friend.—Stevenson.

Not Merely

a counting house, but a people's bank and a useful servant in this community.

We believe that it is the duty of any company which serves the public to be a builder of good will in its community, and that its success depends upon the efficiency of its service.

3% interest on savings and dormant accounts. Interest figured on daily balances.

Irrespective of its size, we invite your account.

Richmond Trust Company

Capital and Surplus, $1,200,000

Main and 7th Streets

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President — E. B. Addison, Vice-President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary — J. C. Watson, Treasurer
J. M. Leake, General Agent — Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

(Just Published)

The Gospel of Life

By the Reverend

PHILLIPS STANDISH GILMAN

Author of "The Church and the Individual," etc.

With an Introduction by

THE BISHOP OF EAST CAROLINA

A pithy book for a busy age, with a vital, practical message of divine truth for the attainment of HEALTH, HAPPINESS, and HOLINESS.

READ THE FOLLOWING OPINIONS

"I pray that it may bring a fuller appreciation of all that the blessed Christ may mean to those who are willing to accept His promises and follow Him all of the way."—Bishop Darst.

"It is splendid."—Rev. H. B. Wilson, Society of the Nazarene.

"Spiritual, practical and full of the Gospel of Christ."—Rev. Prof. S. A. Wallis, D. D., Virginia Theological Seminary.

"Particularly apt and inspiring. The appendix is of tremendous value"—Rev. F. M. Wetherill, St. John's, Philadelphia.

Price, 75 Cents, Postpaid

The Southern Churchman Co.,

Richmond, Va.

O. Luetke's Art Works

Church Furnishings

IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.

Est. 1886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

Service

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE

CARPETS DRAPERIES

HOT WATER HEAT

For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars

ARCOLA SYSTEM

R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.

9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

NICK BULL'S MARKET,

Richmond's Leading Dealer in

FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME

312 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.

Phone Randolph 1680

WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health, and, above all,

Provide yourself with Travelers Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank

Richmond, Virginia

"If you want a bank with a heart, try the American National"

This is a bit of advice one of our customers gave to a friend who was coming to Richmond.

Our modesty would never lay claim to such a title, but as it was given us unsolicited, we ask you to put us to the test.

American National Bank

Richmond, Va.

For Church and Home

Organs

A beautifully illustrated catalog, showing styles and prices, of the famous Estey, Packard and Corley Organs will be sent on request.

The Corley Company stock is the most complete in the entire South.

Easy payment terms will be arranged.

The Corley Company

The South's Great Musical Dept. Store

213 E. Broad Street, RICHMOND, VA.

The Rector of St. Luke's Episcopal Church, Kalamazoo, Mich., says about the New Hymnal:

"The New Hymnal with the music, in the hands of the congregation," says the Rev. B. F. P. Ivins, Rector of St. Luke's, "has resulted in hearty congregational singing. Also, we have found many of the new hymns very helpful and stimulating."

The New Hymnal

Handsomely Bound in Dark Blue Cloth

Single copies	$1.20 per copy
In lots of 100 or more	1.05 extended payment
In lots of 100 or more	1.00 cash

Carriage Charges Extra

THE CHURCH PENSION FUND

14 Wall Street, - - - - New York

Southern Churchman

That I may know Him,
And the power of His resurrection,
And the fellowship of His sufferings,
Becoming conformed unto His death;
If by any Means I may attain
Unto the resurrection from the dead.

Saint Paul.

Pre-Easter Number

EDUCATIONAL

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

Established A. D. 1823.

The ninety-seventh session will open on Wednesday, September 15th, 1920.

Special Students Admitted

For catalogue or other information, address the dean or Secretary.

Theological Seminary
Alexandria, Va.

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to
REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean
Petersburg, Va.

The Virginian Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded and Epileptic.
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-third year of this School for Boys opens September 15, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to
REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA.

SUMMER QUARTER

First term, June 20 to July 30; second term, Aug. 2 to Sept. 3. Faculty, over 100; courses, over 300; attendance last year, 1856. Courses for teachers and college students. College credit. Degrees conferred on men and women. Most beautiful campus in America. Cost very reasonable. For catalogue and full information, write to
CHAS. G. MAPHIS, Dean, University, Va.

WHEN WRITING OUR ADVERTISERS PLEASE MENTION THIS PUBLICATION

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each.

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address.. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Decisions are always made in the valley.

A genius is a man who does something that others say cannot be done.

"The moral law written in our natures is more unescapable and inexorable than when it was written on tablets of stone."

There is nothing in Christ to prevent a man having "a hundred fold more in the present life," but much in the present life to hinder a man having Christ.—Dr. Joseph Parker.

To smile at trials that fret and fag,
This is to journey, not to lag.
The test of greatness is the way
We meet the eternal every day.
—Selected.

The haughty feet of power shall fail
Where meekness surely goes;
No cunning find the key of heaven,
No strength its gates unclose.

Alone to guilelessness and love
Those gates shall open fall;
The mind of pride is nothingness,
The child-like heart is all.
—Whittier.

The Rev. J. A. Holdcroft, rector of St. Paul's Church, White Haven, Pa., has been appointed, at the request of Bishop Hulse, to Cuba. Mr. Holdcroft expects to enter upon his duties in March.

If you are really anxious to live a holy life, to do the most good possible in the world, and to make the best use of the time and powers God has given you, let this Lenten season be the time to make the effort.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,
REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

St. Christopher's School

(Formerly the Chamberlayne School)

A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND VA.

Tenth session begins September 22, 1920 Tuition in boarding department limited to twenty-two boys—$700.

For catalogue, address

Rev. C. G. Chamberlayne, Ph. D., Headmaster

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.
A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. College preparatory. Boarding department 503 W. Franklin Street. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health; out-door life.
MISS ROSALIE H. NOLAND, Principal

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLES TOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

Virginia, Chatham. Box 13.

The Chatham Episcopal Institute for Girls

Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Thorough preparation for all colleges. New buildings. Ten-acre campus. Athletics. Gymnasium. Terms moderate. Catalogue and views.

B. D. Tucker, D. D., President; Rev. C. O. Pruden, D. D., Rector; Miss Annie Marian Powell, A. B., Sweet Briar, A. M., Columbia, Prin.

ST. ANNE'S SCHOOL

Boarding and Day School for Girls under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia, Charlottesville, Virginia. Location healthful and beautiful. General and College Preparatory Courses. Music and Art. Intermediate and Primary. Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Pres.: Rev. W. R. Mason, Rector. Third term begins April 1st. Catalogue sent on request.

(Miss) EMMA YERBY, Principal.
Charlottesville, Va.

ST. MARY'S, An Episcopal School for Girls

Founded 1842. Full College preparation and two years' advanced work. Music, Art, Elocution, Domestic Science and Business. 14 Modern Buildings, 25-acre Campus in mild Southern climate. Moderate rates. Address REV. WARREN W. WAY, Rector, Box 19, Raleigh, N. C.

MUSIC FOR EVERYBODY

—BY—

MARSHALL BARTHOLOMEW

—AND—

ROBERT LAWRENCE

The organization and leadership of community music activities. Illustrated.

Net, $1.00; by Mail, $1.10

The Abingdon Press

New York Cincinnati

A Bible School Training Within Your Means

The Toccoa Falls Institute, Toccoa, Ga., offers to consecrated men and women a Fundamental Bible Course including Doctrine Synthesis, Homiletics, Chapter Summary, Church History and Personal Work. Also English branches for those of limited education.

Stands for an unmutilated Bible, Salvation through the Blood of Christ, Victory through the Indwelling Christ, rugged consecration, purifying Hope of the Lord's Return, and burning missionary zeal.

Home farm products make it possible to offer board and tuition for fifteen ($15) dollars per month.

Delightful climate, country life, mountain spring water, modern conveniences. The Toccoa Falls Institute is endorsed by such people as William Jennings Bryan, Paul Rader, the Sunday Evangelistic Party, the local pastors of the Presbyterian, Methodist, and Baptist Churches, etc.

Write to

Rev. R. A. FORREST, Supt. Toccoa, Ga.

An All Purpose Song Book

A Great Sunday School Song Book; A Wonderful Children's Song Book, and Fifteen Gospel Choruses mailed for 86c with the privilege of returning any or all of them.

Get our advice about a standard make of Piano. We might save you over one hundred dollars.

CHARLIE TILLMAN SONG BOOK CO.

Tillman's Crossing, Atlanta, Ga.

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS

Largest stock in the South

We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival

The Couper Marble Works

(Established 65 years)

264-268 Bank St., Norfolk, Va.

Easter Sunday Will Be an Ideal Time to Install an Individua Communion Service

In solid silver or fine silver plate; durable and dependable

POCKET COMMUNION SETS

for administering to the sick

ALMS BASONS,
BRASS VASES,
BRONZE TABLETS

C. LUMSDEN & SON,

Jewelers and Silversmiths

731 Main St., Richmond, Va.

O. Luetke's Art Works

Church Furnishings

IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.

Est. 1886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

God is not worshipped in spirit and in truth in the church that has to go into the show business to "raise" money to pay its honest debts.—Ex.

You need God in the very things that seem to separate you from Him. You must seek in the very places where the misery of life seems to be that He is not. You must question the stoniest paths for streams of water.—Phillips Brooks.

I am His child, and I
Can safely trust;
He loves me, and I know
That He is just.
Within His love I can securely rest,
And know that what He does for me is best.

—Unknown.

Hold fast to Love. If men wound your heart, let them not sour or embitter it; let them not shut up or narrow it; let them only expand it more and more, and be always able to say, with St. Paul, "My heart is enlarged." —F. W. Robertson.

We cannot create faith in ourselves, and we are not required to do so. The invitation is now, as it was to the questioning ones of long ago, "Come and see." They came to the Lord with believed because of what they found their mingling of hope and doubt, and Him to be.—Selected.

Humility is not mentioned by St. Paul in Galatians, when he tells us what is the "fruit of the Spirit," for the simple reason that, like the instrumental accompaniment to a song, humility is needed for the exercise of every element of Christian character.

I would not care to sit upon a throne,
Or build my house upon a mountain-top,
Where I must dwell in glory all alone
And never friend come in or poor man stop.

God grant that I may live upon this earth
And face the tasks which every morning brings,
And never lose the glory and the worth
Of humble service and the simpler things.

—Edgar A. Guest, in the Cosmopolitan.

"The devil goes away from a closed door." If the door is ajar he will stop, look in, enter and destroy; but if firmly closed he goes away. The door of man's heart has been made only to open from the inside, and it cannot be forced. We are under no necessity to sin. "Resist the devil and he shall flee from you."

The spirit of the masters lives not in the copyists whose easels are set up in every art gallery, but in the works that throb with the vitality of today and are beautiful with the light of this morning; so the Church cannot thrive on the traditions of a great past; it must renew its youth in fresh vows and modern forms of activity.—H. W. Mabie.

Moral progress is in the direction of the scruple. The finest scholar in the school of Christ is he who has the rarest perception of the moral trifle. "He that doeth the least of these commandments is greatest in the kingdom of heaven." Therefore, exercise thy moral senses, lest the hordes of evil should enter through the gates of unperceived neglects. "Be watchful."—J. H. Jowell.

Service

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business. That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE

CARPETS DRAPERIES

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health, and, above all,

Provide yourself with Travelers Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank

Richmond, Virginia

Church Furnishings, Memorials, etc.

MOLLER PIPE ORGANS

Highest grade instruments. In use in three thous. and churches. Every organ specially designed for the church and service in which it is to be used and fully guaranteed. Specifications and estimates on request. Correspondence solicited.

M. P. MÖLLER

Hagerstown, Maryland.

CHURCH VESTMENTS

Cassocks, Surplices, Stoles

EMBROIDERIES

Silks, Cloths, Fringes

CLERICAL SUITS

Rabats, Collars, Shirts

COX SONS & VINING

262 Fourth Avenue New York

CHURCH FURNISHINGS

Gold, Silver and Brass

Church and Chancel Furniture

Write for Catalogue for Episcopal Churches

W. & E. SCHMIDT CO.

133 Third Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., MARCH 19, 1921. No. 12.

THE POETRY OF JESUS.

We do Him wrong when we read His words and try to cramp the meaning of His life into the plodding literalness of our prosaic thought. In His interpretation of His world Jesus was forever the poet. He saw beneath the surface of things dusty with our common handling the deeper and diviner loveliness. The familiar sights which most men pass with unseeing eyes became for Him the revelation of immortal meaning. The flower in the Galilean field, the bird a-wing in the summer sky, the sower and the scattered grain, the sheep which passed through the door into the accustomed sheep-fold, the woman kneading leavon into the bread—these were texts enough for the mightiest truths of man and God.

So as He touched the realm of ideas too, as well as when He cast a halo round the objects of His world, was He the poet We cannot measure His truth by our lame logic or any slow arithmetic. He spoke in parables. He spoke in flashing pictures. He opened great gleaming vistas down which the spirit follows on the track of an imagination which widens more and more.

One of the lacks of much of our modern preaching is the lameness of our imagination. We have our theological scholars. We have our expositors who can comment sagely on this and that doctrine. We have the men who can exhort us as to the crowding practical things that we must do. But what we need today along with these are the poet-preachers—the men whose minds, like the mind of Jesus, can invest the common things of life with the aureole of the Divine. We need more men like Robert Norwood, whose "Crown of Thorns," which we publish in these columns, though it be writ in prose is a-throb with the soul of poetry.

Let us remember this—all we whose pressure of hard-headed expectation sometimes crushes out the poetry from the rarer souls. Congregations, with their incessant demands for the little particularities of a minister's service, need to remember that the most priceless thing which he can cultivate for them is the soul which sees, because it dreams. And in our theological seminaries those who shape the preachers that are to be must understand that better than much teaching is the reverence which seeks for and encourages that fresh imagination of the eager mind, without which all our knowledge is but wood upon the altar, unkindled by any heavenly flame.

WANTED--CHRISTIANS WHO THINK.

In Jesus' summary of the commandments there is one element which usually is emphasized less than the rest. He said that men are to love God with all their heart and soul and mind and strength. We hear often a plea for whole-heartedness in religion; we hear innumerable appeals for men and women to pledge their strength in service; we hear them told that their souls must be given to God; but far more rarely is there brought home to Christian disciples the challenge of the Master's words that they must serve God with all their minds.

Almost every Christian congregation has its group of people who mentally are among the leaders of their community. Here are men who in their business enterprise think intensely and plan boldly. They are not content simply to accept the precedents of yesterday. They would never imagine that a successful rule for business could be made up by merely saying "thus and so the thing has always been done." They bring to their responsibility the freshness of an ever renewed imagination. They are alert for each new conception that will increase efficiency. So also those women whose work in the multiplying agencies which more and more are making women a factor in community betterment—the women who plan the work of the visiting nurses, who build up the Social Settlements, who conduct the Associated Charities, who develop the splendid efficiency of the Y. W. C. A., do not sit down and learn by rote what somebody else said the day before. Their ability and service is proportionate to the readiness of their minds to meet new problems with new vision and new strength.

Yet in the Church how seldom is this so. With the best will in the world there are Christian congregations wholly ineffective, because as individuals and as a body they do not think. They take things for granted. They drift along under the momentum of other years. They have not understood their responsibility to give to their Christian service the loyalty of brain as well as heart; and the loyalty of their heart is often smothered by the blanket of dead thoughts which lies upon it like ashes upon a fire.

Beyond measurement is the service of those who have risen above this limitation, and who truly are helping the Christian Church to think of its opportunity with freshness and with power. The best possession of the Church today, and the brightest promise of the Church of tomorrow, is the fact that its thinkers are multiplying. Men and women are arising who have turned upon the Church's task the light of a consecrated intelligence, and are building for the future in the truth of what they see.

We cannot in any other way so well sum up this thought as in a quotation from a letter written by a layman of a certain great American church. When the general body of laymen see through his eyes, the architecture of the coming Church will be fashioned on lines so noble that the kingdom of God will be measurably near.

This is how he framed his thought:

"When I first came to ————, I found St. ———— Church to be much like other parishes with which I was familiar, with a constituency well satisfied with the privilege of listening comfortably once a week to an able sermon, but with little conception of the true functions of a church as a regenerating force in the community. For thirty years we complacently followed our weekly routine of church attendance, well pleased with a moderate growth and only dimly conscious of our relation to the world outside our doors. Then the encroachments of business compelled us to sell our old downtown property, and with the proceeds we were able to build the present edifice upon its commanding site.

"From the time of our removal it seems as if God had chosen us for a special mission. In the furtherance of His design He sent us Dr. ————. The architectural beauty of the building and its attractive setting gave us a prominence in the city's life that carried with it enlarged responsibilities; and under Dr. ————'s leadership we gained a new vision of what those responsibilities were. We at once realized that these blessings had not been given us for our self-glorification, but that an effective instrument for service to humanity had been placed in our keeping. We were a light set upon a hill, and it became our duty to see that that light was kept burning, a beacon for the lost and a challenge for the unrighteous. We have, I think, forever forsaken the old paths, and our people are now converted to the new conception, that our Church is "a plant" where spiritual fires are enkindled and where our characters are fashioned into instrumentalities for the spread of Christ's kingdom among all men.

"This changed attitude on our part, I am sure, had its effect in drawing to us a great number of young men eager to be of service in the Master's cause. The spirit of unrest following in the wake of the war has no doubt had its part in the development of the wave of crime that has swept over this country, but on the other hand it has created a longing, inarticulate perhaps, for that soul-satisfying peace that comes from a perfect understanding of the true inspiration for righteous living. There are thousands of these young men attending our State University, who will tomorrow be the representative and influential citizens of this part of the world. If here we can lay the foundation for a great community of God-fearing men, we will have set up a standard of national life that all men may follow."

ONE MEANING OF HOLY WEEK.

Our thought in Holy Week goes back and links itself with the thought of another great chapter in Jesus' life. In Holy Week His Spirit sealed its final answer to the temptation which came to Him first in the forty days in the wilderness.

Of those three temptations which came to Him in those forty days of spiritual crisis, the climatic one was that in which the tempter showed Him all the kingdoms of the world and said to Him, "These things will I give Thee if Thou wilt fall down and worship me." With kindled imagination in that moment, Jesus saw the power and the triumph that might be His if He chose to adopt the means of the world to attain them. The people of Israel were hungry for a Messiah who should come with the sword of revolution in his hands. They yearned for a King who should build the throne of David once again and create, as they hoped, an empire mightier than that of the Caesars. With His immeasurable power of influence over the loyalties of men, with the possibility which He must have understood of winning to Himself by the world's alliances and the world's weapons such a strength as should set Him amongst the great ones of the earth, Jesus could not have been indifferent to the subtle reality of the tempter's voice. If Herod had climbed to the heights of power which he had attained to, to how much loftier heights might He, the immeasurably greater One, make His way by Herod's path? How dare you, in loyalty to your mission, refuse the way of greatness? the tempter said to Him. How can you influence your world unless at first you win the instruments of power?

To that temptation Jesus shaped His clear, unswerving answer. God's work could not be done save in God's way. God's mighty processes could not be forced by the shrewd expedients of material things. Upon the silent, yet infinite, power of a spirit set in motion through a sacrificial love must He depend for the redemption of life which He had come to win

This lesson of the spirit of Jesus all Christian people need to ponder afresh as they contemplate His sacrifice.

It is the tendency of the world always to honor what it calls its common-sense people. It likes those whose ways of choice it can thoroughly understand. The multitude finds its own vanity gratified when it sees the powerful man succeed in the strength of motives which it can measure out of its own experience. These bargainings and contrivings, these clever manipulations of the obvious forces of the age, are what any one may hope to compass. And so in the triumph of the worldly-minded there is a kind of promise to the crowd that each one may hope to succeed in like manner. But when some great spirit rises, whose vision is fixed beyond the common sight, who shapes his path in superb disregard of the ordinary prudences and calculations, then the man of common mood is bewildered. He demands impatiently of his leaders what he calls practical good sense. He resents the seeming reliance upon things that do not seem real to him.

But the world goes forward always by the vision of its seers. It is for those who look beyond the bounds of the actual, those who see the infinite spiritual possibilities for human life when the glory of God is believed in and followed, that shall lead humanity out of the valleys on to the sunlit heights. Christ was crucified because He insisted upon pointing the life of men on to attainments which most of them had not even begun to see. The Sadducees would have been content if He had preached in such way as to leave the social structure intact, provided they were undisturbed at its top. He might carry on any pious and harmless reformation He chose among the common people at the bottom. The Jewish nationalists would have been satisfied if He had used His power to establish a kingdom out of which they would have reaped new prosperity and power. The Pharisees would have been satisfied if He had been respectful to the ecclesiastical organization, and had allied Himself with them in laying emphasis on all the routine matters of Church obligation. But the goal which He set His eyes upon was mightier than all these. In the splendor of God He dreamed of a world whose society should be recreated, in which idle and selfish privileges should be shamed out of existence, a world in which the spiritual, and not the material, values should prevail; a world in which the Church should be no comfortable thing, with its emphasis on formal observances; but the terrible and triumphant force of a spiritual regeneration that should thrill life through and through. And because His aims were so tremendous and so disquieting, they crucified Him, as the world always tends to crucify those who shock it from its satisfactions.

And if this be true, does the vital necessity for the suffering of Jesus not grow plain? In Him there came to Palestine, and in His Spirit there comes to the world today, that which shocks the forces of inertia and selfishness and sin into an inevitable conflict. The conflict can end in one of only two ways. Either the Spirit of God which was in Christ is surrendered and compromised, or else it dares the utmost faithfulness, even to death, and through its heroic sacrifice rises triumphant into life. For that was what happened with Jesus, and that is what happens with the influence of Jesus always. His crucifixion, and His willingness to be crucified, revealed then, and reveal forever, the dreadful reality of human sin, and in His revelation of the love of God—the patient, unwearying, invincible love of God—He revealed the power which at the last must be victorious.

OUR ASSOCIATE EDITOR REMAINS IN RICHMOND.

In common with the congregation of St. Paul's Church and all the good citizens of Richmond, the readers of the Southern Churchman are to be congratulated that the Rev. Dr. W. Russell Bowie has found it compatible with his strong sense of duty to remain with his own people in this city. The call which was extended him to one of the great churches in another part of the country was an urgent one, offering a field of usefulness which it must have been hard for this earnest and devoted man to decline; but the claims of Richmond have prevailed to the joy and satisfaction of his friends and fellow-workers here.

For many months, owing in part to the ill-health of the editor, Dr. Bowie has been the principal editorial writer on this paper, as the readers of this page have doubtless discovered for themselves. Though this is but one of his minor activities, it is not the least among his varied media of usefulness and influence, and for ourselves and our readers we would here record our appreciation of his excellent work in this behalf and our hope that it may be long continued.—E. L. G.

ST. MARY'S SCHOOL, RALEIGH.

St. Bartholomew's Episcopal Church, in New York, has given official recognition to the movement for increasing the resources of St. Mary's School, at Raleigh, N. C., by contributing out of the discretionary funds of the parish. This action is particularly encouraging to those conducting the campaign, as it is hoped that such recognition of St. Mary's long and splendid educational effort in the field of Christian service will be followed by other Episcopal churches throughout the country, particularly in the South.

St. Mary's School, founded in 1842 by the Rev. Dr. Aldert Smedes, at the request of Bishop Ives, has, since 1872, been a Church institution, the largest school for girls conducted by the Episcopal Church. It is practically a junior college with four years of high school work of the highest standard, and an additional two years of advanced study if desired. Many graduates of other diocesan schools in the South attend St. Mary's for these two years of supplemental training, a course for which it has long been distinguished. The diocesan schools in Mississippi, Texas and other Southern States were founded because of the splendid work done by this parent school.

Dr. Smedes, whose genius carried St. Mary's through twenty-three years of growth, and his son, Dr. Bennett Smedes, who directed the school for twenty-five years after his father's death, were both Episcopal clergymen. The school's chapel services have always been Episcopal, and while it has always welcomed girls of every denomination, and gladly offered them the services of its liberal culture, 75 per cent. of its students have been Episcopalians.

St. Mary's has retained the dignity and charm of the Old South in its atmosphere and customs, and its contribution to the life of the Southland has been of the highest type of cultured Southern womanhood.

In the eighty years of its service St. Mary's has met grave emergencies. During the Civil War its doors were never closed, even while its campus was filled with the tents of opposing armies. Its halls were the sanctuaries for many refugees, among whom were the wife and children of the President of the Confederacy. Mildred Lee, daughter of General Robert E. Lee, was for two years a pupil of the school.

In the late war St. Mary's alumnae served their country abroad in Y. W. C. A. and Red Cross work. At the school wartime activities were carried on by the St. Mary's Red Cross Auxiliary to the Raleigh Chapter, the war saving organization, war gardening and clean-up workers.

The years have brought an ever widening sphere of usefulness. There are 203 resident pupils enrolled at St. Mary's today, the largest on record. The day students number seventy-nine. Such growth, however, has brought a new emergency. Dormitories and recitation halls are overcrowded. Two hundred applicants for admission had to be turned away last fall for lack of room. Equipment no longer meets the requirements of modern education. There is no science building worthy of the name. The science department is understaffed. Scholarships are needed to encourage pupils of small means. The faculty is greatly underpaid. There is no permanent endowment fund on which to draw.

To meet these needs no less than $300,000 will suffice. Of this total $200,000 was assigned as the quota of North and South Carolina, and nearly three-quarters of the sum has been pledged. For the balance of $100,000 dependence is placed on the efforts of the 1,000 or more alumnae living outside the Carolinas.

To date $6,000 out of the $50,000 assigned to the North Division has been pledged—not in large amounts, but by the givers of small sums, a fact that is eloquent of the loyalty of St. Mary's daughters. Larger individual donations than the alumnae can supply will be necessary, however, to complete the sum total that alone will enable St. Mary's to maintain its standards and continue the obligation to serve its normal clientele. It is because of this fact that the action of St. Bartholomew's Church is especially encouraging, since it inspires the hope that similar support will be forthcoming from other Episcopal Churches, which owe so much to the service rendered by this school.

Bishop Atkinson summed up this estimate when he said: "Whenever you see a St. Mary's girl, you see the nucleus of a church." And hundreds of Episcopal clergymen throughout the South today give testimony that their most active helpers in all church work are St. Mary's girls.

Of the worth and value of St. Mary's School to the Episcopal Church and to the molding of lives of real Christian service, there is added the testimony of the Rt. Rev. William A. Guerry, Bishop of South Carolina; the Rt. Rev. Theodore D. Bratton, Bishop of Mississippi; the Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, Bishop of Atlanta; the Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, President of the Council, Protestant Episcopal Church, New York, and many more who are familiar with St. Mary's work and the need for its continued fostering and support by the Episcopal Churches of the country.

Mrs. William G. McAdoo, an alumna of St. Mary's, is serving as national chairman of the fund, and George Gordon Battle as associate chairman. The national headquarters are at 116 West Thirty-ninth Street, New York.

THE PENITENT.

The Rev. Frederick W. Neve.

I am so weak, O Lord,
I cannot wield the sword
That Thou hast placed within my hands,
For this is Satan's hour,
His great and mighty power
Doth hold me back from keeping Thy commands.

O, leave me not alone!
Thou Who didst once atone
Upon the cross for all my sin;
Thou Who hast set me free
Must still my Champion be,
And all my strength, if I am yet to win.

The onset dents my shield,
How can I help but yield
Unless I feel Thy Presence near?
Lord Jesus, hear my cry
And prove that Thou art nigh,
By stooping down and casting out my fear.

Lord, blessed be Thy Name,
I see as in a flame
Thy Face of Love and wondrous Power;
The darkness flees away,
Thy Presence brings the Day,
And with it Thy redemption's perfect hour.

THE TRUE LENT.

There's winter on the hills today,
The sad wind soughs o'er churchyard knolls,
And weary nature seems to say,
"'Tis Lenten-tide for sinful souls."

The barb is in our heart today;
Sore crushed with sense of ail and sin;
We feebly strive and faintly pray,
'Gainst danger near for grace within.

We mourn our pride and passion's stain,
The earthly in our hearts enshrined;
The rebel flesh, too oft in vain
Commanded by the nobler mind;

And all of human curse or care
Which lurks life's dangerous paths among,
To quench the altar-flame of prayer,
Or hush the heavenward strain of song.

—W. M. Punshon.

A CROWN OF THORNS

By the Rev. Robert W. Norwood.

From my first point of remembered consciousness I have always shuddered at the picture of a face that was crowned with thorns. The picture hung in my father's study over a wall of red, green, brown and gray books. To get into the study on stormy winter afternoons was an adventure which required caution, tact and unlimited courage; for father was almost certain to be at his table among his books and manuscripts. If I could creep beyond the oval mat of hand-braided rags, built by mother and Mrs. Ross—who looked like Queen Victoria and was every bit as royal—without upsetting the coal scuttle, shovel and tongs, then I was safe for the window seat behind father's chair. This window seat was made snug and cozy with many cushions of crazy-quilt and log-cabin patterns. If one could draw quietly the great blue and white curtains woven at the loom of a Christ Church parishioner, and so not disturb the man at the desk, then there was a little world of dreams for a boy who thought books more than ever windows of wonder, when there was smell of tobacco smoke from father's brier pipe. The little panes of glass, leaded and Tudor in their style, gave vistas of a white field, and a road past the field to a great hill that seemed like the back and head of a bull when he lies with his feet tucked under him. The hill was sombre with spruce and fir, with occasional bright patches of silver beech and tufts of snow on bending branches.

In the quiet hours of such winter afternoons, when one had read till eyes grew tired, and the shadow of the hill was stepping over the white field to tap the leaded panes, it was nice to peep through the curtains and look and look on the face in the picture above the books—the face with a crown of thorns.

Why was it nice to look at the face of sorrow and pain? Because I knew both, and there was understanding in my heart as I gazed at the picture on the wall.

At first I was too young to understand Whom the face represented. Jesus was a name and a story in a book, the same as all the other names and stories in books that I read in the curtained recess of the study window. The Cross and the Crucified seemed like the far-away picture of a tree through the inverted end of a telescope. So most things seemed to me when books were the medium of their vision. A fact through a book was something in a fairy tale, something that thrilled either with laughter or tears; but the laughter and the tears were also part of the fancy, to be forgotten when the book was closed, and one opened the curtains and slipped past the tongs and scuttle to reach the dining-room in time for grace.

I am not sure that this is not true of older girls and boys who think they are grown up because the gray hairs are beginning to come. Religion is rather like seeing reality through the inverted end of a telescope. We get far-away glimpses of God and the angels, the saints and martyrs, in church on Sundays, but the moment the bell rings for dinner—well, the world is a pretty firm place and there are so many things to do; so mark the place in the book, lay it down and run away. I mean that our religious experience is like the little boy with a book, curled up behind the curtains in his father's study. One may look from the parted curtains and get little thrills at the thorn-crowned face above the books on the farther wall, but the thrills are dramatic thrills that last only till the play is over. We are like children, who have not learned to harness their emotions, as the Niagara Falls have been harnessed for productive power. We generate so much feeling in church, but it goes up like steam through an exhaust pipe instead of turning wheels. It is nice to look through the pretty curtains of our service at a thorn-crowned face. The face brings us thrills. We vaguely feel that something awful happened long ago. Dear me, what dreadful people those Pharisees were! How could they mock that face beneath the thorns? Why did not some one remove that crown? Why did not some one wipe the blood from that face? Then we weep a little as the choir sings:

"O sacred head surrounded
By crown of piercing thorn!
O bleeding head, so wounded,
Reviled and put to scorn!"

In all this I, in my small boyhood, was like that. I fear that I have not changed much since then, for I have been very stupid, very blind, very stubborn, not to see that the face with the crown of thorns is the symbol of "man's inhumanity to man." I, who could thrill at the picture on the wall, was capable of sticking little thorns on the brows of my brothers and sisters—mean little thorns that were deceiving, so cleverly were they woven into what seemed like a crown. I liked to tease. I liked to hurt. I was always bragging about my physical strength, and, if I could send a school boy home with a black eye to demonstrate the skill and might of my fist, I had great pleasure therein. Yet I could thrill and have tears, peeking through the study curtain at a face on the wall that was pallid and stained beneath a crown of thorns!

Now, after these many years, I discover that my greatest sin has been the sin of cruelty. I also discover that this is true of everybody else—no! there are a few exceptions, them let me glorify. At school I found that my play-fellows were fond of making fun of my very freckled face, thin neck, big head and wide mouth. The more they could pierce me with the thorns of mockery, the more were they pleased with themselves; and yet they would look very sad and very solemn in Sunday school when we sang:

"There is a green hill far away,
Outside a city wall,
Where the dear Lord was crucified,
Who died to save us all,"

This same was true at college. How we loved to heckle one another! The mean little tortures to which freshmen were subjected that sophomores might thereby be exalted; the small, stinging, innuendoes that so often went 'round the table at Commons; the lampooning of one another in the University magazine; what did they mean? this: that humanity still carries on its way out of the Jungle to the New Jerusalem, the cruelty of fangs and claws that tear.

And now, after these many years of being out in the world among men and women, I am amazed at our cruelty with one another. How we grudge good words! How generously we measure out to others words that belittle and hurt! And, strange to say, this is as true of those who thrill at a face with its crown of thorns, as of those who never look and so are never thrilled by what is called religion. I know it is not good taste to indulge in personalities but I have not spared myself, and I want to make this clear; therefore, I will be personal. When I first entered the ministry I had all that enthusiasm which a boy, fresh from college, feels as he looks with joy at his coveted profession now at last so near. I had always thought of clergymen as a body of men banded together in Christ's fellowship, and loving one another as the first disciples loved with their Master in their midst. Now I know better. I know that when these "stewards of the mysteries of God" meet at morning clubs or at afternoon and evening deaneries, there is a good deal of this same thorn-crowning going on. A tendency to criticize, to belittle, to twist, to hurt, is just as strong here as anywhere else. The thrill of the early Eucharist or the passion of Sunday night's preaching has gone up like steam through a waste-pipe. What is the good of all this cult of a thorn-crowned Christ, if we forever weave and place on brows the same kind of crown?

But if the clergy are like that, we must not forget they are like that because they are recruited from the pews. The pews are distinctly fond of this thorn-crowning. Their lives are made of little social gossips, and little social gossips are mainly little sharp thorns for somebody's forehead! It is strange that not even the newspapers—those representatives of the people—take any interest in good gossip—and gossip is not necessarily malicious. Nobody would read the papers if, instead of all the unhappy marriages, they reported all the happy ones. How the crowd in the street, in cars, homes, clubs, hotels would complain if all the lascivious, adulterous, sad side-steppings of men and women gave place to all the noble triumphs of those who have gotten the Victory over the Beast!

And yet everybody goes frantic—even the newspapers—if somebody denies that there is atoning efficacy in the far-away face of the picture above the theological books written to show that the blood beneath those thorns taketh away the sins of the world! If there is atoning efficacy in that thorn-crowned face, why can't we stop our perverted and diabolical cruelty to one another in the little thorns that are words, and begin in the name of Jesus Christ to be kind? I think that He was thinking of the real thorns and their stinging mockery when He said:

"By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned."

Our God is not "the God of infinite good nature," which Coleridge said was worshipped by the Unitarians. He is the God of infinite hate for things hateful of infinite love for things lovely, and of forgiving love toward those who have turned from sin through His Son.—Sunday School Times.

A NOTABLE FAMILY IN THE BRAZILIAN MISSION FIELD.

The Rev. James W. Morris, D. D.

Two of the first converts of our mission in Porto Alegre, Andre Fraga and the Rev. Antonio Fraga, were the first fruits of a large family and its connections that have nearly all accepted the gospel, and become ardent supporters and members of the Church.

When Mr. Kinsolving and I arrived in Porto Alegre in April of 1890 we immediately began looking for a house where we might settle at least temporarily until we were more experienced in the language and the ways of the people. After no little hesitation we rented a large house right on the water-front, rather away from the centre, but close to several factories. Here we began anxious study of the language under the direction of the man whom we had brought with us from S. Paulo. We found another man, Vicente Brande, now one of our clergy, who was supporting himself by teaching a small school and who preached to the people on Sunday. Very soon Americo Cabral, now our Archdeacon, joined us. With this company we used to hold our family prayers at night—one feature of which was the singing of a hymn. We found out afterwards that we had a congregation gathered in the cellar beneath our dining-room. Sarmento, now a prominent member of our Church here, married to one of the sisters of Antonio and Andre Fraga, kept a small grocery adjoining our house. He was in fact our landlord, representative of old Mr. Fraga, to whom the house belonged. Sarmento and his family had access to this cellar under our dining-room, and so he, but more often his wife and her sisters, stood under there while we were at prayers—and so heard all that was said and sung.

The Rev. Dr. Morris.
The Rev. Andre Fraga. The Rev. Antonio Fraga.

The result was that when Antonio Fraga came to the city for treatment, his sister told him of the strange men who had rented their father's house. Antonio was the most religious member of the family—almost a priest, they said—and so his sister appealed to him to know about this foreign "padres." She said, "They have a lot of beautiful religious songs that they sing, and they seem to pray nicely, too. They are some kind of foreigners."

And so Antonio, after attending service down below, came boldly over to see us and demanded to know what all the singing and praying was about. Immediately ensued a long conference, followed by many others, in which we engaged as well as we could; but the brunt of which was borne by our assistant, Boaventura. Night after night the New Testament, a new book to Antonio Fraga, was searched, and such deep impressions were produced that finally at Antonio's earnest request we sent Boaventura with him, taking a little magic lantern and slides, up the river to Santa Rita, the home of the Fragas. There Andre very earnestly accepted the gospel, and the whole Fraga connection, with one or two exceptions, threw away their idols and united with our Church. Old Mr. Fraga had a large family of sons and daughters. Besides the sons, Andre and Antonio, all eight of his daughters, with their numerous descendants, became staunch Church people. There are probably between two hundred and three hundred members of our church that are of this family and its connections. A number of the prominent members of Trinity Church, in Porto Alegre, belong to this Episcopal family, as they like to call themselves. The Rev. Mr. Fraga is stationed at Montenegro, and has a congregation of nearly two hundred communicants, his brother, Andre, being one of his prominent members. Archdeacon Cabral married one of the daughters, and at her death contracted a second marriage with her sister. So that Nathaniel Cabral, one of my students, belongs to this great church family through his mother.

We have always considered it a very evident leading of Providence, that we should have been led to settle down in what was in many respects a house little fitted for our purposes. God led us to the people that were prepared for us, and through whom He has done much for His truth.

CHINESE FAMINE RELIEF.

From the Department of Missions.

"The famine is very severe. Appeal for famine relief funds."

(Signed) Graves, Roots, Huntington.

Communicants of the Episcopal Church will recognize in the threefold signature to this cable the names of our three Bishops in China. The various parishes which have not yet responded should feel deeply this appeal and should devise some means of providing relief. It may not be generally known that the onus of famine relief must be assumed by the Christian forces of the United States, due to the fact that they have above all others a world consciousness. It may be argued that America has been overburdened with appeals from Europe and elsewhere, but the fact remains that we have more than plenty for our own needs and could easily meet this terrible need of our Chinese brothers. Mr. Hoover has said:

"We have in our warehouses and on our farms today eighteen months' food supply for the entire American people. We have a harvest coming again within another eight months. Our shelves are overloaded with clothing, our warehouses with raw material; we have ample coal and our people are warmly housed. . . . We can contemplate American warehouses bursting with food and raw material, our farmers unable to sell it at their cost of production, and yet there are people in the midst of starvation and suffering for these very materials, lacking the essentials necessary for the preservation of courage to meet their daily difficulties. No one in the United States has ground for despondency. We will have ground for despondency when we fail to secure that impulse of charity and of economic assistance by which these surpluses of ours can be placed in the hands of the needy."

We are receiving reports from the fields of the valiant efforts being made by representatives of our Church, as well as other officials in China. Bishop Graves writes that the Shanghai Chinese Relief Society had contributed $350,000 up to November 25. Of course the Chinese people have not been trained in conscience to respond to the needs of their fellowmen. There is also a great deal of callousness and dishonesty to overcome. It is certain, however, that the generous response of Western peoples is bringing pressure to bear upon the Chinese Government and that they are showing an unusual and unprecedented disposition to raise money and distribute it honestly. Such monies are handed over to the various international committees to distribute.

Bishop Graves is a member of the Shanghai Foreign Committee, which had up to January 1 raised considerably over one million dollars. As fast as this money comes in it is put into the hands of foreigners who are efficient and honest and are working in the various famine regions.

In our missions they have famine funds, and all money received from missionaries and Chinese Christians is promptly devoted to famine work undertaken by the Church of England Mission in North China. It is to such work that all sums are delegated which are cabled by the Presiding Bishop and Council.

It is interesting to note that the Nippon Sei Kokwai (the Church in Japan) has raised up to January 1 y2,000 and sent the same to the North China District. Two of the Shanghai missionaries, Mr. W. S. A. Pott and the Rev. E. L. Sanford, have been giving their services in the famine.

Further up the Yangtse River, beyond Shanghai, word comes that the same interest is being shown. Chinese members of the Woman's Auxiliary have organized and are meeting regularly to make clothing. Places outside of the mission compounds have donated clothing and many other materials, and as a result boxes are being shipped to interior stations for distribution. At Thanksgiving and Christmas services special contributions were made in church and Sunday school.

In the District of Hankow the Rev. Edward Walker and the Rev. Paul Maslin have been doing yeomen service in the famine area, with headquarters at Suning, Chihli. Word comes that the first distribution of grain was made on Christmas Eve. Suning was the only place in the whole district with grain. The quarters allotted to Mr. Walker were buildings owned by the Board of Education, although they are tumble-down structures. This poor quality building is obviously a sign of the poverty of the neighborhood. One can picture this missionary surrounded by hundreds of boxes of maize, endeavoring to cope with the situation in the midst of bitter cold. He testifies that it is a common sight to see lots of people gather weeds and young people hunting shoots for food.

The Rev. S. H. Littell is a member of the Hankow International Relief Committee, and has already made two trips to Peking as its representative to conferences there to forward the work.

The most active worker in famine relief is the Rev. P. M. Scott, of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, a missionary of the Church of England, residing in Peking. He travels extensively through the famine area and superintends the distribution of supplies made possible by the contribution of American Christians. At the present time the Church of England is caring directly for the feeding of 58,200 people. Our own Mr. Pott writes back in a recent letter, after attempting to do his utmost in the face of tremendous and unsurmountable obstacles in the midst of severe winter conditions, that he has a much clearer idea of how Napoleon felt when he retreated from Moscow.

What the Church in America does, it must do at once if its assistance is to be of any avail. All contributions will be forwarded by cable the week of their receipt for distribution among the workers of Northern China. Checks will be made payable to Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York. Those who are using stereopticon slides and lectures on any subject may secure five views showing scenes in the famine districts, by writing to Miss Condick, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

AN APPLIED CHRISTIANITY BOARD.

E. M. C.

The work of the Seabury Society of New York, begun in 1905, has now developed into the American Board of Applied Christianity, and has been incorporated under New York laws. It aims to establish scientific schools to teach Christ's economy in relation to the public good, as schools of Applied Science teach the laws of physics in relation to industry. Starting as a Church organization, it is now the first Applied Christianity Board in America. Acting upon advice of foremost Church leaders of New York, familiar with its work in New York, the Board now formed is not related to any church, but is loyal to and endeavors to serve all. It also endeavors to serve civic and social causes as well as the Church.

The Seabury Society, from which the Board grows, was long supported by influence, usually also by gifts of money, by the late Bishop Greer, the late Bishop Burch, the Rev. Drs. Manning, Stires, Slattery, Crowder and others, and by many foremost New York Church laymen, including Messrs. Robert S. Brewster, Charles Steele, J. Pierpont Morgan, George Gordon Battle, Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, Mrs. Richard Aldrich and Mrs. Clarence M. Hyde; all of whom realized the possibilities of service to which it is now beginning to attain. The officers of the new Board are: President, Eugene M. Camp; Vice-President, A. Perry Osborn; Secretary, George R. D. Schieffelin, and Treasurer, Colonel Charles Elliott Warren, who is vice-president of one of the great New York banks. Among the incorporaters are the following Church laymen: Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, the new Assistant Secretary of the United States Navy; C. Vanderbilt, Jr., Argyll R. Parsons, Dr. Herbert D. Schenck, William Walker Orr, Oscar W. Ehrhorn, Edwin H. Hess, Arthur A. G. Luders, Howell C. Perrin, Frederick Hoadley, Archibald A. Beatty and Ralph P. Hollister.

The purpose of the Society and now of the Board is to enlist business and professional men, and eventually women, promote among them efficient methods, and furnish them as volunteer workers to civic clubs, Social Service organizations and churches of all names, according as workers prefer and opportunities offer. The plan is practicable. Seabury men have helped archdeacons to establish twenty-four new churches; they established the Cambridge Conference, and they wrote and published the standard text book on "Christ's Economy," the introduction to which was written by the late Bishop Burch. The methods employed are those employed by Jesus Christ, as set forth in the New Testament.

It is the task of ministers to make men see, of laymen to make men do. This Board deals with the latter, and seeks to provide particular churches with informed and trained vestrymen, ushers, Bible class leaders, Sunday school superintendents, treasurers, lay readers, leaders of men's clubs. Hence the work does not duplicate that of any existing organization. After ministers preach sermons people who hear them possess knowledge and zeal. The Board furnishes laymen who can show worshippers precisely how to put knowledge and zeal to service—what to do, how to do it.

Colleges are arriving at the conclusion that it is a mistake to teach men and women business and profession by which they make money, and not teach them at the same time how to serve, during some of their spare time, the public good in some form—civic, social or church. This summer the Board will inaugurate the Montanac weekends on Greenwood Lake, the first summer conference of Christian methods in America, and in July and August, covering the dates of the Columbia University Summer School, it will maintain a Church Method Congress, especially for ministers and volunteer Christian workers from other cities. Last year such workers to the number of more than fifty hunted up the Society's experts in scientific management for consultation. This summer a regular session will be inaugurated.

Under the leadership of this Applied Christianity Board there have just been started in New York two public service bases, the first of their kind in any city in America. Their locations are 70 Fifth Avenue and at 16 West Forty-eighth Street. Their functions are four in number:

1. A Method Exchange. In New York there are 45,000 volunteer civic, social and church workers, including in the latter list the vestrymen and other officers of churches. None had training, yet they handle the material affairs of property worth $325,000,000 and direct expenditures of $14,500,000 a year. The best methods discovered by anybody, anywhere in America or England, are studied and exchanged.

2. A Recruiting Bureau. Thousands of people want to help, but do not know where to offer. Thousands of young men go to New York each year from every part of the country, many of whom are Christian workers back home. A registry of volunteer workers of the greater city.

3. A Training School. Scientific management goes into all forms of human endeavor. Why not also into Christian work? Great laws govern human actions, taught by Christ, but not yet taught by the Church.

4. A Supply Station. Volunteers furnished for Red Cross, for United Hospital Fund, for civic righteousness work, and for all churches; a common centre for all forms of volunteer service.

It is to be stated that practically all of these forms of work are already in successful operation under direction of the laymen who now inaugurate the Applied Christianity Board. A course of training, suggestions of definite tasks, is published by the Board.

A part of the plan of the Board, to be inaugurated as soon as possible, is a publicity service, serving all religious weeklies and all daily newspapers with Church, charitable and educational news of the whole world. A plan for this work has been formulated by practical newspaper men of principal large cities, and placed in the hands of the new Board.

THE TOLERANCE OF CHRIST.

From a Sermon by Canon Alexander.

"I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." Had Christ stopped short with this answer to the Gentile woman, and gone no further, He might have set the example which, as a matter of fact, religious history has followed. If there has been bigotry, exclusiveness, intolerance in the world, it has been in the relations of those who have professed to be His disciples. Over the gateways of how many religious organizations the motto might be written—"Stand by thyself, for I am holier than thou." The bigotry which consists in "exalting the by-laws of one's sect above the Magna Carta of the soul," and of making more of intellectual difference than of moral agreement, has left its fatal mark on Christian history and life One of the first instances of religious intolerance is that recorded in the ninth chapter of St. Luke. The national hatred between Jews and Samaritans, always most liable to show itself at the recurrence of the annual festivals, had issued in the rejection of a Christ Whose face was turned not to Gerizim, but to Jerusalem; and the impetuous Sons of Thunder were at once urgent to call down the lightning to avenge their Master. You remember the quietness of His rebuke—"Ye know not what spirit ye are of." His was not the spirit of Elijah. He was comprehensive, not exclusive. He would have love, not bigotry; pity rather than contempt; and brotherhood rather than revenge. The lesson was not lost on the mind of the apostles, and you can watch the gradual disappearance of their narrowness and intolerance—in St. James, who could allow to Gentile disciples fewer observances than the Jew maintained to be necessary; in St. Peter, who discovered that nothing on earth is common or unclean; even in St. Paul himself, who from being the strictest of a strict school of thought became the pioneer of the gospel to Gentile no less than Jew. All were learning the lesson so difficult to grasp, and yet so essentially Christian—to look for, and to find, the soul of good in things evil. All were learning that the tolerant man is he who, while holding firmly his own faith, can respect the faith of another, and does not believe that he himself, by a special providence, possesses all the secrets of heaven and earth. The mind of the bigot has been compared with the pupil of the eye—"The more light you pour upon it, the more it contracts." It is the mind of Job's comforters who think that wisdom shall die with them; it is not the mind of Him Who was lifted up upon the cross that He might draw all men unto Him. The mind of Christ in religion is the mind which inspired Isaac Newton in scientific research when he said, "I am but as a child gathering pebbles by the shores of a boundless sea." There is no sincere belief which does not cover some kind of truth; there is no sincere believer in whom God leaves Himself wholly without witness; there is no long-established or widespread theory or form of faith in which there is not hidden, however dulled or distorted, a soul of good. Anxious, therefore, as we may be, and rightly anxious, to maintain with all our power our own opinion, we may be certain that we do not possess the whole truth. In this world there is no such thing as the whole truth. Only God has that; and even He fulfils Himself in many ways.

HELPING BOYS TO BECOME MINISTERS.

You can do anything with boys, but you can do nothing for them.

Unless a boy is given something to do to express his religion, it will mean very little to him.

Every virile boy will respond to a worth-while task.

If a boy is trained to serve his Master during the "teen" ages, he will probably desire to serve Him for the rest of his life.

If he is not traned to serve, he will probably, and often does, become indifferent to organized religion.

It is the duty of boys' leaders to train the boys for service.

One of the clearest recollections I have of a book I read ten years ago, "The Doctor," by Ralph Connor, is of the young man who became the hero of the story. He witnessed an accident, and when the surgeon was called to care for an injured man he seized the opportunity to assist him. He helped so ably and with such self-possession that the surgeon afterwards congratulated him. That one experience of medical work gave birth to the resolve in the young man to become a surgeon himself. As will be remembered, he did become a surgeon.

I have known certain young men as fellow-members of debating clubs, and who have, after tortuous first efforts at public speaking, delivered their first great speech in the defense of some question. They experienced great joy in their new success. That first success has, upon more than one occasion, prompted young men to study to be lawyers, to be legal advocates. Some of these I refer to are practicing law in Toronto today.

More than one boy, to my knowledge, through looking into the mechanism of a bicycle, or an amateur wireless machine, or an automobile, and working with it, has definitely decided to be a machinist, or a wireless operator, or a mechanical engineer. Their explorations have pointed to success in this work, and their aptitude for it has but strengthened their resolve.

All of these observations make the conclusion very reasonable that some experience of the work a minister of Jesus Christ has to do, with the privilege and pleasure of it, will be a deciding factor with many boys in becoming ministers. Boys are apt to form wrong impressions of the calling of a minister. He may conclude, from foolish remarks he has heard, that parish calling is stupid, and forget the purposefulness of the minister when calling. He may think preaching and sermon preparation too exacting, and forget that ministers still feel the spirit that moved St. Paul to say, "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel." A boy may hear too much about the smallness of the minister's salary, forgetting that not every salesman is rich, that not every mechanic is prosperous, not every wireless operator gets a large recompense. He certainly forgets that there is a great satisfaction a minister feels that many a business man never knows anything about, unless he is a worker for the Lord.

I believe that boys, as well as men, often feel that religion with them is not vital. Nothing can so much make it vital as the assumed burden of being a brother's keeper, of being responsible for another boy's spiritual progress or lapse. God used the boy Samuel, God used the boy David, to direct many an one to the Lord, and to defeat the evil spirit's designs on another. Of course, it requires an investment of time and thought on the part of a minister to have a Junior Chapter of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, but what work, may I ask, is so well calculated to afford the boy the field for definite Christian work, of bringing boys to the Church and to Jesus Christ, as the Junior Brotherhood. It should yield large returns in shaping the lives of the boys in many a parish which has not yet sent one young man to a theological college, and to secure them for the sacred ministry of Jesus Christ.

Another thought. Boys differ. A whole chapter may have but one really influential boy. Again, a chapter may carry on for a year or two years before it secures in its membership a boy who can exercise a definitely Christian influence. Well, it is abundantly worth while carrying on a hunt for the right boy to talk to about the work of the ministry anyway. One able boy, with the love of Jesus Christ in his heart, and a desire to speak and work for Him, is a tremendous asset to any parish, and worth all the care and time a minister can give to the securing that boy and helping him to see the duty and to assume it of becoming a preacher of the Word of God.—Rev. S. K. Stiles, in Canadian Churchman.

HOSANNA!

Virginia C. Castleman.

Hosanna unto Christ the King!
Hark the exultant throng—
Hosanna! hear the echoes ring
With the triumphant song,
Hosanna in the highest!

Hosanna! strew the royal way
With palms, for victory meet.
Hosanna! haste! your trophies lay
At Jesus' sacred feet—
Hosanna in the highest!

Hosanna! children's voices sing,
While eager mothers press
To plead the great and gracious King
Their little ones to bless—
Hosanna in the highest!

Lo! there in majesty He rides,
And yet with meek bowed head.
No mystic veil His pathway hides—
The Cross, the thorn-crowned Dead—
Hosanna in the highest!

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

AN APPEAL FOR HIGHER IDEALS.

Mr. Editor: I read with interest the article, "An Appeal," in your issue of March 5, and I heartily endorse every word of it. Woman's morals are falling with an alarming rapidity, and it is truly time that the Christian womanhood of America should band together in an effort to resist the tide of immorality sweeping over our land. Something should be done to discourage the indecent dress, the vulgar dances, the growing profanity and other lowering indulgencies that are now being tolerated and even sanctioned by our best society. Can our Christian Church women stand idly and silently by and see womanhood robbed of all her charm, refinement and respectability? Will the sane women of our country allow excess to rule and set the standard of morals for our nation?

Oh, for the sweet simple modesty of our grandmothers! The gentle dignity and refinement that commanded respect, admiration and reverence!

We are living in a progressive age, we are told—with new ideas and views on life. This may be true; but if these ideas lower instead of raising our ideals, then they should be discouraged. We cannot go backward; we must go forward. So must we change our ideas as the progress of the present-day necessities; but our morals, our ideals and our faith can be, and should be, always clean, pure and holy.

(MISS) L. J. HOPKINS.

Hokpins, S. C.

Church Intelligence

Work Among the Foreign-Born Americans.

The annual report of the Rev Thomas Burgess, Secretary of the Work Among Foreign-Born Americans, recites the activities of this division of the work of the Presiding Bishop and Council. In concluding his report, Mr. Burgess says:

The fundamental policy of the division is not to bring about the establishment of a number of foreign-language speaking missions; although such are important, yet, because of lack of money and men, such can only touch the fringe of the problem. The only adequate solution of the vast and complex problem is for ordinary parishes everywhere to do the work of fellowship and service with their ordinary personnel and organizations. To provide a practical program for such work, a pamphlet has been issued after careful consultation with the leaders of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, the Woman's Auxiliary, the Girls' Friendly Society and others. A full hand book, of 200 pages, prepared with the assistance of a number of the best experts in the country, for the training of volunteer workers in any ordinary parish, will be ready for the press within a week or two.

Work of the American Church Institute for Negroes.

The report of the Rev. Dr. Robert W. Patton, General Agent of the American Church Institute for Negroes, made to the Presiding Bishop and Council, recites the condition of eight schools for colored youth in the South which are aided by this institute, including the Bishop Payne Divinity School. He reports large growth and marked progress in the work of these schools, which are so necessary for the uplift of the negro race and for substantial work of the Church among them. He urgently recommends an increase of appropriations for these schools amounting to a total of about ten thousand dollars a year.

Church Work Among the Deaf.

The Rev. John H. Kent has been chosen as vicar of St. Ann's Church for the Deaf, New York City, succeeding the late Rev. Dr. John Chamberlain. Mr. Kent has been curate of this church for many years and was the logical man for the place. Being a native and a life-long resident of New York City, he has an intimate, personal knowledge of conditions there such as no "imported" man could hope to obtain. This church for the deaf was founded by the Rev. Thomas Gallaudet, D. D., who, on his death, was succeeded as vicar by Dr. Chamberlain, his assistant, and now Dr. Chamberlain's assistant takes his place. Mr. Kent is the first deaf man to have this cure. It is assumed that, as a matter of course, he will also become general manager of the Church Mission for Deaf Mutes in New York City and of the Gallaudet Home, an institution for aged and infirm deaf at Wappinger's Falls, near Poughkeepsie, both of which were founded by Dr. Gallaudet. From now on Mr. Kent will minister to the deaf of New York City and vicinity, while the Rev. H. C. Merrill, of Utica, will look after the spiritual welfare of those in other parts of New York State.

Following the announcement by the Rev. H. C. Merrill, missionary to the deaf, that the offerings on a particular Sunday would be given to the Chinese famine sufferers, some of the boys at the School for the Deaf in Rome, N. Y., became so enthusiastic in the matter that they took up a collection among their fellow-pupils and the officers of the school, with the result that a substantial sum of money was later handed to Mr. Merrill to be forwarded to the treasurer of the Famine Fund.

There were some deaf mutes in the class confirmed by the Rt. Rev. C. T. Olmsted, in Christ Church, Binghamton, N. Y., on March 6. At the close of the service the Bishop, who can use the finger alphabet of the deaf, made a short address to the deaf people present by this means, much to their gratification.

For the Relief of the Chinese Sufferers.

Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., has given $250,000 to the China Famine Fund, matching a subscription for the same amount from the Laura Spellman Rockefeller Fund. The Red Cross has made a second appropriation of $500,000. These contributions, it is estimated, will save the lives of several hundred thousand starving Chinese, but it must not be supposed that these large contributions will meet the needs of Chinese relief. As will be seen in another column, the pathetic cry for assistance is still being sounded.

World Conference Continuation Committee in Need of Funds.

The answer to the appeal for money sent out two months ago has been very disappointing. Of course no replies can be expected yet except from North America and Great Britain, but up to February 10 only about $1,500 had been received, of which one sum of $500, two of $200 and one of $100 came from Episcopalians. We had hoped for a very much larger amount, and that it would come in a much greater number of small gifts and more large ones and that more members of other churches would help.

We still need about $47,500 to carry on the work in hand. If you have not already given, will you not send at once all that you can to the United States Trust Company, 45 Wall Street, New York City, U. S. A., marked for the World Conference Continuation Committee?

Robert H. Gardiner, Secretary.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew Reorganized at Hobart College.

The Hobart College Chapter of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew has been reorganized and held its initiation service in the Hobart Chapel Sunday, March 13, in connection with the early communion service. President Murray Bartlett had charge of the service, assisted by the Rev. Dr. J. B. Hubbs, chaplain of the college. Dean Washburn, of the Harvard Theological Seminary, preached at the evening service.

The local chapter of the Brotherhood was established at Hobart in 1898, and was then known as the Bishop Coxe Chapter. It now has a total membership of eleven, and plans are being formulated to extend the activity and scope of the work of the branch.

The officers of the chapter are: R. W. Odell, Director; K. E. Gell, Vice-Director; F. H. W. Lightfoot, Secretary; and T. H. Raines, Treasurer. The other members are: I. P. Lyon, A. S. Haeussler, L. D. Heywood, W. P. Burhorn, B. G. Abbey, J. A. L. Hyde and D. C. Gordon.

LEXINGTON

Rt. Rev. L. M. Burton, D. D., Bishop

Thomas Hall, Corbin, Destroyed by Fire.

Thomas Hall, the three-story building used as store-room, dormitory and class-rooms of St. John's Collegiate Institute and Industrial School, Corbin, Ky., was completely destroyed by fire on Saturday, February 26, caused, presumably, from a short-circuited electric wire in the loft of the third floor. One hundred and sixty-five pupils, largest in the history of the school, are now dependent upon such accommodations as can be provided in this emergency in Wilkins Cottage and Bonton Dormitory, though same are neither proper nor adequate. The same buildings are being used for class-rooms.

This is a serious loss. During the past four years, under increased cost of operations, decrease in gifts, and shrinkage in farm profits towards the last, the continuation of the school, under the wise management and great faith of its president, the Ven. F. B. Wentworth, Archdeacon, and the Christian sacrifice of its faculty, has been short of "miraculous." Now with this fire the "cup of troubles" seems about full. There is great cause for rejoicing, however, for no one was injured, save for the loss of personal effects. The school suffered the greatest loss through the complete destruction of its filled linen closet; a large quantity of second-hand clothing, the reserve stock of its community store, which is a source of revenue for the school; and the building, valued at about $10,000, contents at $2,000; total insured for $8,100. The same building, at present prices, would cost $20,000.

Archdeacon Wentworth writes: "We must have an adequate building, or close the school." The fire may be a providential reason for the Church to provide that proposed new "St. John's Industrial" building at once.

Those interested in the maintenance of the school may send their aid to Archdeacon F. B. Wentworth, Winchester, Ky.

The Rt. Rev. Lewis W. Burton, D. D., the twenty-fifth anniversary of whose consecration was recently celebrated, was the happy recipient of a handsome Bishop's cross and chain, the gift of life-long friends, Mrs. Daxid Z. Norton and sister, Mrs. Charles C. Bolton, of Cleveland, O.

The gift is made of silver, by special order, in a beautiful and original design, greatly admired by all who have seen it.

H. P. M.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop

A most successful mission study class on the late Archdeacon Stuck's book, "The Alaskan Missions of the Episcopal Church," is being conducted by the Woman's Auxiliary of Christ Church, Savannah (the Rev. John D. Wing, D. D., rector). Over twenty women, some of them not members of the Auxiliary, attend each week. The study class follows the rector's Lenten instruction class on Churchmanship.

The members of Calvary Church, Americus (the Rev. James B. Lawrence, rector), are looking forward to Easter when they will worship for the first time in their new building, which has been designed by Cram & Ferguson. The Bishop will be present and will administer confirmation.

Colored Council: April 19-21 has been selected as the date for the sixteenth annual Council of Colored Churchmen of the Diocese of Georgia, which will be held at St. Athanasius' Church, Brunswick. The Rt. Rev. H. B. Delaney, D. D., Suffragan Bishop of North Carolina, will be a guest of the Council, and will preach at one of the evening sessions. The second annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary will be held at the same time, and the program of the last session of the Council will be devoted entirely to the Woman's Auxiliary. Mrs. A. B. Hull, Diocesan President of the Woman's Auxiliary, will deliver an address at one of the meetings of the colored members of the Auxiliary.

The sermon on unity preached by the Bishop at the consecration of the Rt. Rev. George William Davenport, D. D., has been printed in booklet form by the Diocese of Easton, with the permission of Bishop Reese.

E. D. J.

PITTSBURGH

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

St. Stephen's, Wilkinsburg: On Sunday, March 6, the rector of St. Stephen's Church, Wilkinsburg, the Rev. William Porkess, celebrated the second anniversary of the rectorship. Exceptionally large congregations were present at all the services of the day. At the 11 A. M. service an anniversary sermon was preached recapitulating the remarkable growth of the parish. During the two years the church school had been absolutely transformed, being graded throughout, according to public school grading, and an adapting in full of the Christian Nurture Series, Courses 1-14 inclusive. The parish has twelve active organizations, carrying out every phase of church work, for boys, girls, men and women. A twelve-page parish paper is printed each month and several hundred are personally distributed by a committee at the homes of the parishioners. St. Stephen's is increasingly gaining the reputation for its large proportion of workers, and also an unusual number of men who are present at the services for worship.

J. C.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. Chas. H. Brent, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. D. L. Ferris, D. D., Suffragan.

Death of a Prominent Layman.

Dr Matthew D. Mann, noted surgeon, died at his home in Buffalo on March 2.

Dr. Mann was born in Utica, N. Y., and came to Buffalo in the early eighties, from which time he has been a prominent figure in his profession, holding the chair of Gynecology and Obstetrics in the University of Buffalo for many years, also the position of dean of the Medical Department. He wrote many books on medical subjects. Dr Mann operated on President McKinley when he was shot in this city in 1901.

In church life Dr. Mann was always active. He was a warden of St. Paul's Church at the time of his death, and was the president of the Churchman's Club of Buffalo, and one of the founders of the Laymen's Missionary League, in which he worked indefatigably. During the early days of the Laymen's Movement Dr. Mann, perhaps more than any other churchman in Buffalo, went about speaking in the cause of missions, visiting the congregations of all communions and doing much to prove that Episcopalians were a part of that great effort.

Dr. Mann leaves a widow and five sons. One son, the Rev. Arthur Mann, it will be remembered, gave his life in the service in China; the Rev. Arthur Mann, of St. John's University, Shanghai.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Bishop Garland has become treasurer of the Jerusalem and East Mission Fund, in response to the appeal of Bishop MacInnes, of Jerusalem, who requested Bishop Gailor to appoint a successtor to the late treasurer, the Rev. Dr. John McKenzie.

New Church for Whitemarsh: The congregation of St. Thomas' Church, of Whitemarsh, has approved plans for the erection of a $35,000 parish building.

The Convocation of South Philadelphia recently elected the Rev. J. B. Stewart, of the Chapel of the Holy Comforter (Memorial), as secretary, and Mr. Morris Earle as treasurer.

The Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society recently received $408,000 from the estates of the late George Platt and Miss Emily Platt, of Philadelphia. This amount is to be held in trust and the income applied for domestic missions in the States of Oregon, Montana, Nebraska and the Dakotas. The accrued income for 1920, amounting to a little more than $19,000, was equally divided between the dioceses and missionary districts in these States.

The winter meeting of the West Philadelphia Branch of the Sunday School Association of the Diocese took place Tuesday night, March 8, in St. Barnabas' Church. The speakers and topics were Bishop Rhinelander, "Relation of the Church School to the Worship of the Church"; Dr. Fred Gowing, principal of the Girls' High School, "Problems of Discipline"; "The Teachers' Collateral Reading," W. O. Easton, Associate Secretary, Y. M. C. A.

As an incentive to closer fellowship, St. Andrew's Church, West Philadelphia, is conducting on the first Sunday evening of each month an Agape or Love Feast. At the first meeting, held in February, following a shortened form of Evening Prayer, the congregation assembled in the parish house for an informal entertainment and social hour together. Following the rector's address and the musical numbers, there was a cordial intermingling of the congregation, refreshments were served, and before parting all joined feelingly in singing "Blest Be the Tie That Binds."

The splendid response to the first of these services, both in attendance and spirit, points to the useful possibilities of the "Agape."

R. R. W.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop

Death of the Rev. Dr. Pettis.

The Rev. William Melrose Pettis, D. D., of St. Thomas' Church, Washington, passed to higher life on March 1, after a brief illness in his winter home at Orlando, Fla.

A brief service was held in his Orlando home by Bishop Mann and Dean Glass ere the return trip to Washington, where the funeral was held from St. Thomas' Church on March 5, the interment being in the cemetery connected with that church.

Born in Williamsburg, Va., on October 14, 1837, Dr. Pettis had a long and fruitful ministry. His character was one of rare beauty and helpfulness, marked by deep devotion to Christ and His Church, by unfailing faith and zeal, love and sympathy. Wherever known he was beloved; his long earthly life was full of rich blessing.

He was a graduate of William and Mary College and received his degree from Kenyon. In 1865 he was made deacon by Bishop Wilmer, and was advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Green in 1867, his ordination being the first one held at Sewanee.

His first work after ordination was at Holly Springs, Miss. Among other charges were Paducah, Ky., Newport, Ky., Clarksville, Tenn., and Chattanooga, Tenn. His later years were spent in Washington, D. C., where he had charge for some years at Grace Church, Georgetown, before becoming assistant at St. Thomas'.

C. R.

Sunday School Institute.

The regular monthly meeting of the Sunday School Institute of the Diocese of Washington was held at St. Andrew's Church on Tuesday evening, March 15. The special speaker was Mrs. Loman, Regional Field Secretary of the Provincial Board of Religious Education.

Dr. John W. Wood, Secretary of the Board of Missions, delivered an address at Christ Church, Southeast, at the evening service on Sunday, March 13.

Organ Recitals: Mr. Edgar Priest, Washington Cathedral organist, was heard in recital at Epiphany Church on Wednesday, March 9, at St. Mary's Chapel, March 11, and the Church of the Good Shepherd, March 15, and will play at St. John's March 19; at the First Methodist Church, Alexandria, March 25, and at Meade Memorial Church, White Post, Va., on March 29.

M. M. W.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robt. C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

The many friends of the Rev. W. G. Pendleton, D. D., will be glad to know that his injuries, while very painful, are not serious, and it is hoped he will soon be able to resume his work at the Virginia Episcopal School.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor

Ex-President Wilson Presents Bible to Bruton Church.

President Woodrow Wilson recently presented to historic Bruton Parish, Williamsburg, a beautifully bound "American Standard" Bible autographed with his signature. A letter from the President to E. Ruffin Jones, rector, accompanied the gift.

The story which surrounds this gift is a most interesting one. There is in Bruton Parish Church a very handsome copy of the King James' Version of the Bible. It was especially prepared in England for presentation to the Church by King Edward VII. It was brought over by the Bishop of London in 1907, the 300th anniversary of the founding of Christianity by the English at Jamestown. Bruton Parish Church is in direct succession to the first church there. This Bible rests upon a lectern presented by President Roosevelt.

It happens that there is another reading desk in frequent use in the Church upon which the rector wished a suitable pulpit copy of the "American Standard" Bible, for as the rector says, "This version may in time entirely supplant the King James', as you know it has been already authorized by our General Convention."

It is quite fitting at this time that this more generally adopted and accurate version of the Bible should be presented by President Wilson to eventually supplant the one of King Edward VII.

The Rev. Mr. Middleton Accepts Call to Norfolk.

The Rev. Newton Middleton, for the past three years rector of Trinity Church, Portsmouth, has resigned, to accept the rectorship of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Meadowbrook, Norfolk, the resignation to take effect April 17.

At a special meeting the vestry passed resolutions accepting the resignation, expressing deep regret at the action of the rector in leaving, and appreciation for the excellent work done during the past three years.

Since coming to Trinity Church Mr Middleton has been one of the leading influences in the Church life of the city. He has taken an active part in the community welfare work, being especially interested in securing for the city a Y. W. C. A.

During the period of the world war Mr. Middleton was at the head of the War Camp Community Service of Portsmouth, and under his leadership that organization carried out a large program in caring for the men in the service and those who were drafted for service.

VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. W. Cabell Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Enthusiastic Meeting of Men's Bible Classes.

Representatives of more than sixty Protestant churches, including members of practically every organized men's Bible class in Richmond, met in Holy Trinity Church, Richmond, Sunday afternoon, March 13, for a service of song and prayer, as a preliminary to the great simultaneous evangelistic campaign which will be held for a week, beginning Sunday, March 20. This preliminary meeting, held under the auspices of the organized Men's Bible Classes, and attended by over a thousand men, was one of the most enthusiastic ever held in Richmond. The principal address was made by Dr. Douglas S. Freeman, editor of the News-Leader, and chairman of the General Committee in charge of the movement, who declared that the principal object of the campaign is to awaken Richmond to a new spiritual life and to bring more men into active participation in the affairs of the Church and the Bible classes.

Marked interest is also shown by the colored churches, twenty-three of which will join with the white churches in the movement. At the same hour on Sunday afternoon, in one of the colored churches, another great audience of men was engaged in a similar service, which was most enthusiastic and inspiring.

Dr. Bowie Declines Call to Minneapolis.

The Rev. W. Russell Bowie, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, announced to his congregation on Sunday morning, March 13, that he had declined the call recently extended him to St. Mark's Church, Minneapolis. The announcement was received with relief and pleasure, not only by the people of St. Paul's, but by the people of Richmond and the Diocese.

Funeral of Mrs. Wm. G. Pendleton.

The funeral services for Mrs. William G. Pendleton, wife of the Rev. William G. Pendleton, of the Virginia Episcopal School, were conducted in Alexandria Thursday afternoon, March 10, by the Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., and the Rev. Dr. Samuel A. Wallis, interment being made in Ivy Hill Cemetery.

CHICAGO.

Rt. Rev. C. P. Anderson, D. D., Bishop.

Burning of the Cathedral, Chicago.

The interior of the Cathedral of Sts. Peter and Paul, Chicago, was destroyed by fire Sunday night, March 6. The fire, which was discovered by the Rev. Charles L. Street, priest in charge, shortly after 9 o'clock, originated in the organ. It spread with great rapidity, notwithstanding that a large number of engines were speedily pumping streams of water into the burning edifice. Early reports place the loss at about $100,000, with insurance of about $80,000.

The Cathedral was opened for services on Easter Day, 1861, when the Cathedral movement in this country was in its inception. Erected on the corner of Washington and Peoria Streets, it was at that time in the best residence portion of the city. The locality gradually changed, the residence section moving farther and farther away. Bravely has it maintained its work under many difficulties, a clergy house, mission house, and Sumner Hall, a parish house, being added gradually to the property.

The communion service and vestments were saved, but with damage to some extent. Among the losses are the tablets to the memory of each of the past Bishops—Whitehouse, McLaren and Toll—who have been associated with the work. The clergy house, mission house and Sumner Hall were saved.

NEW YORK.

Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D.,
Bishop-Elect.

Dr. Stires' Twentieth Anniversary as Rector of St. Thomas'.

Few tasks are more delicate than the one of a vestry, laymen all and perhaps not familiar at first hands with clergy of the Church, going out to select a new rector for a great New York parish; one that must bear unusual financial burdens toward the entire Church and its work, and be attended in its Sunday services by worshippers from all America, indeed from all the world. Twenty years ago exactly St. Thomas' vestry had this task in hand, and performed it so well that today, when the anniversary of the Rev. Dr. Ernest M. Stires' twenty years of service is being observed, the famous parish is far stronger, far larger, and far more liberal with workers and gifts than ever in its long and great history.

This growth is in a material plant that is probably the most beautiful and most costly in America, but this is only the outward and visible sign. It is what anybody sees riding up Fifth Avenue on a bus. The real growth of St. Thomas' is in the spiritual life, the service rendered, the influence upon New York and the nation of a spiritual priest of the Church exerting, material things assisting, such deep and wide influence as it falls to few priests to give to those in need.

The anniversary is not observed in elaborate fashion. It began with no flourish from the rector, but rather with insistence by the people that note be made at this time of hard personal and team work be recognized. Speaking at one of the meetings, the Rev. Dr. James B. Wasson, now head of the Strangers' Welfare Fellowship, but long curate at St. Thomas', gave as his estimate five points of strength shown by Dr. Stires. Such estimate is first hand.

"Dr. Stires has so preached and taught," said Dr. Wasson, "that he has immeasurably helped the cause of civic virtue. On fitting occasions he has taken positions of leadership in the great questions which concern city and nation. Here is no easy task, for it is to be remembered that within these twenty years, since Dr. Stires came from Chicago, this city of New York has grown to be the first city of the world, in size and wealth at any rate.

"I wonder if you realize that at all times there are in New York 500,000 visitors. Some put the number at 800,000, but certain it is that people are here from every land under the sun. Many of these people attend church on Sundays. The difficulty of helping spiritually such transients is very great; and perhaps some city pastors fail to help them. My experience as chaplain of a Fellowship to these strangers is that Dr. Stires has nobly improved the wonderful opportunity to speak a fitting word in season.

"As administrator Dr. Stires has made St. Thomas' one of the strongest, forward-looking and spiritually-fruitful parishes in the Diocese. He has also inspired his people to build and pay for this noble edifice, one of the few great churches of the Western world, a veritable sermon in stone."

The fourth point of greatness, according to Dr. Wasson, is the wide vision of St. Thomas' people, under Dr. Stires' leadership, in that these people give from $4 to $6 to others for each $1 spent at home, and do so without caondition, trusting as Christ did to others the decisions as to forms of work. The East Side of New York, American missions and American education, and then the world and all of its many needs. This development of the grace of giving has been made in marked degree in the twenty years, and is making more and more each year.

Finally, as pastor, Dr. Wasson thought, since he was in position to know, that Dr. Stires succeeds above all other qualifications. Speaking as a curate, Dr. Wasson paid high tribute to Dr. Stires as rector—a superior in authority,- and compared such service to that of service to the many and exacting demands of a great communicant list, and a far greater household of faith that calls St. Thomas' its spiritual home.

C.

A Significant Gathering.

On Monday, March 7, there was a significant Lenten gathering in Christ Church, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., of a number of the Protestant Episcopal clergy and their brethren of other neighboring Protestant churches. The day was set apart for a series of conferences on various important subjects mutually affecting their individual and corporate activities. The meeting was planned by the Rev. Dr. Cummins, rector of Christ Church, who was also the host of the occasion. The conference was opened by a service of the Holy Communion, at which all the conferees attended and took part in.

Then followed a series of discussions based upon four subjects: (a) Observance of the Christian Sabbath; (b) Bolsheviki and Socialistic movements and their relation to organized religion; (c) the relation of the local churches to local religious and philanthropic institutions; (d) the special observance of Holy Week.

Lunch was served at Christ Church rectory, and after lunch a general social hour followed.

Among those participating in this conference, in addition to the Episcopal clergy, were all the pastors of the Presbyterian, Dutch Reformed, Congregational, Methodist, English Lutheran, Baptist and Friends' Churches, a group of eighteen of the leading ministers of Poughkeepsie and vicinity.

Mrs. George Slattery, mother of the Rev. Dr. Charles L. Slattery, rector of Grace Church, New York, died Saturday, March 5, at Grace Church rectory. Her death brings sorrow to a wide circle, and the sympathy of his many friends goes out to Dr. Slattery in his great loss.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Theodosius S. Tyng, long time missionary in Japan, has taken residence in Buffalo, N. Y., at 206 Richmond Avenue.

The Rev. A. F. Henry Serent, missionary at Hopewell Junction, N. Y., has accepted a unanimous call to St. Andrew's Church, Brewster, N. Y., to take effect on April 1. During Mr. Serent's stay at Hopewell the church has been completely renovated and a new $3,000 parish house has been added. Receipts have increased over twenty times their previous figure, and the confirmed persons have tripled in number. Mr. Serent is an alumnus of the Virginia Seminary, '18.

The Rev. Donald Millar, for two and a half years curate at the Chapel of the Intercession, Trinity Parish, New York City, entered upon the rectorship of St. John's Church, Columbia, S. C., on March 13.

The Rev. William R. Wood, rector of St. Mary's Church, Reading, Pa., will enter upon his duties on the clerical staff of St. Paul's Church, Buffalo, soon after Easter.

The Rev. Carl M. Worden, of the Diocese of Nebraska and superintendent of the Masonic Home for Boys, has been appointed by Bishop Shayler as assistant to Dean James A. Tancock, of Trinity Cathedral, Omaha.

The Rev. Henry B. Wilson, director of the Society of the Nazarene, has just finished an extended trip into the Southern States, visiting New Orleans, San Antonio, Houston, Atlanta, Asheville and Washington. Conferences with the Bishops and clergy were held in all these places, missions were held, and healing guilds were established.

The Rev. Harvey P. Walter, Field Secretary for the Diocese of Bethlehem, will begin his duties on April 1 with address at Bethlehem, Pa., R. F. D. No. 3.

Ordinations.

In St. Augustine's Church, Galveston, Tex., on February 27, Bishop Kinsolving advanced to the priesthood the Rev. John W. Freeman. The Rev. D. R. Clarke preached, and the candidate was presented by Archdeacon Walker. The Rev. D. R. Clarke and Archdeacon Walker united in the laying on of hands. The Rev. Mr. Freeman is priest in charge of St. Clement's Chapel, Houston.

In St. John the Baptist's Church, Tyler, Tex., on February 27, Bishop Quin advanced to the priesthood the Rev. John B. Boyce. The Rev. W. E. Claybrook preached, presented the candidate and joined in the laying on of hands. The Rev. Mr. Boyce is vicar of the church in which this service occurred.

On March 1, in Christ Church Cathedral, Hartford, Conn., the Rev. William Grime was advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Brewster. Mr. Grime is a graduate of the Episcopal Academy, Cheshire, Conn., Trinity College, Hartford, and the Berkeley Divinity School. He was ordered deacon by Bishop Brewster in Holy Trinity Church, Middletown, on June 2, 1920. He will remain on the Cathedral staff.

On February 28, in St. Philip's Mission Church, Columbus, Harold Foster Percival was ordained to the priesthood by the Bishop Coadjutor of Southern Ohio. He was presented by the Rev. Herbert W. Smith, and the Rev. F. C. F. Randolph preached. This ordination provides the fourth priest in the Diocese to take charge of colored missions. The Rev. Mr. Percival will continue in charge of St. Mark's Church, Chillicothe.

The Rev. Edgar E. Brooks, a nonparochial priest of the Diocese of Newark, died at Springfield, Mass., on February 18.

Today.

We shall do so much in the years to come,
But what have we done today?
We shall give out gold in a princely sum,
But what did we give today?
We shall lift the heart and dry the tear,
We shall plant a hope in the place of fear,
We shall speak with words of love and cheer,
But what have we done today?

We shall be so kind in the after while,
But what have we been today?
We shall bring to each lonely life a smile,
But what have we brought today?
We shall give to truth a greater birth,
And to steadfast faith a deeper worth,
We shall feed the hungering souls of earth,
But whom have we fed today?

—Nixon Waterman.

Men talk of the intricate paths of life, and they are many. And none are more so than those which wind about in the four walls of the house in which you live. And if you would walk them doing kindly service, and avoiding weak concessions to wrong on the one hand, and harsh exactions of right on the other, then let in the blessed Christ into that home. You may give a wide berth to that harsh-tempered one in your home who is so exacting: but do you let the Christ tread alone the narrower way of kindliness and love?—Dr. J. H. Eggleston.

After an act of public worship, we are either better or worst, spiritually.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

FOOD FOR THOUGHT.

With the coming of the warm weather the question of proper places and methods of recreation for children becomes more and more acute. The automobile offers a daily increasing menace to the child life in the streets. Where it was comparatively safe for the children to play in quiet streets a few years ago, it is now extremely dangerous.

The story has been told of two small boys returning from a settlement Sunday school, on the East Side in New York, and discussing the articles of the Creed.

"What is that 'quick an' the dead' that we believes about?" said the first one of these young theologians.

"Oh, shaw," replied the other with a superior air. "Don't you know what that is? The quick is the ones that gits out of the way; and the dead is the ones the automobiles runs over."

We may smile at so modern a definition of this ancient formula.

Nevertheless, this question and answer contain a solemn truth, and the statement of a dreadful menace to childhood, that should have the serious thought of all Christian people, as well as the best attention of modern municipal authorities.

In many cities there are vacant lots which can be transformed into safe and helpful playgrounds at a moderate expense. Where necessary, pressure should be brought to bear upon city councils to make the required appropriation for this purpose. It is the unanimous opinion of judges of juvenile courts, that such expenditures are preventive of crime among children, and so saves the city subsequent expense.

YOUNG MEN HEEDING THE CALL.

News comes from Lexington, Va., of a great religious awakening that has been brought about in that college town, where so many young men are attending Washington and Lee University and the Virginia Military Institute.

Sometimes it takes a religious arousing to make us realize how far we have fallen from regular attention to God's work.

It was the discovery of the ancient copy of the law, in the reign of Josiah, that brought the attention of the Jews to the fact that they had so long neglected the study of that law.

So, today, the news of this spiritual revival at Lexington brings out a startling fact of dereliction in God's service, for we are told in connection with it, that regular daily chapel services are going to be resumed, after a lapse of thirteen years. This suspension of the daily service in 1908 was caused by the lack of attendance of the students.

We cannot but feel that the indifference of young men to active church membership is due to the fact that too often we lay an undue emphasis on the beautiful, but rather effeminate, attributes of mercy and forgiveness, which were displayed by our Saviour in a superlative degree. By emphasizing this side of His character, we sometimes overlook instances of physical endurance and the superb courage which was equally pronounced in His life. The instances of His strength come to our attention upon several occasions that are often overlooked.

In the fourth chapter of St. John's gospel we are told that in traveling from Judea to Galilee "He must needs go through Samaria. Then cometh He to a city called Sycha," and later in the same chapter, we are told it was about the sixth hour, which would be midday. Sycha is the present town of Nablus, at which place General Allenby had his headquarters during the Palestine campaign, and it is twenty miles from the border of Judea, which shows our Saviour had walked twenty miles in six hours, a feat requiring a high state of physical health.

Again in the account of the cleansing of the temple court, when Christ drove out the money-changers and overturned their tables, we may rest assured that these traders would not have submitted to such conduct had they dared to resist.

Of course His calm submission to the indignities and tortures in the court of Pilate and of the High Priest were borne with a high fortitude and dignity that brought from the Roman governor the admiring exclamation, "Behold a Man!"

The news from Lexington tells us that more than four hundred young men of the student bodies of the two colleges there have openly pledged their loyalty to the Master's service, as a result of the evangelistic services of the Rev. Mr. Trotter.

If the life of Christ and the call of Christ could be presented in all its heroic glory to the young men of our college towns, we feel sure that there would be many similar reports.

ARE YOU DAILY INCREASING IN HIS HOLY SPIRIT?

As the Easter season draws near numerous classes are in preparation for confirmation and many persons will soon be kneeling at the altar rails of our churches, to receive that solemn laying on of hands and hear those impressive words, "Defend, O Lord, this Thy child, with Thy heavenly grace; that he may continue Thine forever; and daily increase in Thy Holy Spirit more and more, until he come unto Thy everlasting kingdom."

It seems almost a pity that we do not have some form of service for a renewal or reconsecration of oneself to God.

Too often the confirmation service is looked forward to, as a sort of climax to our spiritual life, whereas in reality it is but the beginning or entry into the service of God, and those very words that we have quoted refer to it as such, for the Bishop prays that we "daily increase in Thy Holy Spirit more and more." Such words certainly do not imply a final attainment of religious fervor, but look forward to its progress.

Of course, the Holy Communion from month to month, or week to week, as the case may be, is a means, and a very important and helpful means, of responding to that prayer of "daily increase" in spiritual strength. In addition to this, however, 'twould be well for us to make the Easters, as they come and go, a time not only to celebrate the Ressurrection of our Lord, but also a rising again of our own spiritual powers, a new reaching up to God, that will be as solemn to us, within ourselves, as was that moment of laying on of hands, when we were first admitted as full citizens to that kingdom on earth, to which our loyalty is thereby pledged.

There are men in this country today still serving long terms of imprisonment for being neglectful of their allegiance to their country in its time of recent need. In the same way do our souls lie as helpless captives when we fail to be faithful citizens of that kingdom whose coming we pray for, and for whose success we are pledged to struggle.

So often one hears criticism of matters relating to the church, the Sunday school, choir, or the guilds. It would be well for such critics to dedicate their efforts to construction rather than destruction of these agencies for rendering God's service. If the Sunday school is not efficient, you can do more by offering your services to help to make it so, than by talking to your friends about its failure.

Remember that every effort that is made by the church to which you belong offers you a means of service. and that if you are to increase daily in God's Holy Spirit you must avail yourself of these opportunities of working for Him.

Family Department

COLLECT AND CALENDAR.

MARCH.

1. Tuesday.
6. Fourth Sunday in Lent.
13. Fifth (Passion) Sunday in Lent.
20. Sixth (Palm) Sunday in Lent.
24. Maundy Thursday.
25. Good Friday. Annunciation B. V. M
27. Easter Day.
31. Thursday.

Collect for Sunday Next Before Easter.

Almighty and everlasting God, Who, of Thy tender love towards mankind, hast sent Thy Son, our Saviour Jesus Christ, to take upon Him our flesh, and to suffer death upon the cross, that all mankind should follow the example of His great humility; Mercifully grant, that we may both follow the example of His patience, and also be made partakers of His resurrection; through the same Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collects for Good Friday.

Almighty God, we beseech Thee graciously to behold this Thy family, for which our Lord Jesus Christ was contented to be betrayed, and given up into the hands of wicked men and to suffer death upon the cross: Who now liveth and reigneth with Thee, and the Holy Ghost, ever one God, world without end. Amen.

Almighty and everlasting God, by Whose Spirit the whole body of the Church is governed and sanctified; Receive our supplications and prayers, which we offer before Thee for all estates of men in Thy holy Church, that every member of the same in his vocation and ministry, may truly and godly serve Thee; through our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.

O Merciful God, Who hast made all men, and hatest nothing that Thou hast made, nor desireth the death of a sinner, but rather that he should be converted and live; have mercy upon all Jews, Turks, infidels and heretics; and take from them all ignorance, hardness of heart, and contempt of Thy Word; and so fetch them home, blessed Lord, to Thy flock, that they may be saved among the remnant of the true Israelites, and be made one fold under one shepherd, Jesus Christ our Lord, Who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the Holy Spirit, one God, world without end. Amen.

Colect for Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

We beseech Thee, O Lord, pour Thy grace into our hearts; that, as we have known the incarnation of Thy Son Jesus Christ by the message of an Angel, so by His passion we may be brought unto the glory of His resurrection; through the same Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collect for Easter Even.

Grant, O Lord, that as we are baptized into the death of Thy blessed Son, our Saviour Jesus Christ, so by continually mortifying our corrupt affections we may be buried with Him; and that through the grave, and gate of death, we may pass to our joyful resurrection; for His merits, Who died, and was buried, and rose again for us, Thy Son, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

(For the Southern Churchman.)

"I Go My Way."

John 8:21.

Jane Dalziel Wood.

Lord Jesus Christ of Nazareth!
With Thy hammer and Thy saw,
Working by a mortal's law,
Thou, Who hadst the Master mind—
Didst Thou never long to find
Mental fellowship with men
Through Thine all-convincing pen?

Lord Jesus Christ of Nazareth!
With a mission to the earth,
Long announced before Thy birth;
Didst Thou never feel it waste
Thus to labor without haste?

* * *

Thirty years of preparation
For three years of consummation?

* * *

Lord Jesus Christ of Nazareth!
With Thy great artistic powers,
With Thy love of birds and flowers;
Didst Thou shrink from foul disease?
Didst Thou flinch from lepers' pleas?
Didst Thou dread the filthy sores
Of the crowds that came by scores?

Lord Jesus Christ of Nazareth!
Knowing nothing less than God,
Worshipped always as the Lord,
Sensitive beyond our ken—
Did the touch of common men
Make Thy soul draw back in pain?
Long for Thy own home again.

Lord Jesus Christ of Nazareth!
Who with love all life inspires,
With it kindles holy fires—
Didst Thou crave the sympathy
Of our great humanity?
Did the love of two or three
John and Marys suffice Thee?

Lord Jesus Christ of Nazareth!
Who didst never vacillate,
Neither shirk nor hesitate—
Was it hard to be so meek
With the foolish and the weak?
For not once didst Thou condemn
Sinful, sorrowing, suffering men!

Lord Jesus Christ of Nazareth!
Who didst all things apprehend,
Who didst all men comprehend;
What a lonely life was Thine—
Able secrets to divine—
Know Thyself misunderstood
Even by Thy brotherhood.

Lord Jesus Christ of Nazareth!
Sharing man's exile from God,
Dwelling on an alien sod,
What a sadly different life!
What a heavy load of strife!
What an awful hour of fear,
Dying, God did not seem near!

Lord Jesus Christ of Nazareth!
Loved and honored and adored
As the ever-living Lord:
Who can tell the weariness
Of the awful dreariness
Of Thy lonely life below,
Watched and hated by the foe?

* * *

Lonely was Thy way, dear Lord,
But it led to heaven!
And millions who have seen Thee not,
Have chosen still Thy bitter lot,
And shall, without a stain or blot,
Join Thee in heaven.

For the Southern Churchman.

Purified Through Suffering.

Eugenie du Maurier.

Over in Italy on a hill there was once a tree. It was such a tiny seed at the beginning that you could hold it with the ends of your fingers. It was buried in the ground, covered up with the earth like something that had died. Of course the seed did not like it. But it was not afraid. Its heart was swelling. It broke with the great hurt of it. There was earth around it. It was buried; yet it aspired. It was not dead down there under the earth. It breathed and grew. Then one day it had grown so much that it came to the surface of the earth. Once more it broke through with pain. But the sun was bright and warm. And the seed kept on growing. Careless feet trampled on it, making still another hurt. But it straightened itself, waited through the long nights for the blessed sun, and so on until it was as high as a bush.

Constantly there was growing one aspiration upward. Bark came; and the tree swelled outward, always with pain. Growth is always painful. Some one cut off the lower branches; the tree bled, yet kept on. Other branches grew thick about it. But through the dense growth the tree climbed, always upward. In the sun, above the thick shade, it could then laugh at its ache and the thorns.

And so, upward, always upward, till it was lifted high above its fellows. Birds came there to sing, to build their nests, to rear their young, to mourn when one little bird fell out from the nest and died. The sun shone fiercely. The tree nearly died in the heat. The storms came, and it was shrouded in ice. It almost died in the cold. The wild winds rocked it and tore off the branches, making it bleed—there must always be pain. The thunders played over its head. The lightnings burned it. And yet its heart lived on. The rain beat upon it; still it lived.

Years went by, each one bringing new hurt. But the tree was made hard and strong. One day there came a man to look at it: all the straight, fine length, and the smooth trunk.

"It will do," he said. And he cut it down. Do you think it did not hurt the tree, after the long years of waiting, to be cut down like that?

Then it fell, crashing heavily through the branches, to the ground. There is always pain, even at the end. Then, more cutting, more bleeding, more heat, more cold. Fine tools were used—steel knives that tear and split the fibres apart. More sun, more cold, still more, cutting tearing, and throwing aside. Then one day the thing for which that tree was made came. The thing was finished. It is a glorious Cremona violin—all the strength, all the beauty, all the pain, made into a violin!

But that is not the end. God is working with musicians as well as with their instruments. And yet they do not know, many times, any more than does the instrument, that it is for their best good—their knowledge and their art come to them through pain.

The dear God has made the instruments has in quite the same way that He made the musicians, with the cutting, and the bruises, and the long nights of pain. Musicians have known the storm and all the fury of the winds and rain. Like the tree, they have aspired; they have grown upward; they have done the best they could.

We can give only what we have. If a sorrow is in our hearts, and we have learned the beauty and nobility of it, we can teach others the same thing. We can show them how to rise above it, like the tree that had had one long lifetime of hurt, and ended in the Cremona violin to help all who hear. They who play the instrument must be made in the same way, of the same influences—the cutting, the night and the cold. Nothing good ever comes from softness; for one must always fight.

Nothing in the whole world is free but the sun, and the fresh air, and the water to drink. We must pay a fair price for all else.

Sometimes, when we have been discouraged, we are very hungry for some one to understand us—some one to laugh with us, to touch our tired eyes, to make us forget.

But all the time we understand that on the heights we must go alone, for a time at least, with the thunders, and the lightnings, and the storms.

To be a true Christian, one must not be afraid of life. We must welcome it to its utmost cross. We must take the cold, the heat, the poverty, the hunger, the burning way through the desert, the snow-clad steeps, the keen hurt and the happiness—it is all one; for it gives knowledge. We must know all the pain of the world, face to face, if we are to help those who bear it. Keen feelings give us great pain; but also, in payment, great joy. The balance swings true.

My Master.

My Master was so very poor,
  A manger was His cradling place;
So very rich My Master was Kings came from far
  To gain His grace.

My Master was so very poor,
  And with the poor He brake the bread.
So very rich my Master was
That multitudes
  By Him were fed.

My Master was so very poor
  They nailed Him naked to a cross;
So very rich my Master was
He gave His all
  And knew no loss.

—Harry Lee.

The Doctor and the Turkey.

All through November, in far-off Aintab, the Near East Relief turkey fattened himself for the doctor's Thanksgiving dinner. It was not an easy thing to do, for there was a great deal of fighting in the neighborhood and he was kept busy dodging bullets as he searched around town for his food. But he kept his turkey wits about him and refused to grow thin with worry or prematurely dead with bullets, and when Thanksgiving Day dawned he presented himself, plump and juicy, for the feast.

At dinner-time he was ready, in all his brown glory. Not so the doctor. The doctor was in the next room, fishing for bullets that had been more successful in finding out men than turkeys. The doctor was having a hard time of it. He had very little equipment with which to work. Especially had he no X-ray machine. There were twenty-five sorely wounded men to be made comfortable and there was no X-ray machine with which to locate their fractures and their bullets. The doctor could not keep his appointment with the turkey. The turkey grew cold. The doctor probed and swabbed and bandaged. The turkey grew colder. At last, when it came to be ten-thirty at night, and the turkey was quite, quite cold, the tired doctor located his last bullet and dressed his last wound. Then, and then only, could he go and have his turkey, the turkey that grew cold waiting for him because he had to work so slowly with no X-ray machine to help him.

Many of the doctor's days are like his Thanksgiving Day, as they are with other relief doctors. With what they have, how they labor! Neither turkeys, fat and crisp upon the Thanksgiving table, nor any other counted pleasure, can win them from their jobs until the last smallest service is performed.—The New Near East.

How Some Christians Give.

In the matter of individual giving the most striking instances of sacrifice come from the newly converted heathen, giving out of their deep poverty. Eighty per cent. of the work of the Korean churches is already self-supporting. Hundreds of Korean leaders and lay preachers serve without remuneration.

Dr. George Heber Jones reports that "Korean men have been known to mortgage their own houses that mortgages might be removed from God's house; to sell their crops of good millet intended for family consumption, purchasing inferior millet to live on during the winter, and giving the difference in price to the support of workers among their own countrymen. And thousands of them last year gave from one week to one month each to the work of proclaiming the gospel to neighboring and distant communities."

A story is told of an Indian who one day asked Bishop Whipple to give him two one-dollar bills for a two-dollar note. The Bishop asked, "Why?" He said: "One dollar for me to give to Jesus, and one dollar for my wife to give. The Bishop asked him if it was all the money he had. He said, "Yes." The Bishop was about to tell him, "It is too much," when an Indian clergyman who was standing by whispered, "It might be too much for a white man to give, but not too much for an Indian who has this year heard for the first time of the love of Jesus."

In a mission station in China a man appeared recently bending under the burden of a large sack. A wrinkled hand stretched from the mouth of the sack held out to the missionary a small string of cash. The man's aged mother had so coveted this joy of bringing her collection to the mission with her own hands that he had brought her in a sack, the only vehicle he could afford. The happy face of the old woman was touching to behold when it was learned that the offering was cheerfully given from poverty so severe that she was compelled to mix earth with her scanty food that it might seem to go farther in satisfying the craving of hunger.—Exchange.

Questions.

I ask not, "Was He Son of God
  Who died on Calvary?"
But, "Was it all in vain He trod
  The way of death for me?

I ask not, "Was it truth He spake,
  The very words of light?"
But, "Am I to that truth awake,
  Or sleeping still in night?"

I ask not, "Shall the Lord Christ reign
  As King of all, for aye?"
But, "Do I to His will attain
  In the life I live to-day?"

—Thomas Curtis Clark.

His Way.

I always keep pasted up in my surgery, where sometimes the continuous stream of patients coming to see the doctor calls for more sympathy than I have to give, and is apt to make one irritable and useless because unsympathetic, these old words:

"He did kind things so kindly—
  It seemed His heart's delight
To make poor people happy
  From morning until night."

Any time I happen to look up it is a clarion call to me that, if I would find joy, the real way is His way.—Dr. W. T. Grenfell, in the Congregationalist.

The Cause of Manless Pew.

The custom in many churches of substituting the child's attendance at the Sunday school for that of attendance at public worship is one of the chief secrets of the manless pew. The church-going boy is likely to be a church-going man. The Sunday school should be made tributary to church attendance. The teacher should co-operate with the parents to have the young participate in the church services. The pastor should do his part in making the services attractive and introducing features that will draw the children and interest them. A five or ten minutes' sermon to children is a growing custom in many churches, and such sermons generally hold the attention of adults as well as the children. The resourceful minister who keeps before him the vision "of such is the kingdom" will interest the children and at the same time preserve the spirit of worship.—Professor J. M. Barker.

A Ballad of Trees and the Master.

Into the woods my Master went,
Clean, forspent, forspent.
Into the woods my Master came,
Forspent with love and shame.
But the olives they were not blind to Him,
The little gray leaves were kind to Him:
The thorn tree had a mind to Him
When into the woods He came.

Out of the woods my Master went,
And He was well content.
Out of the woods my Master came,
Content with death and shame.
When Death and Shame would woo Him last,
From under the trees they drew Him last:
'Twas on a tree they slew Him—last
When out of the woods He came.

—Sidney Lanier.

It is said that gardeners sometimes, when they would bring a rose to richer flowering, deprive it for a season of light and moisture. Silent and dark it stands, dropping one fading leaf after another, and seeming to go down patiently to death. But when every leaf is dropped, and the plant stands stripped to the uttermost, a new life is even then working in the buds from which shall spring a tender foliage, and a brighter wealth of flowers. So, often in celestial gardening, every leaf of earthly happiness must drop before a new and divine bloom visits the soul. —H. W. Beecher.

Thousands of examples might be adduced of persons who received their first impressions of Christ from the conduct of Christians in dangerous illnesses.—H. Kollock.

For the Young Folks

An Easter Song.

A song of sunshine through the rain,
Of spring across the snow,
A balm to heal the hurts of pain,
A peace surpassed woe.
Lift up your heads, ye sorrowing ones,
And be ye glad of heart,
For Calvary and Easter Day,
Earth's saddest day and gladdest day,
Were just one day apart!

With shudder of despair and loss
The world's deep heart was wrung,
As lifted high upon His cross
The Lord of glory hung.
When rocks were rent, and ghostly forms
Stole forth in street and mart—
But Calvary and Easter Day,
Earth's blackest day and whitest day,
Were just one day apart!

No hint or whisper stirred the air
To tell what joy should be,
The sad disciple grieving there,
No help nor hope could see.
Yet all the while the glad, near sun
Made ready its swift dart,
And Calvary and Easter Day,
The darkest day and brightest day,
Were just one day apart!

O, when the strife of tongues is loud,
And the heart of hope beats low,
When the prophets prophesy of ill,
And the mourners come and go,
In this sure thought let us abide,
And keep and stay our heart,
That Calvary and Easter Day,
Earth's heaviest day and happiest day,
Were but one day apart!

—Susan Coolidge.

For the Southern Churchman.

The Golden Sacrifice.

E. M. Sollenberger.

A special delivery letter had summoned mother away for the day to see a sick relative. Frederick, convalescing from a cold, up and dressed, was charged to stay as much as possible in the warm living-room—certainly not to go outdoors. He liked this last getting well day at home. There were many things he felt like looking over—his stamps, the Book of Knowledge, and some favorite photograph records. Maybe later he would get at that composition, "The School Boy's Creed." Boys would be dropping in about three to tell the school news and to give him his lessons for tomorrow. Time need not drag.

Mother's call as she went downstairs, "Please give Dickie seed and his bath," suggested the attractive idea of setting the little prisoner free for a few hours. When he put in the tiny tub he left the door of the cage open and sat down quietly some distance away to watch.

Dickie, accustomed to this occasional privilege, gave an indifferent, side-long glance at the way to liberty, and proceeded to follow his regular routine. He perched on the side of his tub and dipped his bill several times in the water before taking the plunge. After splashing to his heart's content he mounted a perch in the sun, shook and fluffed himself out, descended, helped himself to the fresh seed, scattering a good deal about in search for coveted hemp, trilled a few notes and then, like a gentleman of leisure, who after his bath and breakfast decides to take a stroll, he made deliberate hops out of the open door to the little brass piazza surrounding the cage. Presently he stretched his wings and flew across the room to the book-case. He answered Fred's whistled notes like an echo. After a time he approached his cage by way of the clock, the drop-light and backs of chairs to the rather low window-sill. At this moment Fred's attention was turned to an insistent scratching at the door. It was Pete, the fox terrier, just escaped from his quarters in the basement. At the turning of the knob he bounded in, giving Fred his usual ecstatic morning greeting of yelps and lickings. Then he began looking around for something to worry, puppy fashion. Suddenly his body stiffened. His eyes glistened. There was a leap and the snapping of jaws. Fred gave a blow that sent the dog half way across the room, but Dickie lay motionless on the floor.

Fred lifted up tenderly the little heap of gold and put it in the cage.

He went after Pete, cowering in a corner, feeling guilty and ashamed of he knew not what; and holding him by the back of his neck, carried him down and thrust him in the cellar.

It was only half-past ten—hours and hours before mother would be home. How was he going to get through the day with Dickie lying there dead? Somehow he knew the very words she would say: "My dear boy, why did you let Pete into the room? You know it is the nature of dogs to kill birds." And he would have to answer, "I did not think." How many, many times that had been his excuse. Remorse began to mingle with his grief.

His great fault—carelessness—that he had regarded so lightly, took all at once a fearful and tragic shape—seemed to be embodied in that little yellow form in the bottom of the cage. It was lying there summoning a cloud of witnesses to judge him. The purse he had lost because it was not pushed securely down in his pocket; the tools for his bicycle that he could never find because he did not put them back in the case; his sweater, that some one had taken pains to knit, left in the woods; his fountain pen, broken, because he sat on his coat; his books left in the yard, that the puppy tore to pieces; the electric apparatus that would not work because of missing parts; his scout knife, lost, he could not remember where; his shirts and collars left for mother to gather up; his unbrushed teeth that made expensive and painful filling at the dentist's; he had not dreamed there were so many. He wanted to put them out of his mind. He got out his stamp-book, but the new packet with the Czecho-Slovakia stamps, that he had gotten ahead of the other boys, possessed no charm. He tried to read, but the persistent and increasing procession of carelessnesses obtruded itself across the page. The boys who came with his lessons soon sought more exciting companionship on the street.

To play the Victrola was out of the question. Dickie always piped up at the first sound. He thought of finding a box and burying the little body, but he had been told not to go outdoors, and also it seemed impossible to put anything into the ground that had been so warm and alive so short a time before. All because he had not stopped to think Dickie had paid for his thoughtlessness. Paid for—that meant sacrifice. The word brought to his mind One who had died through the thoughtlessness of many people and by His death their eyes—the eyes of the world—had been opened. The story had been hardly more than impressive words to him, and it had been before him very often lately in his confirmation lessons. He was almost afraid to let the thought go on, and yet it was true that by a little bird's dying he was understanding something of what the Great Sacrifice meant. A feeling of awe came over him. Truly it was going to make him—oh! he hoped it was going to make him remember the important little things of every day. He wanted to tell his mother, and at last, there was her step in the hall.

The Stork That Lived On the Housetop.

Hulda was a little Dutch girl who lived in Holland in one of the queer peaked houses along the canals. She wore a white cap over her flaxen hair and wooden shoes on her small feet. She loved her home and her parents were kind to her, but the thing she wanted most they could not give to her.

In Holland it is considered good luck to have a stork build its nest on your roof. Hulda's grandmother had a nest on her house. It had been there for many years and was several feet high. The old lady was very proud of it and would not let any one disturb it, even when the birds had left it for the winter.

Grandmother had often told the little girl how a stork built the nest on the roof of her house the day Hulda's mother was born. How, year after year, it had been occupied by some member of the same family. And that each year the birds had made an addition to the family home, until it was the largest nest in Holland.

Hulda had been up on the roof through the trap door to see the wonderful bundle of sticks, reeds and grass. She had peeped inside, where she saw a hollow place in which were four white eggs tinged with buff. Mother Stork was standing on one leg beside it, but she was very tame and didn't mind the little girl looking at her cradle.

One day when Hulda was looking very unhappy because there was no stork nest on their roof, the father smiled and said, "I saw two storks house-hunting as I came in. I think I'll put up a house to let to the young couple."

"Father, how can you?" Hulda asked.

"I am going to nail a cart wheel to the roof. It will make a fine place to build on. They like a good foundation."

After the wheel had been fastened to the roof Hulda saw two beautiful white birds with red legs, feet and bills, flying over the house. One looked down the chimney, then made a queer, snapping sound with its beak, which brought its mate. The chimney didn't suit them, for they soon flew upward. Then all of a sudden the birds dropped down on the wheel, examined it carefully, and decided that it was a nice place to begin housekeeping. Hulda was delighted when she saw them fly away and return with a load of twigs and reeds, which they placed on the wheel. She ran around the house crying, "Father, father, the storks are moving in. I am so happy!"

"Where are your shoes?" father asked.

Hulda looked down at her feet. She had lost both her wooden shoes as she ran to tell her father the good news which she had heard.

"I wish I had red shoes and stockings, like the storks," the little girl said. "My shoes are always dropping off my feet."

Hulda was very proud of her family of storks. Sometimes she would climb the ladder to the trap-door and watch them at work or eating their lunch. She thought they looked very funny when they took a nap standing on one leg, with their long neck doubled back so that their head rested on the shoulder.

When the babies came they were awkward little things, all legs and neck. They remained in the cradle until they changed their downy coat for one of feathers, and were strong enough to fly downward. They are taught to look for fish and frogs and eels before they take any long flights upward.

One day Hulda went with her mother to the market to buy fish, and there she saw her storks walking along the street. Mother bought some small fish, and Hulda fed them to her "family," as she called the birds. They were not at all afraid and followed the little girl up the street until they came to her house, when they flew up to the roof.

"Our storks know me," she said to her father as he stood watching them follow his little daughter. "They are the finest ones around here. They have such beautiful brown eyes with a black skin around them, and they are so good-natured. I never heard them quarreling."

"They can't quarrel with their tongues," father said with a twinkle in his eye. Mother Stork can't scold Father Stork when he goes to sleep instead of watching the children."

"Why not father?"

"I thought all Dutch children knew that storks are dumb. They can't sing or make any sound except by snapping the long, horny bills together," he explained.

"Where do the storks go in winter?" Hulda asked.

"They live in Africa in winter, returning to Europe in the spring. They come and go in great flocks, choosing the night to travel. They are good parents, sacrificing their life for the young ones if necessary.

"I am going to watch them closely," the little girl said. "Perhaps I can learn some things about them that are not yet known."

"Did you know that they can be trained to do many tricks that a dog can do?"

Hulda opened her eyes wide.

"I have seen them jump through hoops, walk a tight-rope, climb up a ladder, and pretend to be dead."

"May I have a baby to train?" she begged.

"No. Let them live their life," he answered, and Hulda thought her father was right.—Evangeline Weir, in Presbyterian.

In the Land o' Dreams.

Where do I go in the Land o' Dreams?
Why, mother, dear, don't you know?
I follow the trail of the white moon-beams
Straight to the sunrise glow.

And all night long o'er that starry way
With the friends from my little book,
I sing, and dance, and laugh, and play,
With never a backward look.
—Grace Howell Cordell, in the Christian Register.

When the Figs Blossomed.

"We've come to stay a long time, grandfather," sang Marian, running out on the porch of the ranch-house the morning after her arrival.

"Are you going to stay in California until the figs blossom?" her grandfather inquired.

"My, yes, I guess so," Marian answered. "It's two weeks before Christmas yet and we are going to stay till after Fourth of July. When do the figs blossom?"

Grandfather's eyes twinkled. "Watch close and maybe you will find out," was his reply.

Marian ran into the back yard at once, to look at the big fig tree beyond the steps. Its smooth gray limbs were bare and there were dry leaves on the ground beneath it. The grass was green and the rose-bushes were full of buds, so that except for the fig tree it looked like spring instead of winter.

Marian kept watch of the fig tree, but week after week went past and it showed no sign of life. When February came the peach trees blossomed pink, but still nothing happened to the fig tree. Finally little green buds appeared, that looked as if they might be fig leaves by and by.

Just after that there was a hard rain and Marian could not go out for two days. The morning of the third day the sun shone and grandfather called to her, "Come quickly, Marian, and look at the fig tree."

What do you think? The limbs were covered with tiny green figs, half as big as the end of Marian's thumb.

Grandfather laughed at Marian's amazement. Then he cut one of the little figs in half and showed her the wee white blossoms on the inside.

"Do they always do that way?" asked Marian.

"Always," laughed her grandfather. "One never sees the blossoms."—Annie Louise Berray, in the Mayflower.

The Little Hand of Tony Crawfish.

When Jim Snail met Tony Crawfish for the first time he thought he was the most unusual fellow he had ever

The South's Best Book Store

HUNTER & CO

105 E. Broad Street

Richmond, Va.

Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen

Prompt and Reliable Service

Spring Styles

NOW READY

Have Your Old Hat Fixed Like New

Many customers use their old hats by having them made over for their children. We specialize on children's hats.

PARCEL POST DEPARTMENT AT YOUR SERVICE.

VERRA HAT WORKS

211 NORTH FIRST STREET

RANDOLPH 90

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS

FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG

S. T. Beveridge & Co.

Office: 1217 East Cary Street

Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd

Richmond, Va.

"The Store that Pleases"

FOR FURNITURE

Jones Bros. & Co.

Incorporated

1418-20 E. Main St., Richmond, Va

Jno. L. Williams & Sons

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565)

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds.

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson

Security Storage Company, Inc.

Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage

Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

NAVAJO SANITARIUM

"In the Land of Waterfalls"

2250 Feet Above Sea Level

Conducted by

Thomas J. Summey, M. D.

Brevard, N. C.

A private hospital for mild nervous and mental cases, chronic heart and kidney diseases and general debility.

On strictly ethical lines. Equipped to care for a limited number of patients. In town and mountains.

Strict attention given to dietetics.

Leake Printing Co.
ENGRAVING, PRINTING, EMBOSSING.
Special attention to out-of-town orders
Samples sent upon request.
615 East Main Street, Richmond, Va

Sacramental Wine
Absolutely Pure Grape Wine
Made expressly for use at the Communion Table
Established 1857
Phone, Write or Call
Tel. Cortlandt 3001
H.T. Dewey & Sons Co.
Address Either
138 Fulton Street, New York City
or Cellars, Egg Harbor, New Jersey

R. L. Christian & Company
514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.
Leading Fancy Grocer
AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES
Special attention given to out-of-tow orders.
Catalogue mailed on application.

WANTED Commission Agents And Dealers
To sell Nursery Stock—all kinds of fruit trees, ornamentals and plants. Beautiful illustrations supplied with full information on growing trees and plants. Two propositions offered. Commission agreement and confidential terms to dealers. Big profits. Only TRUSTWORTHY men need apply. Write today.
THE HOWARD-HICKORY CO.,
Box 584, Hickory, N. C.

The Wing-Foot Electric Shoe Repair Shop
ALL KINDS OF GENERAL REPAIRING
Mail Orders a Specialty
Owned and Managed by T. A. BUNNELL
311 N. Second St. Phone Ran. 1286-W

NICK BULL'S MARKET,
Richmond's Leading Dealer in
FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME
312 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.
Phone Randolph 1680
WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

seen. For Tony had one very large hand and one very small one.

"If you'll pardon a personal question," said Jim, as the two met on the bank of the creek while each was taking an afternoon stroll, "why is one of your hands so small and the other so large?"

"If you'll sit down a moment I'll tell you all about it," replied Tony, who seemed not in the least sensitive about his hands.

So the two sat down in the shade of a big cottonwood tree and Tony began:

"One day last year I happened to meet Mr. Turtle in the creek. I tried to get away from him as fast as I could, for, as you may know, Mr. Turtle is an enemy to our family and eats every one of us he can catch. Well. I kept my eyes on Mr. Turtle and backed away from him as fast as I could.

"But he had made a dash for me upon meeting me, and he came so fast that I couldn't get away. Fortunately, however, he didn't get my whole body into his mouth, as he had intended. If he had, I wouldn't be here to tell you about it."

"I suppose not,' 'agreed Jim Snail, nodding the big hat on his tiny head. "But what does all that have to do with your hands?"

"That's the rest of the story," Tony went on. "Mr. Turtle caught one of my large arms in his mouth, and, to keep him from taking me, too, I let loose my arm from my body and backed off under a flat rock, where he couldn't get me."

"Then you had no hand at all?" asked Jim Snail, quite shocked.

"Not on one side. It hurt for a while —that shoulder! But it was better than losing my life. Indeed, I was glad to get off so easily."

"I know now," nodded Jim Snail. "You got a false hand to take the place of your lost one, didn't you?"

Tony Crawfish smiled. "No, I just went on about my business, using my other large hand. I had a good deal of trouble holding my food with only one hand, too. But I soon got used to it. And by the time I went to sleep that winter I had almost forgotten I had lost a hand."

"But your little hand, Mr. Crawfish! Where did it come from?" Jim Snail, slow as he was, was actually getting impatient to know about it.

"The next spring, when I came out into the water from the mud in the bottom of the creek, I had a new hand," replied Tony Crawfish. "I began to use it and it grew larger and larger. I suppose some of these days it will be almost as large as my big hand."

"How wonderful!" breathed Jim Snail. Then he slowly arose from his seat, thanked Tony for telling him the story, and moved along toward home. Whereupon, Tony Crawfish backed off the bank into the water.—Presbyterian Banner.

A "good woman," very self-centered, gave up a large Bible class—and she was gifted as a teacher and could grip girls between fourteen and seventeen—because she was not willing to change her dinner hour on Sunday. And the class was scattered and her influence for good over the girls was destroyed, while their faith in good people received a shock.

It seems to me it is the same with love and happiness as it is with sorrow—the more we know of it, the better we can feel what other people's lives are, or might be, and so we shall only be more tender to them and wish to help them.—George Eliot.

Reliance
"Perfect Protection"
Continuous Income Means
$50 per week, for 52 weeks, while confined by sickness.
$50 per week, for 104 weeks, while disabled by accident.
$100 per month, for life, is totally and permanently disabled, by either accident or disease. No further premiums to pay in event of disability. No deductions from face of policy to offset indemnity received unde this lause.
$50 per month to your beneficiary, for life—commencing immediately after your death, and $10,000 to your estate, or whomever you may designate, payable immediat ly upon death of above mentioned beneficiary.
$10,000 to your beneficiary in addition to all of above benefits in event your death results from accident.
H. S. RAWLINGS, General Agent
511 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.
Can You Afford to Deny Yourself Such Protection?

R. Geissler, Inc.
56 West Eighth Street, New York
Memorials
FOR THE CHURCH
Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

To abort a cold and prevent complications take
Calotabs
The purified and refined calomel tablets that are nauseless, safe and sure.
Medicinal virtues retained and improved. Sold only in sealed packages. Price 35c.

Let Cuticura Be Your Beauty Doctor
Soap, Ointment, Talcum, 25c. everywhere. For samples address: Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. V, Malden, Mass.

Do all you can find to do for the Lord at home, and you will soon be interested in sending the gospel to "every creature," "in all the world."

Every sickness is a little death. I will be content to die oft, that I may die once well.—Bishop Joseph Hall.

If you want to find a pleasure greater than making money, try giving some of it away.—Ex.

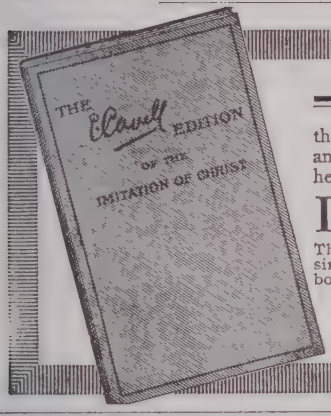
Earnest Christians are comforters of other hearts, guides to the perplexed, defenders of the weak and weary, and towers of strength to those who are hard pressed by the foe in the warfare of life.

"It is the business of a child of God to add to the aggregate wealth of the world by a thrifty productiveness, and then the rich people can take care of God's poor."

Hold Up Your Corner and Help Bring Israel to Christ

MARK 2:3

The late war gave a tremendous impetus to Prophetic Bible Study. Three-fourths of prophecy concerns itself with the Jews. Every Christian ought to know that God's purposes are uniquely bound up with this nation. No lasting world peace, no solution of all the complex problems of the world until the Jewish problem is solved first.



The New Covenant Mission to the Jews, Pittsburgh, Pa., is seeking to solve this, the greatest problem in Christian work. Our appeal to Christians is to help hold up the corners of our ten active departments at our headquarters in Pittsburgh and elsewhere by prayer, sacrifice, and free-will offerings.

Our magazine, the "Glory of Israel," is a 32-page bi-monthly of recognized merit. Sent free to our contributors. Make checks payable to

THE NEW COVENANT MISSION

Reed and Crawford Streets, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Rev. Maurice Ruben, Gen. Supt. Rev. E. M. McFadden, D. D., Sec'y-Treas

Edith Cavell

the martyred nurse, while in her Belgian prison, and to the day of her death, read and marked with her innermost thoughts, her copy of A'Kempis'

Imitation of Christ

The Oxford University Press has just issued a facsimile edition with all her markings. It is beautifully bound in red sultan, Venetian morocco, with gilt top.

Price $1.75

At all Booksellers, or the Publishers

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS AMERICAN BRANCH
35 West 32d Street, New York

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.

Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor

Richmond, Va.

Vapo Cresolene — Used for more than forty years. The benefit derived from it is unquestionable.

Established 1879

FOR more than a generation we have been receiving grateful testimony to the virtues of this thoroughly tested and proven treatment. It stops violent coughing, and difficult breathing, assuring restful sleep because the antiseptic vapor carries healing with every breath. Booklet 43 tells why the diseases for which Cresolene is recommended yield to this simple and dependable treatment.

Vapo-Cresolene is sold by druggists

VAPO-CRESOLENE CO., 62 Cortlandt St., New York

Johnson's Foot Soap

(On market for over fifty years)

Made of Borax, Iodine and Bran, is a sure and safe relief for those tired, aching, tender, swollen, burning that have been causing you so much pain. 25c, ALL DRUGGISTS. If unobtainable at your druggist, sent direct on receipt of price.

FEET

Thomas Gill Soap Co.

711-719 Kent Ave., Brooklyn, New York.

SONG BOOKS FAMILIAR SONGS OF THE GOSPEL

83 Songs, words and music, 12c each in lots of 100. Less quantities, 15c each. Sample copies, 25c each.

161 Songs, words and music, 18c each in lots of 100. Less quantities, 20c each. Sample copies, 25c each.

Round notes only. We do not pay express charges on quantities of 50 or more. The songs we know and love to sing. This is the cheapest and best book one the market to-day.

E. A. HACKETT, Publisher
Fort Wayne, Ind.

Stevens Anti-Amebic Dentifrice

For Prevention and Treatment of

PYORRHOEA OR RIGG'S DISEASE

Guaranteed to contain 3% fluid extract of Ipecac

Price, 50c per tube, postage paid

STEVENS MEDICAL MFG. CO.

717 Kent Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

STO VINK

is a patented compound that turns black when heated very hot. One application will keep red or grey stove lids black a month. Ask your storekeeper for it.

JOHNSON'S LABORATORY

Worcester, Mass., makes STO VINK

Barlow's Indigo Blue will not Spot or Streak Clothes

In use for fifty years is proof that it is the best. All grocers sell it

FREE SAMPLES MAILED

ADAM PFROMM & CO.

233 N. Second St., Philadelphia

What a Dime Will bring You From the Nation's Capital

The little matter of 10 cts. will bring you the Pathfinder eight weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for all the Nation; an independent home paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth; now in its 28th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, strongly, briefly—here it is. Send 10c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation eight weeks. The 10c does not repay us, but we are glad to invest in new friends. Address:

Washington has become the World's Capital and reading the Pathfinder is like sitting in the inner council with those who mold the world's destiny.

THE PATHFINDER, 400S Langdon Sta., Washington, D. C.

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

FAMINE RELIEF.

For the convenience of our readers we publish the addresses of the treasurers of the various Relief Funds whose appeals for the starving, and especially for starving children, are so urgent and touching. The Southern Churchman will forward contributions to any of these, but to save time, postage and possibility of miscarriage, checks would better be sent directly to the treasurers as below:

Near East Relief (formerly "Armenian and Syrian Relief")—Cleaveland H. Dodge, No. 1 Madison Ave., New York City.

European Relief (Central and Eastern Europe)—Franklin K. Lane, 42 Broadway, New York City; or locally for Virginia, DeSoto Fitzgerald, 218 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.

Chinese Famine Relief—Remit through Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer, Presiding Bishop and Council, 281 Fourth Ave., New York City.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

We acknowledge the following additional contributions to the fund for the relief of the sufferers from famine in China:

Mrs. E. V. Jones, Williamsburg, Va..$20.00
Mrs. K. A. Leigh, Columbia, Va..... 10.00

PIPE ORGANS

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID in building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

DON'T TRY ON YOUR NEW DRESSES over your old corset. Let us help you select and fit to you the corset that does greatest justice to your figure. The Corset Shop, 317 N. Fifth St. Mrs. A. J. Pyle, Prop. Phone Ran. 3397.

Doll Skirts Accordion Pleated Free. ASHBY B. PYLE, 315 N. 5th St. Hemstitching, Pinking and Button Covering.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER

Invites you to inspect her line of GAGE Tailored HATS. Also the ADVANCE Showing of Spring Hats in the most attractive shapes.
209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

STAR CLEANING CO.

Richmond, Va., Cleaning, Pressing, Dyeing and Repairing. Prices reasonable; workmanship the best. Special attention given parcel post orders.

NIAGARA METAL WEATHER STRIPS Saves 25 per cent. Fuel, Prevents Rattling Windows, keeps out Dust, Dirt and Storm.
CINCINNATI REWIRABLE METAL AND WOOD FRAME SCREENS.
L. F. HEROLD,
2 N. 11th St., Richmond, Va.
Phone Randolph 3550.

SEEDS AND CARDS

25 POST CARDS, and FIVE 10-cent Packages Garden Seeeds, 25 cents, postpaid; 100 Post Cards, twenty 10-cent Packages Garden Seeds, Atlas New Europe, $1.00, postpaid. Address HOWARD SEED HOUSE, Windfall, Indiana.

I take this method of thanking my many clients for their past patronage, and assure them I am still selling Spirella corsets, and can be reached at the Wallerstein, Apartment 202, or by phone, Randolph 3694-W. MISS MYRTLE McDONNELL.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

MALE ..GRADUATE, ..EXPERIENCED teacher, piano, voice, expression, desires location in town where such is needed. Correspondence solicited. Warm, dry climate. Choirmaster-organist. Address "Coterie," Southern Churchman.

HOME STUDY—SPECIAL RATES. Normal, Grammar School, High School, Civil Service, Engineering, Agricultural, English, Bookkeeping, Shorthand, Typewriting, Journalism, Bible, Salesmanship, and Law Courses thoroughly taught by mail. For special rates, apply CARNEGIE COLLEGE, Rogers, Ohio.

TYPEWRITERS delivered free by parcel post. All makes rented or sold on monthly payments. Prices $40.00 and up. Home Study Course in Typewriting Free of Tuition. Learn typewriting during your spare time. Address CARNEGIE COLLEGE, Rogers, Ohio.

HELP WANTED

YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCATION AND refinement wanted to enter the St. John's Hospital Training School for Nurses (Episcopal), Brooklyn, N. Y. Applicants required to have one year of high school or its equivalent. Course three years. A registered school of high standing. Nurses receive remuneration. Many social privileges. Home life pleasant. Graduates are now receiving $6.00 per day. Apply to St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED FOR 1921-22 AS MASTER IN the Grammer Department of a Church school, an unmarried man with teaching and playground experience. Apply St Albans School, Washington, D. C.

WANTED—BY AMIABLE AND REFINED young lady, position as companion and nurse for invalid or semi-invalid. References exchanged. Address Miss M. B. F., care Southern Churchman.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published

Bolling: Entered into rest March 10th, 1921, SALLY AYLETT, widow of Thomas Bolling, Jr., and daughter of Patrick Henry and Emily Rutherfoord Aylett.

"Death is but the servant Jesus Christ sends to call us to His arms."

Clarkson: Entered into life eternal from the home of her son, Charles D. S. Clarkson, at Haymarket, Va., on March 7th, 1921, JEANNIE SAYRS CLARKSON, wife of the late Dr. Henry Mazyck Clarkson, in the eightieth year of her age.

Githins: Died suddenly of heart disease early in February at Mukwonago, Wisconsin, JOHN NICKOLS GITHINS, of Alma, Michigan, the husband of Elizabeth Barr Githins, father of Katherine Beverley and Elizabeth Sinclair Githins, and son-in-law of the Rev. David Barr, of Washington, D. C.

RESOLUTIONS.

February 7th, 1921.

Whereas, it has pleased our Heavenly Father to remove from our midst our esteemed and beloved friend and associate, MR. H. C. WALKER, senior warden of this vestry, whose death occurred on January 17th, and

Whereas, the vestry desires to place on record an expression of the profound sorrow we feel on this sad occasion and our estimate of his worth and character and the love and esteem we cherish for his memory.

Therefore be it resolved, That in the death of Henry Clay Walker the vestry and parish have sustained a severe loss and while we bow submissively to the Divine will that has called him to rest, still we cannot but feel keenly the sorrow and regret occasioned by his death.

Mr. Walker was for thirty years a faithful member of this vestry, serving as both junior and senior warden, and enjoyed to the highest degree the esteem and confidence of his fellow-vestrymen;

Conscientious and conservative in his views, he was ever ready with voice and hand to promote the best interests of the Church he loved so well.

Wise in counsel, kind and gentle in manner, quick to relieve the distress and sooth the sorrows of others, faithful in the performance of any duties developing upon him in connection with the work of the Church and Parish a true Christian spirit has been called away and we mourn his loss.

Resolved, That we extend to his stricken family our profound sympathy in this their hour of trial and anguish, and commend them to the protection of Him who doeth all things well;

Resolved, further, That these resolutions be spread upon the records of the vestry and that a copy be sent to the bereaved family and that they be published in the Portsmouth Star and Southern Churchman.

VESTRY OF TRINITY CHURCH.
By KEMP PLUMMER, Registrar.

IN MEMORIAM.

Occasionally we hear of the passing away of one whose vitality, cheerfulness and forceful personality has been so marked that it is difficult to realize that the life has gone. It is so in the death of Miss Maria Lawson Bolton. After an illness of but three days the end came on Wednesday, February the 16th, at the residence of her nephew, the Reverend Meade Bolton MacBryde, in Washington, D. C.

Miss Bolton was the daughter of the late Dr. James Bolton, of Richmond, Va., and the sister of the late Mrs. John M. MacBryde, of Blacksburg, Va., where until the late fall she had made her home.

It would be utterly impossible to estimate in a few words the value of such a life. Some things are far too great to measure. To a natural charm of manner, and wonderful sweetness of disposition, was added the quality of absolute unselfishness. Her life from beginning to end was lived for others. For her Church, for those she loved, for the whole community in which she lived, she labored with unfailing interest and devotion—self was always and forever last.

So complete was her self-effacement that when one thinks of her there comes the fragrance of the self-concealing violet—a fitting symbol of the hidden beauty of her life.

Amid a profusion of exquisite flowers the burial office was read in Grace Church, Washington, by her devoted nephew, who also said the committal at Hollywood on the morning of the following day.

The golden evening brightens in the West,
Soon, soon to faithful warriors cometh rest,
Sweet is the calm of Paradise, the blest, Allehuia!

Opportunity.

Said yesterday to to-morrow:
"When I was young like you,
I, too, was fond of boasting
Of all I meant to do.
But while I fell a-dreaming
Along the pleasant way,
Before I scarcely knew it
I found I was to-day!

"And as to-day, so quickly
My little course was run,
I had not time to finish
One-half the things begun.
Would I could try it over,
But I can ne'er go back;
A yesterday forever
I now must be, alack!

"And so, my good to-morrow,
If you would make a name
That history shall cherish
Upon its roll of fame,
Be all prepared and ready
Your noblest part to play
In those few fleeting hours
When you shall be 'to-day!'"

—Pacific.

Do not be troubled because you have not great virtues. God made a million spears of grass where He made one tree. The earth is fringed and carpeted not with forests, but with grasses. Only have enough of little virtues and common fidelities, and you need not mourn because you are neither a hero nor a saint.—Henry Ward Beecher.

The dire need of more men for the ministry is beginning to be recognized. How to get the man is plainly set forth by the "Lord of the harvest"—"Pray ye that He would send forth laborers into His harvest." Are you persistently making this petition? Are you eager for your sons to be "sent"? Are you giving them such training as will fit them to be efficient "laborers," so far as you are able? Do you realize the need? Do you urge young men and women to inform themselves, to ask themselves, where the Lord desires them to work for Him and for soul-winning?

I have no stones to throw at atheism any more than I have stones to throw at blindness. It can never be more than a very sore and sad limitation; not an institution, but a destitution.—Robert Collyer.

Be not anxious about tomorrow. Do today's duty, fight today's temptation, and do not weaken and distract yourself by looking forward to things which you cannot see, and could not understand if you saw them.—Charles Kingsley.

The body is the "temple of the Holy Ghost." We desecrate this temple when we break the laws of health given in the Bible.

JOHN M. DOYLE
MEMORIAL TABLETS
14 S. THIRD ST. PHILADELPHIA
CATALOGUE ON REQUEST

JUST READY

More "FIVE-MINUTE TALKS"

By Walter R. Bowie, D.D.

SUNNY WINDOWS

Author of "The Children's Year"

AND OTHER SERMONS

Here is another volume of Dr. Bowie's talks to youngsters, all attractively suited to the child mind. The subjects are arresting themes, calculated to almost invariably catch the attention of boy or girl—while the treatment thereof is simplicity itself.

As the Record of Christian Work said: "Dr. Bowie's talks are capital—straight to the hearts of children, clever, interesting, helpful."

Cloth, $1.25 net

For Sale by

Southern Churchman Co., Richmond, Va.

DEDICATE YOUR MEMORIAL ON DECORATION DAY, MAY 30th

Your church needs a service roll in imperishable bronze to replace the old service flag.

It will be a veritable sermon in bronze, and will carry its message of patriotism to future generations.

Write To-day for Brochure R

FLOUR CITY ORNAMENTAL IRON CO.

27th Ave., South, Minneapolis, Minn.

An Easter Thought

Make Easter this year a red-letter day in the life of someone by the gift of a beautiful Oxford Bible.

Ask to see an

Oxford India Paper Bible

At All Booksellers or from the Publishers
Oxford University Press American Branch
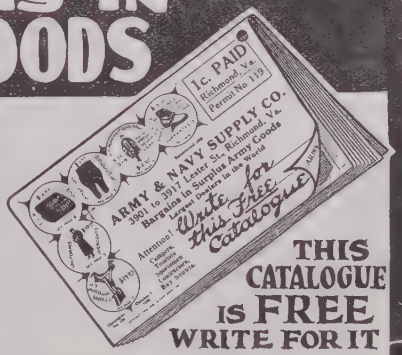
35 West Thirty-second Street New York



BARGAINS IN U.S. ARMY GOODS

Riding Breeches, Shirts, (Khaki or Olive Drab), Boots, Shoes, Overalls, Slickers, Wool or Cotton Socks, Leather Leggings, Wagons, Saddles, etc.

For complete list and prices, write TO-DAY to DEPARTMENT O, Box 1835, Richmond, Virginia.

"If the Army used it, We have it"

THIS CATALOGUE IS FREE WRITE FOR IT

ARMY AND NAVY SUPPLY CO.
RICHMOND, VA.

Through Trials.

Through night to light. And though to mortal eyes
Creations face a pall of horror wear,
Good cheer, good cheer! the gloom of midnight flies;
Then shall a sunrise follow, mild and fair.

Through storm to calm. And though His thunder car
The rumbling tempest, drive through earth and sky,
Good cheer, good cheer! the elemental war
Tells that a blessed healing hour is nigh.

Through frost to spring. And though the biting blast
Of Eurus stiffen Nature's juicy veins,
Good cheer, good cheer! when winter's wrath is past,
Soft murmuring spring breathes sweetly o'er the plains.

Through strife to peace. And though with bristling front
A thousand frightful depths encompass thee,
Good cheer, good cheer! brave thou the battle's brunt
For the peace march and song of victory.

Through sweat to sleep. And though the sultry noon,
With heavy, drooping wing, oppress thee now,
Good cheer, good cheer! soon ends the bitter strife,
And thou shalt reign in peace with Christ at length.

Through woe to joy. And though at morn thou weep,
And though the midnight find thee weeping still,
Good cheer, good cheer! the Shepherd loves His sheep;
Resign thee to the watchful Father's will.

Through death to life. And through this vale of tears,
And through this thistle-field of life ascend
To the great supper in that world whose years
Of bliss unfading, cloudless, know no end.

"The Church needs to learn the power and the joy of endurance. We drop out so easily. The march to victory is not done by automobiles, it is stiff climbing and constant and sometimes long. But the end—oh, the end! We

---

God is Love—and what He wants of us is neither metaphysical theology, nor elaborate ritual, nor ascetic practices, but to love Him our Father in Christ Jesus, and to love for His sake our brother man.—Canon Farrar.

Christ takes away from death its sting by taking away the sin of which it is the shadow. Aside from this we may approach death as a grateful ordinance of nature, not dreading it, not longing for it, but accepting it as God's good way—a step in life.—T. T. Munger.

Prayer.

Surely I need not fear
When Thou, my Lord, art near
With every power in Thy pierced hand;
But let me understand,
Even when stricken ,that Thou holdest me dear.

—Selected.

LEARN MUSIC AT HOME

Don't Be a "Wall Flower"

Piano, Organ, Violin, Cornet, Guitar, Banjo, Mandolin, Harp, 'Cello, Trombone, Flute, Clarinet, Piccolo, Saxophone, Ukelele, Sight Singing, Harmony and Composition, Hawaiian Steel Guitar, Tenor Banjo, Drum and Traps.

No longer need the ability to play be shut out of your life. Just mail coupon or postal to-day for our new Free Book. Let us tell you how you can easily, quickly, thoroughly learn to play your favorite musical instrument by note in your own home, without a teacher by our New Improved Home Study Method. Different, easier than private teacher way—no tiresome, dry exercises—no inconvenience, no trick music, no "numbers," yet simple, wonderful, amazingly easy for a mere child.

SPECIAL OFFER

We want to have ONE PUPIL IN EACH LOCALITY AT ONCE to help advertise our wonderful, easy system of teaching music.

We therefore offer our marvel us lessons and charge only for postage and sheet music. Beginners or advanced pupils. Get all the proof, facts, letters from pupils. AMAZING OFFER and fascinating New Book just issued. ALL FREE! Write postal to-day. Instruments supplied when needed, cash or credit.

U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC
371 Brunswick Bldg., New York

U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC,
371 Brunswick Bldg., New York.

Please send me your free book, "Music Lessons in your own home," and particulars of special offer

Name.....
(Please print name)
Address.....
City.....State.....

EASY, PLEASANT, PROFITABLE

Others Find It So, Why Not You?

Here is your chance. If you have an hour or two a week to spare you can turn every minute of it into money by taking orders for subscriptions to the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN, the oldest Episcopal church paper published in America; endorsed by Bishops and Clergy, and by churchmen everywhere. Every dollar raised by subscription to be devoted to the betterment of the paper.

Liberal commission paid on each order and a generous bonus on your production.

JUST CLIP AND MAIL THIS COUPON

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY,
815 E. Grace Street, Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen: Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....Town.....

Street, or R. F. D.....State.....

The Holy Energy of Love.

Jesus has been called "the pale Galilean," and Christianity has been accused of being negative. It has been said that Jesus taught men to despise the real world and to live in a dream world. The Christian life has been represented as lacking in virility, as consisting in renunciation, and a sort of wallowing in failure and misery. The God of Jesus is not like the supreme being of Brahminism, a being who, as all-inclusive, must be without external environment, and therefore devoid of external activity. The God of Jesus is the eternal Father, the eternal Giver of life, whose nature is to give life and to love. As the shepherd yearns after the lost sheep, so God yearns after the sinner. As a father welcomes the returning prodigal, so God welcomes the repentant sinner. As a woman rejoices over the finding of a lost coin, so there is joy in heaven over the soul that has turned to its God. So, too, the man who has had the vision of God will go back to his daily life with new energy and zest, for he will have burning in him the fire of love.

The two great commandments, according to Jesus, are to love God with all one's heart and soul and mind and strength, and one's neighbor as oneself. Both are positive commandments. To love God properly demands the exercise of every faculty that we possess —heart, soul, mind, strength. To love one's neighbor as oneself means to do to all men what one would they should do to oneself.

One has only to look at the life of Jesus to see what an active thing the love that He preached is. He was continually showing up hypocrisy and cant, exposing men's lack of charity, and trying to galvanize them into putting their beliefs into active commission. He was continually using His power to heal both mind and body. To fight all the forces which stunt and corrupt and limit life; to break down all the conventions and traditions and prejudices which paralyze men's freedom to live and love; and so to make the world more and more a kingdom of the life-giving and loving God, this was the task of Jesus and His disciples. And the fire of inspiration which flamed up in words and deeds of power came from their faith—their vision of God.

The freedom and courage, the calm and inward peace, the humility and purity, the energy of love, the contact with the Source of all clean, wholesome life—these things make the man who is really born again into the kingdom of God a power for good unequaled in life. The whole edifice of faith rests on a gigantic assumption—the assumption that the dreams of the soul are truer than the sight of the eyes; that the subjective is more real than the objective. Jesus made the assumption. It was born in Him to make it. The truth of it is proved by the fact that this view of life produced a character more noble, more admirable, more potent to inspire love and devotion, more free, more harmonious, more complete than any other in the history of the world. It is also proved if it is true that He rose from the dead, and is alive for evermore; and if in the lives of those who try to follow Him and to pray to Him there is any sign of approach to the high ideal that He both preached and exemplified.—Donald Hankey.

The gospel is the power of God, but not a resistless force. It reasons and persuades, but does not outrage the freedom of the soul.—D. Thomas.

Not Merely

a counting house, but a people's bank and a useful servant in this community.

We believe that it is the duty of any company which serves the public to be a builder of good will in its community, and that its success depends upon the efficiency of its service.

3% interest on savings and dormant accounts. Interest figured on daily balances.

Irrespective of its size, we invite your account.

Richmond Trust Company

Capital and Surplus, $1,200,000

Main and 7th Streets

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary
J. M. Leake, General Agent

E. B. Addison, Vice-President
J. C. Watson, Treasurer
Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

(Just Published)

The Gospel of Life

By the Reverend

PHILLIPS STANDISH GILMAN

Author of "The Church and the Individual," etc.

With an Introduction by

THE BISHOP OF EAST CAROLINA

A pithy book for a busy age, with a vital, practical message of divine truth for the attainment of HEALTH, HAPPINESS and HOLINESS.

READ THE FOLLOWING OPINIONS

"I pray that it may bring a fuller appreciation of all that the blessed Christ may mean to those who are willing to accept His promises and follow Him all of the way."—Bishop Darst.

"It is splendid."—Rev. H. B. Wilson, Society of the Nazarene.

"Spiritual, practical and full of the Gospel of Christ."—Rev. Prof. S. A. Wallis, D. D., Virginia Theological Seminary.

"Particularly apt and inspiring. The appendix is of tremendous value."—Rev. F. M. Wetherill, St. John's, Philadelphia.

Price, 75 Cents, Postpaid

The Southern Churchman Co.,

Richmond, Va.

Jane McAlister School For Nurses

Waukegan, Illinois

The Jane McAlister School for Nurses of the Victory Memorial Hospital offers a comprehensive course of instruction in the theory and practice of nursing.

This school was organized in 1905 and is an accredited school of the State of Illinois.

Graduates of this school are qualified to enter all classes of nursing service.

The Training School is open to young women of approved education, character and adaptability.

The course is three years; maintenance is provided; also a monthly allowance of $20.00 after probation, enabling students to rely upon their own income during their course.

The eight-hour working day for students has been established, and three week's vacation is given each year.

General requirements are: Good health, good moral character, age not less than 19 years, and a minimum education of two years high school.

Applications are received at all times. Send applications to Superintendent of Victory Memorial Hospital, Waukegan, Ill.

RECREATIONAL BOOKS

A YEAR OF RECREATION
By Ethel Owen

A little book of twelve suggestive socials, one for each month of the year. A complete social is outlined for each month, including games, suggestions for place cards, menus, etc. All of the suggestions are practical and can be carried out in home, school or church. A compact recreational program for a year at minimum cost.

Paper, Net, 35 Cents, Postpaid
Cloth, Net, 50 Cents, Postpaid

SOCIAL PLANS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE
By Christian F. Reisner

For pleasure and profit. Practical, workable, wide-awake, down-to-date tested plans.

Net, $1.50, Postpaid

GOOD TIMES FOR GIRLS
By Mary E. Moxcey

A manual for the social committee of Sunday School classes and clubs of teen age girls and their leaders. How to have a successful "good time" on any possible social occasion, whether with girls by themselves or with boy guests. There are directions for all sorts of clever stunts, "mixers," and feature entertainments, most of them printed nowhere else.

Net, 60 Cents; by Mail, 65 Cents

PHYSICAL HEALTH AND RECREATION FOR GIRLS
A Handbook for Girls and Volunteer Workers
By Mary E. Moxcey

A compact, usable and practical manual of indoor and outdoor games for girls. Any teacher of a Sunday School class or leader or a club of girls with no other material available can from these meaty pages get an intelligent idea of what normal, healthy girls ought to look like and to be able to do with their bodies just what exercises and games to choose to reach this standard, and how to go about interesting the girls, teaching the games, and securing the space and the essential materials with little or no expense.

Net, 60 Cents; by Mail, 65 Cents

THE ABINGDON PRESS
New York Cincinnati Chicago Detroit Kansas City San Francisco Boston Pittsburgh Portland, Ore., Salesroom

WHEN WRITING OUR ADVERTISERS PLEASE MENTION THIS PUBLICATION

"If you want a bank with a heart, try the American National"

This is a bit of advice one of our customers gave to a friend who was coming to Richmond.

Our modesty would never lay claim to such a title, but as it was given us unsolicited, we ask you to put us to the test.

American National Bank
Richmond, Va.

The Symbol of Happiness

The bluebirds will soon be here, and so will spring. Start a Savings Account and, as in Materlinck's famous story, you will soon find in your own home the "bluebird"—in other words, CONTENTMENT. Money in the Bank is one of the ways to find it.

Planters National Bank, Main & 12th Sts.
Resources Over $20,000,000.00

FOR QUICK SERVICE CALL RANDOLPH 1978-W
We Clean One Small Rug Free as a Trial

Electric Carpet Cleaning Co.

W. F. POAT
16 West Grace Street, Richmond, Va.

Carpets and Rugs Washed and Dried right on the floor!

Hamilton Beach method used exclusively—the nationally advertised way.

Called For and Delivered

Have You Made Your Will?

See G. Jeter Jones, Vice-President, about this now. All conferences confidential. Phone or write for appointment.

Merchants National Bank
11th and Main Streets, Richmond, Va.

"SAFEST FOR TRUSTS"

MEMORIAL AND MAUSOLEUM WINDOWS
Grand Prize Louisiana Purchase Exposition
Sent Free—Our 48-Page Book
ECCLESIASTICAL ART IN MEMORIAL WINDOWS

THE FLANAGAN & BIEDENWEG STUDIO
312-318 W. Illinois Street, Chicago, Ill.
Established 1883

The Western College for Women
OXFORD, OHIO

Announces the opening of its sixty-seventh school year, Wednesday, September 14th, 1921

Information may be obtained from

W. W. BOYD, President

The Emerson Shoe
HONEST ALL THROUGH

Black and Dark Tan Men's Vici Kid Shoes
THE CORRECTOR
And
EMERSON LASTS
A $10.00 Shoe, Extra Special
at $7.25
Send us your size

Woodall & Quarles
7 E. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

NOW
is the time for all good GARDENERS
to plant
DIGGS & BEADLES

Early English Peas, Radish, Beets, Kale, Cabbage, Onion Sets, Irish Potatoes, Asparagus, and many other vegetable and Farm Seeds.

Ask for our catalogue, which tells
How, When, and Why

DIGGS & BEADLES, Inc.
SEED MERCHANTS
Three Stores, Richmond Va.
Headquarters for Superior Seeds

DISTANCE

Makes no difference to Berry patrons—our Mail Order Department can serve you anywhere; delivery free.

Write for our new catalogue of MEN'S and BOY'S CLOTHING.

The South's "Old Home" store with new blood and best values!

O. N. Berry Co.
ESTABLISHED 1879

Easter Fashions

Sounding a New Price Note

Easter is symbolical of awaking. It is applicable to the Easter season in the Store—a veritable hive of industry, ideas and fresh new apparel for the glorious Spring Season.

Interest has awakened anew in the Store's goods with the re-appearance of good-looking merchandise of recognized QUALITY and authoritative STYLE at prices strikingly moderate. There is no reason why any one should forego the pleasures of a charming Easter outfit with prices sounding this welcome note.

Women, Misses, Children—all are invited to view the radiant richness of the new modes.

Those who reside too far from the Store to visit it in person are invited to use our Mail Order Department. Write us for what you want.

Miller & Rhoads

"The Shopping Center" RICHMOND, VA.

Memorials or gifts to be in place for this great Festival should be considered promptly so designs may be prepared for criticism and accepted and the work executed and erected in ample time for dedication.

J. & R. LAMB
Studios 23-25-27 Sixth Avenue, New York

HICKORY HILL DAHLIA FARM
QUALITY DAHLIA
Box 227-C, Richmond, Va.
Send for a Catalogue

HOT WATER HEAT
For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars
ARCOLA SYSTEM
R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.
9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

ECCLESIASTICAL ART

MEMORIALS AND GIFTS TO THE CHURCH

Furniture Ornaments

In Silver and Gold, Brass and Bronze, Marble and Stone, Carved Wood, Fabrics, Embroideries

During the years of the war, owing to the fact that our force was greatly reduced, and there were difficulties and delays in obtaining good materials, conditions permitted us to execute only a fraction of the work offered us, while we still maintained the high standard for which our productions are known since 1877.

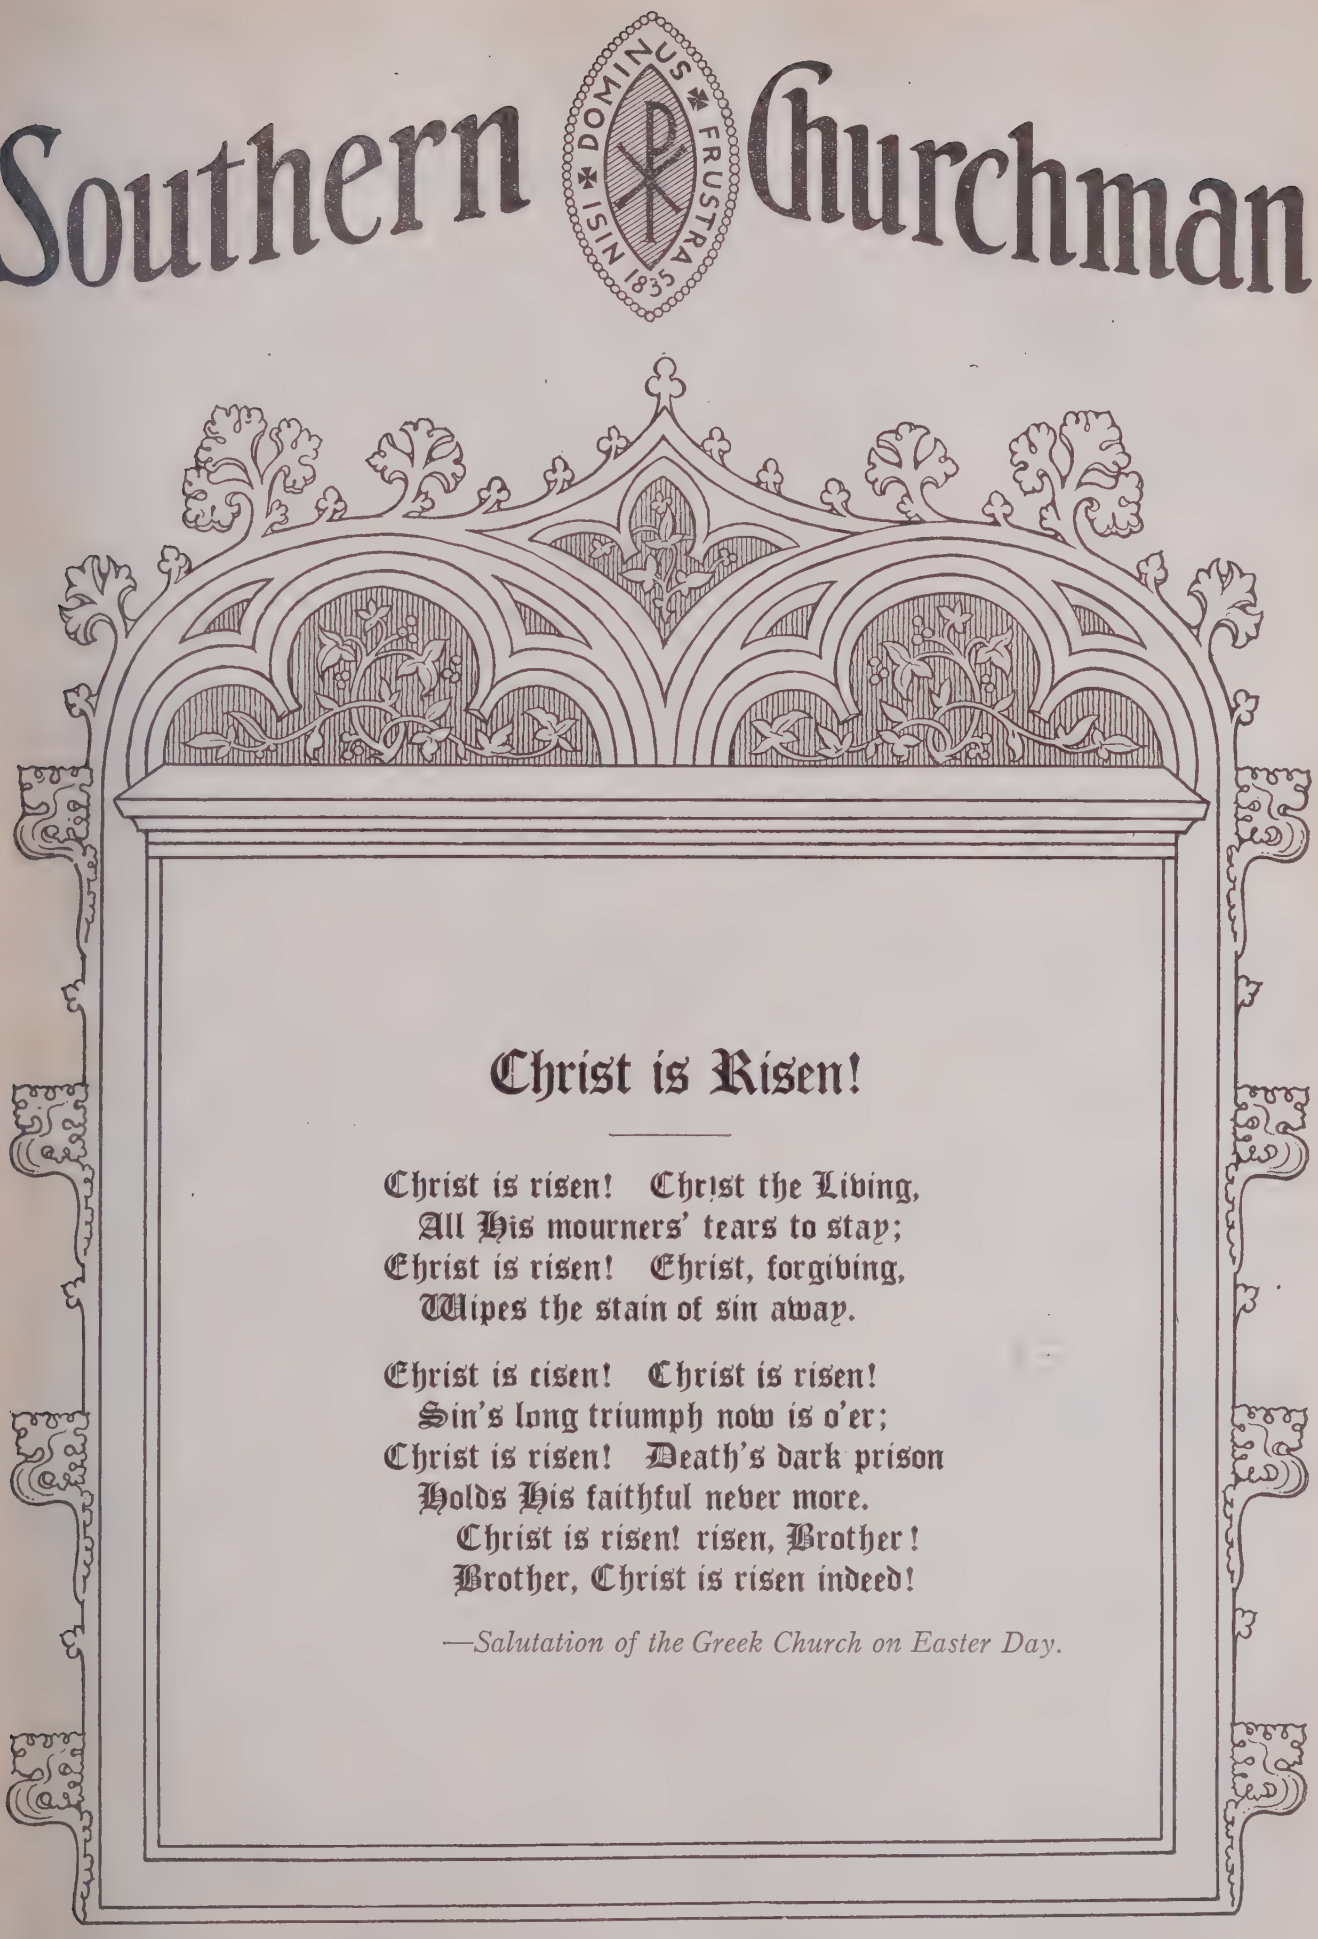
It has taken some time to fully recruit our force of designers and artisians. However, we are now again operating under normal conditions. We are in a position to handle any work efficiently, reasonably, and promptly, and therefore solicit your orders.

R. Geissler,
Incorporated

Windows and Mosaics

Ornamental, Figure, and Landscape Subjects in Opalescent, Leaded, and Antique Painted Glass.

Mr. Arthur R. Geissler is gratified in being able to announce his association with Mr. Louis J. Lederle and Mr. John Barrian as "Lederle and Geissler, Inc.," for the production of art glass windows and mosaics. This studio solicits your orders to build windows which will possess the highest artistic merit. Of this result you are assured by the examples of the many important commissions executed under Mr. Lederle's supervision during the last twenty-five years.



Such attention (often neglected) is given to the mechanical construction, that permanency is assured.

Lederle and Geissler, Inc.

If, when making inquiries, you will give as detailed information as possible, relative to the style of design preferred, size, material, subject, and approximate limits of expenditure, it will enable us to promptly submit designs and suggestions exactly meeting your needs.

OFFICES, STUDIOS AND WORKSHOPS - - - 56 WEST 8TH STREET, NEW YORK

Southern Churchman

Christ is Risen!

Christ is risen! Christ the Living,
All His mourners' tears to stay;
Christ is risen! Christ, forgiving,
Wipes the stain of sin away.

Christ is risen! Christ is risen!
Sin's long triumph now is o'er;
Christ is risen! Death's dark prison
Holds His faithful never more.
Christ is risen! risen, Brother!
Brother, Christ is risen indeed!

—Salutation of the Greek Church on Easter Day.

Easter :: 1921

EDUCATIONAL

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

Established A. D. 1823.

The ninety-seventh session will open on Wednesday, September 15th, 1920.

Special Students Admitted

For catalogue or other information, address the dean or Secretary.

Theological Seminary
Alexandria, Va.

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to
REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean
Petersburg, Va.

The Virginian Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded and Epileptic.
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-third year of this School for Boys opens September 15, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to

REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA.

SUMMER QUARTER

First term, June 20 to July 30; second term, Aug. 2 to Sept. 3. Faculty, over 100; courses, over 300; attendance last year, 1856. Courses for teachers and college students. College credit. Degrees conferred on men and women. Most beautiful campus in America. Cost very reasonable. For catalogue and full information, write to

CHAS. G. MAPHIS, Dean, University, Va.

WHEN WRITING OUR ADVERTISERS PLEASE MENTION THIS PUBLICATION

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each.

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Patience is power.

I am in the best of service for the best of Masters and upon the best terms.—John Williams.

All true work is sacred; in all true work, were it but true hand labor, there is something of divineness.—Carlyle.

All the best work has been done by those who with difficulty found time for it in crowded lives.

Let us not make the mistake of believing our doubts and doubting our faith, but rather let us trust our faith, and doubt our doubts.

"Rise and follow Me," He saith,
"Love as I have loved you;
Rise to life that I through death Won for you."
—H. E. Kimball.

The largest Presbyterian church in the world is among the converted cannibals of West Africa.—Record of Christian Work.

Everything that is mine, even to my life, I may give to one I love, but the secret of my friend is not mine to give. —Sir Philip Sidney.

Let me not forget that the power and joy of sacrifice grow upon those who exercise it. Pure passions grow as well as dark ones.—W. L. Watkinson.

Love is the last word between man and man, between man and woman, between man and God. It silences death, for Christ has conquered death, and to love in Christ is to love in eternity. —Canon Knox-Little.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,

REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

St. Christopher's School

(Formerly the Chamberlayne School)

A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND VA.

Tenth session begins September 22, 1920 Tuition in boarding department limited to twenty-two boys—$700.

For catalogue, address

Rev. C. G. Chamberlayne, Ph. D., Headmaster

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.

A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. College preparatory. Boarding department 503 W. Franklin Street. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health; out-door life.

MISS ROSALIE H. NOLAND, Principal

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLESTOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes. Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

Virginia, Chatham. Box 13.

The Chatham Episcopal Institute for Girls

Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Thorough preparation for all colleges. New buildings. Ten-acre campus. Athletics. Gymnasium. Terms moderate. Catalogue and views.

B. D. Tucker, D. D., President; Rev. C. O. Pruden, D. D., Rector; Miss Annie Marian Powell, A. B., Sweet Briar, A. M., Columbia, Prin.

ST. MARY'S, An Episcopal School for Girls

Founded 1842. Full College preparation and two years' advanced work. Music, Art, Elocution, Domestic Science and Business. 11 Modern Buildings, 25-acre Campus in mild Southern climate. Moderate rates. Address REV. WARREN W. WAY, Rector, Box 19, Raleigh, N. C.

The Divinity School of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Philadelphia.

Founded by Bishop Alonzo Potter in 1862.

Special students admitted. Privilege of attending course of special study at the University of Pennsylvania.

For information address the Rev. George G. Bartlett, S. T. D., Dean, 5000 Woodland Avenue.

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., MARCH 26, 1921. No. 13.

EASTER.

It was not for nothing that our Saviour so timed the completion of His earthly mission as to bring its final scenes to conclusion at the springtime feast of the Passover.

It is inspiring to feel that our Easter communion celebrates both the last supper of our Lord with His disciples and our deliverance from sin through His Messiahship, and also that it reaches back into the dim and distant past and commemorates also the last supper of the children of Israel in the bondage of Egypt, and so binds us in a closer fellowship with the Son, Who died that we might "have life and have it more abundantly," and also with a heavenly Father Who, long before the coming of the Son, had planned our redemption, and begun the preparation for it by the setting apart of a chosen people to whom He made revelations from time to time, and through whom He kept alive the expectation of a Coming One, a great deliverer.

This feast of remembrance for a great deliverance occurred in the springtime as though to esphasize for the Israelites the fact that they had undergone a resurrection from slavery to freedom, like the coming to life of nature after its winter sleep.

God's dealings with His human children are never accidental. It was not by chance that the last great plague fell upon Egypt, and the exodus occurred at the bursting time of the year, when all around us our heavenly Father is showing how bonds can be broken, and brown barren places made green and bright.

When Christ came He followed even in His death that perfect harmony with His Father which constituted His divine power. As He puts it, "I and my Father are one," so when the time approached for Him to pass through death to life He followed the example set by the Father. When a feast was appointed to celebrate the bursting of earthly bonds, and the shattering of the shackles of slavery, it was set at the season when the sunlight is gaining the supremacy over darkness, when the equinox is past on the bright side, daylight is increasing and darkness is receding, the light is gaining the victory over gloom.

In like manner when the Lord had finished His work and was ready to burst the bonds of death, He chose the anciently observed feast as the occasion, and the opportunity of continuing it with a new meaning and instituting another feast to commemorate the breaking of the fetters of sin.

St. Paul rightly emphasizes this in that passage which has become our Easter anthem, "Christ our passover is sacrificed for us: therefore let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth."

As we look out at the Father's works around us it is easier to understand the greatness of the glory that a resurrection is going to mean by observing the pictures of it that He shows us at this blessed season. Contrast bulb of the hyacinth, in the earth, earthy and unattractive with its blossom of delicate tints and sweet perfume, and it gives us a new vision of what it meant for the Master to resume again that free existence in His Father's presence after His sojourn in the bonds of the human body.

Look at the great bare brown trees bursting into tender, delicate foliage, and we can better appreciate the way in which the beauties of spirituality can be clothed upon, and cover the ruggedness of the earthly body.

Then let us think of the resurrection life to which the Christ has led the way as being as far above, and as having as many more attributes as the brightly colored, delicately perfumed blossom has more wonders of beauty and attractiveness than the insignificant brown bulb possesses.

No wonder that Jesus said to Nicodemus, "If I have told you earthly things and ye believe not, how shall ye believe if I tell you of heavenly things?" If we look at the illustrations in God's great book, it makes it easier for us to understand the heavenly things of the glorious resurrection season.

As one of our Southern poets has so beautifully sung:

"All that springeth from the sod
Tendeth upwards unto God:
All that cometh from the skies
Urging it anon to rise.
Winter's life delaying breath
Leaveneth the lump of death,
Till the frailest fetter bloom
Moves the earth, and bursts the tomb.
Welcome, then, Time's threshing-pain
And the furrows where each grain,
Like a Samson, blossom-shorn
Wakes the resurrection morn."

M.

WELCOME.

The Diocese of Southwestern Virginia has, from its organization, shown itself to be progressive, and of an energetic type of churchmanship from its Bishop to its youngest presbyter.

Last summer a series of all-day services or institutes was arranged for the purpose of getting Church people together to meet their Bishop.

In further proof of this Godly activity, we have the first copy of "The Southwestern Episcopalian."

We are delighted to see a diocesan paper that is not ashamed to sail under its colors. We are Episcopalians. Why should we be ashamed of it or try to hide? And yet, so far as we know, this is the first and only paper that comes out, and frankly confesses it, and flies it at its masthead, so to speak, and we take off our hats to the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia.

Another feature for which we commend our new contemporary is the number of parish letters that it contains—no less than eleven! We wonder how they got them, and would be glad to pay a reasonable price if they would send us their recipe. Usually getting news out of Episcopal clergymen is like drawing the proverbial eye-teeth. These reverend gentlemen are apparently the most modest in the world. It almost takes a private detective force, which few Church papers can afford to keep up, to find out what they are doing.

Again we say, "Hats off to 'Southwestern Virginia.'"

M.

A CHAT WITH CONTRIBUTORS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

In all seriousness it would help enormously to make our diocesan and other Church periodicals very much more interesting reading if our Episcopalians, both clergy and laity, would take enough interest in what is going on in their respective parishes to write it up and send it to the Church press.

Of course editors, in many cases, may have to curtail these reports, but persons' feelings need not be hurt on that account. It must be remembered that the issuing of every number of a weekly paper involves a good deal of cutting and fitting, and that there is a certain amount of space for each department or variety of news.

Sometimes we have articles which we should like to publish in full; but that particular week may have brought us quite a number of other items of a similar nature, so that the only way to get them in is to "boil them down," for if left over to the next week they would lose their "timeliness."

These are rather matter of fact suggestions, but an interesting religious press, like most other things, can be created through co-operation, and this is an object that is worth striving for. A live, helpful Church paper can wield a great influence, where a stupid dead one is chiefly a space-filler in the waste-basket.

Until thought transference and mental telepathy are developed to a good deal higher state of efficiency than they have yet reached, the only way for Church papers to find out what is going on in parishes and dioceses is for some one to take the trouble to write it down and mail it. Please do it.

M.

A Pastoral on Family Religion

By the Bishop of Southern Virginia.

Brethren in Christ Jesus:

The Bishop of the Diocese is, first of all, the pastor of the flock over which God has made him overseer. As your friend and pastor, I am writing to urge your careful consideration of the appeal which is to be sent out by the Board of Religious Education of Southern Virginia, setting before you the great value and necessity of what we may call family religion.

"The Church in the House," not only in apostolic times, but all down through the history of the Christian Church, is in every community the beginning of the organized congregation of believers. Religion, like charity, begins at home. As it fares with the church in the house, so will it fare with the church of the parish.

Every Christian home should be a place where prayer is wont to be made. A home without prayer, without the benediction of the consciousness of the unseen presence of Christ, cannot bring to bear on the fashioning of the character of our children and the forming of their ideals of life those subtle influences which have gone into the making of the people of England and America.

It is hard to say how far there has been the abandonment of daily family prayer, of grace before meat, of the teaching of the things of God to our children, of the putting of God's things first. If in any home the fire has died down on the family altar, pray God that it may be kindled anew.

There are changed conditions in modern life which make regular family worship and systematic instruction in God's truth seemingly more difficult than they were in the days of our own childhood. But these should not be an excuse for the lowering of the standard of family religion, but rather a challenge to our faith, which should realize that Christ's religion is universal and for all times and, therefore, capable of adaptation to all the changes and circumstances of life.

May I now appeal, therefore, to you, my dear brethren, as the Eastertide draws near, to remember that the Christ is not the Christ of the past, but the living Christ, Who seeks, as in the days when He was here on earth, to enter into the lives and the homes of His disciples.

I pray God that in every home in the Diocese there may be daily prayer to Him.

I commend to our people a Manual of Family Prayer set forth by the Diocese of Virginia, which is simple and has the spirit of true devotion. But we have also always by us in our Prayer Book the forms for Morning and Evening, those wonderful collects which, as no other words can do, speak our thoughts and voice our needs to God.

I pray God that in every home we may gather around the family table to bless the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, as the Giver of all good gifts.

I pray God that in every home, not only in the Church and the Sunday school, but in the family circle, our children may hear the Word of God and be taught those things which they ought to know and to believe to their souls' health, and I pray that we may lead them, from their earliest childhood, to see the beauty and the joy of the service of Christ.

I trust that in every home, on the Lord's Day, when the family is deterred from the privilege of attending church, the service may be read, as was the wont in the old Virginia homes, and that all may take their part.

And I pray God that in every family where there are sons, fathers and mothers may dedicate them, if it shall please God, in their thoughts and their prayers, to the ministry of the Word.

We cannot overestimate what it would mean to the Church and to our land, if there were a realization of the value of this religion of the home, a building of the Church in every house.

"Prove me, saith the Lord of Hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing that there shall not be room enough to receive it."

The Blessed Christ stands, at the entrance of every home, and, if we will we can hear His yearning, pleading voice: "Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear My voice and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him and he with Me."

Faithfully and affectionately yours,

Beverley Dandridge Tucker,
Bishop of Southern Virginia.

China Famine Relief

To those of us who are thinking of doing more and more for China Famine Relief it is of interest to be told what the native Christians are doing for their own people. A touching tribute comes in a recent letter from our Bishop Huntington, of Anking, testifying to the whole-hearted response of Chinese Christians to famine relief. He states that aside from American missionaries being sent to various parts of the famine area for actual relief work, some of his Chinese clergy and other workers have been delegated for such service, the Christians in the various parishes backing them up loyally by their self-sacrificing gifts. One must remember that the income of many of our Chinese Christians is exceedingly limited. Bishop Huntington writes under date of January 28: "I wish we could do more for those sufferers, for this famine is about as bad as anything could be. We have raised about $2,500 or more in the Diocese thus far from so feeble a folk."

This is simply an unaffected statement which has more in it than one would imagine.

It comes out of a Christian Church that is itself in need for the most part and often impoverished, and the statement that such an amount has been given is an eloquent tribute to the generosity of our Chinese brothers.

They have also been willing to sacrifice some of their workers. The Rev. Bernard Ts'n and one of our catechists, Mr. Tsang, from Nanking, have been sent to the field to aid Mr. Tompkinson, of Wuhu.

The American Christians need have no fear about the Chinese end of things.

WHAT IS DEATH?

The Rev. R. Cary Montague.

"That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit."—John 3:6.

We live in a marvelous age. New discoveries and inventions are appearing every day. The Atlantic Ocean has already been bridged by the human voice, without so much as a wire to guide the sound waves. Men have passed from shore to shore of that great expanse of water like the birds, winging their way through the heavens. Yet in the midst of the conquest of all the wonders of earth and sea and air, two great mysteries remain unsolved.

These mysteries are facts of everyday life: Birth and Death. Whence came we and whither do we go? These two questions still remain unanswered. They have been pondered by the greatest minds of all ages, and naturally so, for the one experience that will come to persons of every class and condition of life is death.

As one looks into the faces of a great crowd, there is only one thing that can safely be predicted will come to all; some may obtain great wealth, others gain political power, or develop great intellectual attainments, but the one thing that certainly every one will do is—to die.

In the consideration of death we must come back to the words of Christ, for, as one of our Church writers has so truly said, "Christ took His stand at the unchanging center of things where the bright light of truth filled His soul and flooded the pathway of His thought in every direction, and when we stand beside Him life becomes simple and luminous."

Let us, then, listen to His words as they came from His lips in the interview with Nicodemus, when He said: "That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit."

I am aware that this scene and our Saviour's words in connection with it are usually thought to refer to baptism, confirmation or conversion, and no doubt they do, but may they not have a larger and deeper meaning when He says, "Marvel not that I said unto thee, ye must be born again"?

I think He referred to death.

I believe firmly in conversion, having seen men's lives transformed, as it were, in the twinkling of an eye, and changed from a downward course to an upward course. In my own experience, by God's grace and help, I have had the privilege of so converting people.

I do not believe, however, our Lord referred entirely to this experience, when He used the words quoted above, because He goes on to say in the seventh verse of the same chapter, "The wind bloweth where it listeth and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so it is every one that is born of the Spirit."

No one knows better than I do the wonders that can be wrought by conversion, but the person has never yet been seen who was able to move about like the wind, by reason of this change of heart; yet Christ says that this is the attribute of every one that is born of the Spirit.

Another reason that makes me think our Saviour here referred to death as a birth into the next world is because St. Paul, in writing of the next life, says emphatically in the fifteenth chapter of the first epistle of the Corinthians, verse 50: "Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God."

No doubt some will disagree with me in the interpretation that I put upon these passages, and to those who do, let me say that I do not consider it the function of a preacher to think for his congregation, but to lead them to think for themselves.

If we turn to God's own works, we find abundant illustrations of the thought that death is birth.

I believe that God uses His handiwork to teach us things that He would have us know, and that He Himself dwells in every part of His creation. As some one has so beautifully put it, "God sleeps in the rocks, He dreams in the flowers. He awakes in the animals, and comes to self-consciousness in man"; or, as we sing in the Benedicite, "O, all ye works of the Lord, bless ye the Lord: praise Him and magnify Him for ever."

Let me show you, therefore, by an illustration from each one of the great departments of God's kingdom, how He teaches us this mighty truth, and that we pass from life to life, or, as St. Paul has put it, "from glory unto glory."

If we turn to the vegetable kingdom, we see the sweet pea seed—small, black, insignificant and utterly unattractive. We put it in the ground, and it dies, but in its death is born the lovely little green shoot that pushes its way through the impeding earth, and in the free air with its new life grows and sends forth its leaves to gather its refreshing moisture from the elements above, while its roots perform the same office from the earth beneath. Then that green stalk terminates and the flower is born. Beautiful with its delicate tints of color, appealing with its odors of sweet fragrance. The ugly little black seed has passed from death unto life.

We turn now to the animal kingdom, and here beneath the ground we see a grub, a fat white worm who has not even the power of locomotion. He lies in the soft moist earth and absorbs his nourishment through his skin. In a little while he dies, and in his death is born a caterpillar whose life is larger than that of the grub from whence he came. He can crawl about through the dust and grass, and select his own food, but still his life is very limited, and soon he retires into a chrysalis, from which he presently bursts forth a butterfly in all the gorgeous hues of brightly colored wings and delicately tinted body, floating through God's free air—a lovely and lightsome thing that is so far above and beyond the grub or caterpillar that it is difficult for us to realize that it is but the culmination of the one life that has experienced God's promoting power. These instructive illustrations do not cease, however, with those parts of God's creation which we look upon as having life. When we turn to the mineral kingdom we find this thought wonderfully exemplified.

Look out on a frosty winter morning, after a day of thawing weather—you will see an icicle clinging to the corner of the roof. There it hangs—frigid, immovable and brittle in its solidity, but the sun strikes it and gradually it disappears, and if under it you have placed a receptacle, you will find it filled with water. The death of the icicle is the birth of the water. In its fluid state it now has motion and moves with the changing level. It gives way before a solid substance, and has many powers not known to it in its first frozen condition. Now place your vessel upon a stove, and soon the water also will disappear, but if you watch it carefully you will see thin clouds of steam that pass lightly into the air floating upward with a new freedom. The death of the water was the birth of the steam, and in its last state this solid, rigid icicle has power not only to move itself, but if confined within narrow limits to drive great locomotives and move mighty wheels of industry.

Let me offer you another thought that has been put forth and developed by the German philosopher Feckner. We speak of existence as though we lived once in this world and once hereafter. But we really live twice in this world. There is a prenatal life that is sometimes overlooked. The eye that is made to see in the light and to distinguish every shade and tint of color is formed in the darkness. The ear through which we receive notes of sweetest melodies is shaped in silence. The event that we call birth into this world terminates that life and is its death, because we pass from life to life.

Shall we not then, after we are born of the Spirit, enjoy faculties which will be as indescribable to us now as would be the sight of a beautiful picture or the sound of a delicate harmony to the unborn babe? Is it surprising that St. Paul, in contemplating these mercies of God to us His children, should have exclaimed:

"Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things that God hath prepared for them that love Him."

Perhaps the most consoling thought of all in connection with this teaching of our Saviour—that death is birth—comes from the thought that no arrival in this world is unexpected or unlooked for. The new born babe is welcomed by loving hearts and kindly helping hands. If we here, with all of our limitations, can prepare a welcome for the arriving one, how much greater will be the welcome prepared by those who have entered into that larger life where they are already living in that house of many mansions and are waiting for us "when we shall be born of the Spirit." Grasp the comfort of this thought! When we see a little child who has been gathered to God's bosom, we know that it will be tenderly welcomed by loving hearts who have gone before. It is inspiring to think of the great group that will be waiting for an old person whose family and loved ones have left them here, but will greet them there.

Again, a birth into this world comes at its appointed time, so let us believe that God also controls the birth of the Spirit, and that when we see a young person taken apparently in the very prime of life, it does not mean that that one is "cut down," as we so often call it, but that God has other work for him to do in another life, and for this purpose he has been promoted. Then can we say with believing hearts:

"God nothing does nor suffers to be done
But we ourselves would do the same as He Could we but see the end of all events
As well as He."

Let us then take these blessed words of our Saviour at their full value and doubt not, but earnestly believe that "that which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit," and that as "the wind bloweth where it listeth and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit."

"What is death?
'Tis but a changing
By the eternal God's arranging
From a coarser to a finer,
From a lower to a higher,
As we journey on."

NEAREASTOCRAPHY.

By Charles V. Vickrey, General Secretary of Near East Relief.

Where is Armenia? "In Turkey," comes the prompt reply. Historically—"Yes"; prospectively—"Yes"; actually—"No." "Armenia" of today's press dispatches lies wholly on Russian soil. True, ancient Armenia covered a considerable portion of Turkey, including the rich plains of Cilicia with a goodly coast line on the Mediterranean. The Treaty of Sevres provides that ultimately a certain portion of the Ottoman Empire shall be included in the Armenian Republic, but as yet not one foot of Turkish territory is controlled from the Russian Armenia, reported as under Soviet government.

Where Are the Armenians?

That is a different matter. Before the wholesale deportations of 1915 they were living prosperously not only in the Turkish vilayets known historically as "Armenia," but throughout all the provinces of Asia Minor. Following the massacres and deportations, they were scattered as refugees and exiles in all directions. The end of the war found the remnants of the Armenian people herded in refugee camps—crowded underground in cities—struggling along highways robbed — homeless and destitute. A portion of them found refuge in the Russian Caucasus, where, during the Russian Revolution, was formed the small Republic of Armenia, which held the allied line against Turkish advance. By far the larger number of Armenians, however, fled or were exiled in the opposite direction—southwest into Cilicia, Northern Syria and the deserts of Northern Mesopotamia.

Where Is Near East Relief?

Wherever in the Near East there are destitute Armenians, Syrians, Greeks, Jews, Assyrians or others, needy and oppressed, regardless of race or creed. Near East Relief follows where the "long, long trail" of persecution and exile leads. From Constantinople to Bagdad, from Port Said to Baku, from Persia to Palestine, the protecting arms of Near East Relief have reached until today its work is far more extensive outside so-called "Armenia" than within.

Far from being overshadowed by Russian Bolshevism, less than 10 per cent. of the workers of Near East Relief were in Russian Armenia previous to the Soviet advance. Workers, supplies and orphans have been shifted to reduce to the minimum possible complications.

It is a notable fact that at no time during the great war or since have Near East Relief workers or supplies been seriously molested. No supplies have been requisitioned and pledges have been given that none will be.

The colossal tragedies, deportations and enforced migrations of recent years and months have given a large Armenian population to many cities far removed from the Armenia to which world governments are seeking to extend guarantees. The whole Assyrian nation, constituting the ancient Chaldean Christian Church, has been driven from the lands Northwest Persia that they occupied for centuries. There is little prospect of their ever being able unaided to recover their ancestral homes. The very life of the vast majority of the Assyrian and other subject races, as well as the Armenian nation, is dependent upon private philanthropy until such time as stable government is restored, not only in Armenia, but throughout the Near East.

Given this reasonable security, these thrifty, enterprising people will quickly regain self-support.

FAITH AND WILL.

The faith which finds God's help for our human needs is an act of will. It is trust in the Eternal Friend. Therefore it is impossible to compel it by argument. Yet it is the one thing utterly needful for our lives. We need the alliance of our wills with God that faith implies. We need the strengthening of our hearts by God's power that faith secures. We need the consciousness of God's presence and the assurance of His unfailing love that faith awakens. Even as of old, the psalmist felt these needs and found satisfaction in the God Whose presence did not oppress him, but, rather, comforted and inspired.—Dr. Rush Rhees.

THE RESURRECTION.

A man who believes entirely in the victory of Jesus Christ is master over death. You believe that; I believe that. Then there ought to be, as we move about the world, a sense of coming victory. We ought to have the power of men who are really conquerors through Him Who loves us; and we ought to go on with the sense that already the enemy is beaten, and we have only to enter into the land that has already been conquered for us. There ought to be a note of conquest and power in every man who believes in the resurrection of Jesus Christ.—The Bishop of London.

THE RESURRECTION.

At break of day
The Saviour burst the cavern's stillness deep,
Rising in conquest from Death's shattered sway,
As from a sleep.

He rose in Power,
In all the strength of Godhead shining bright,
Fresh as that hallowed morning's dewy hour,
Pure as its light.

He rose on high
While angels hung around on soaring wing,
Wresting from the dark grave its victory,
From Death its sting.

—J. H. Newman.

IS GOD REAL?

God is. That states the truth as a fact, and the fact is based on the reality of personality. God is a Person, not visible, but sublimely real. Upon Him as a Divine reality are based for existence all other real beings and all life. All things were made by Him and are upheld by Him. In the beginning God. A sergeant in the French Army declared at the battle front there are no unbelievers, no atheists and infidels on the battle field. God is a reality, a tremendous reality. God, life, death—three things that are startlingly real, and should be real to every one everywhere. That God is, is a comforting thought, a precious fact, that should be stimulating to all who desire to lead an upright life.

The very thought that God is real and everywhere present makes life more valuable, more real and more worthy of one's best efforts. It makes human life sublime, for a true life is related to God. Life everywhere indicates that there is a supreme Life Giver and Upholder.

God is real, otherwise nothing could be real. No life is self-evolved, but in its final analysis its origin is traceable to God. We exist because God exists, we are real personalities because God is a real Person—the supreme source of all life. This makes responsibility real, suffering real, duty real, opportunity real, time real, death real and eternity real. The all-pervasive and enswathing presence of God puts a new value on life—life ideals, life purposes and life objectives. It makes a patriot more patriotic, a soldier a better warrior, a Christian a better disciple and a more useful citizen. It puts a new inspiration into life, more zest into heroic endeavor, more fidelity and perseverance into the performance of tasks—in fact, human life is lived on a higher and sublimer plane when the thought of God as a Divine reality permeates it. It is the touch of God everywhere in our lives that ennobles the life we live and makes it potential for good in the spreading of His kingdom and the glorification of His name. In the beginning God. "God is, and is a rewarder of all those who diligently seek Him."—The Evangelical Messenger.

EASTER THANKSGIVING.

Thank God for the dear ones safe today,
Safe at home on the happy shore,
Where the smile of the Father beams for aye,
And the shadow of pain shall fall no more.
Thank God for the hearts that have done with sin,
For the eyes that shall never be blind with tears,
Thank God for the beautiful, entered in
To the perfect rest of the deathless years.

Thank God today for the pilgrim feet
Which have trodden the last of the toilsome way,
For the strong, for the frail, for the babes so sweet,
Who have left forever this crumbling clay;
Who have changed earth's trial and loss and moan
For the victor's palm and the voice of praise,
Who dwell in the light of the great white throne,
And join in the songs which the ransomed raise.

Thank God today for the hope sublime
Which fills our souls in the darkest hours;
Thank God that the transient cares of time
Are wreathed in the glory of fadeless flowers;
Thank God for the rift in the desolate grave:
'Tis the soldier's couch, not the captive's prison;
He hallowed its portal, Who died to save,
And we write o'er its arch, "The Lord is risen!"

—Margaret E. Sangster.

"Death is not a thing to be dreaded by the believer; it is a sleep. Tired, we lay our head on Jesus' bosom, and awake in heaven."

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

A YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

(Abridged, With Apologies.)

Mr. Editor: The letter in a recent number of the Southern Churchman calling attention to the value of this society in training young people for Church work, and recommending that the Episcopal Church should apply this movement, was of deep interest. As an organizer of such a society in my home town when I was eighteen, and after having filled nearly every one of its offices, I know its value in deepening the spiritual life of the members and in training young people for practical work. The promise then taken, to "read the Bible every day and to pray every day," I have kept throughout my whole life. The habit of earnest study thus formed caused me, later in life, voluntarily to seek confirmation by a Bishop. For the past ten years I have been teaching in Episcopal Sunday schools, and also teaching in day schools connected with a very beautiful cathedral in a missionary diocese. This experience enables me to sum up a few of my observations in the following way:

First. The English Prayer Book, with the observance of the Christian Year, is the clearest and most wonderful exposition of the Christian religion that has ever been formulated. The idea of the Prayer Book in giving to each individual Christian a practical application and training in Christian principles which each one may possess in compact form, is an inestimable heritage. The adherents of some other religious bodies were deprived of this presentation of the Christian doctrines and of having them carefully explained in the natural unfolding of the Church Year. Thus their young people grew up without clearly defined teaching. There was little to make them feel that religion should have a daily place in their lives and that each season of the year and each event of life should be sanctified by the Holy Spirit and have a distinct meaning.

Second. With this condition of things it was absolutely necessary to give the young people something definite to do, and to make them think for themselves as to the meanings of the Christian life. To fill this need the Christian Endeavor Society was born, and during forty years it has made for itself an abiding place in the Church life. Its value in teaching and training young people over sixteen years of age is incomparable.

My observation of Episcopal young people leads me to think that after confirmation they also need teaching and training in the practical application of the Prayer Book and of the doctrine which they have been taught, and also in the daily reading of the Bible. They also especially need to mingle together socially in a way as provided by the Christian Endeavor Society.

Third. I am now teaching in a co-educational college where I have charge of outlining the young people's Sunday evening meetings. I append the outline for the coming Sunday, which follows the subject as given by the Christian Endeavor World, and which will be considered by hundreds of societies on the same evening. It is peculiarly adapted to Church teaching and would be a fine theme for a Church society.

CAROLYN GORHAM DICKERMAN.

New Orleans, March 12, 1921.

Y. P. S. C. E. Meeting, March 13, 1921.

Topic: Real Religion.
Leader: ..... An application Meeting.

Applied Christianity or Real Religion.

Questions for answer in the meeting, as assigned, to be followed by open discussion. Interspersed with special music or singing, and recitations, as arranged by the leader.

What has prayer to do with real religion? Discussion opened by .....

What has the Bible to do with real religion? .....

What has meditation to do with real religion? Discussion opened by.....

Why is the reception of the Holy Spirit a necessity for real religion? .....

How may we know in our hearts that ours is a real religion? Discussion opened by .....

What has Sabbath observance to do with real religion? Discussion opened by.....

How does church-going promote real religion? Discussion opened by .....

What have you found most useful in cultivating real religion? .....

It is well, after the first answer to each question, to wait a few minutes or to ask if any one else has a word on this topic.

MORAL STANDARDS OF OUR YOUTH.

Mr. Editor: Are moral standards changing? Even the most cursory view convinces one in the most forcible way that they are. The kind of life led today by boys and girls, their behavior in general, the way the girls dress and act is vastly different from what they were ten years ago. Boys and girls held themselves in mutual respect. Girls wore more clothes and less make-up. Vamps were unheard of. Jazz with its degrading influence on music as well as morals was yet unborn. Nevertheless, there was much fun and enjoyment.

But look at the situation today. The boys and girls seem jazz-mad. The pursuit of pleasure has become a wild race. Joy-rides with drinking and smoking are not unusual. Vamping has become one of the most popular indoor sports and pastimes. Girls scarcely out of their teens make up like movie actresses. Boys of fourteen and fifteen take girls of twelve to theatre parties and tea dances which are unchaperoned. Dancing has dropped from a decent pastime and enjoyment to an openly sensuous indulgence. Modesty and self-respect are old-fashioned. Pleasure is the end sought and all possible means to gain this end are employed. School work is a side issue; social life comes first. The time has long since passed that our young folk were forbidden to attend social affairs on "school nights"; now they frequent parties every night in the week. Schools have become fashion houses where the keenest competition is carried on among the girls. Thus is the situation.

What seem to be the causes of this degradation? They are numerous. One of the worst, perhaps, as it covers the largest scope, is the movies. There has never been a time when the movie-picture situation was more dangerous than it is today. No proof is necessary; we see it before us plainly. "In 173 films examined some time ago, the Pennsylvania Board of Censors made 1,108 eliminations of objectional scenes of immorality and lust and indecency of all kinds." Close behind comes the dance, aided by the so-called popular music or "jazz" which has done much towards the demoralization of youth. The twentieth century novel, the magazine and the newspaper have lowered themselves to the amusement and satisfaction of the youth by appealing to the passions instead of attempting to raise their ideals. Then we turn to the home, to the parents. They are much to blame; they have been letting down the bars too far and allowing their children too much freedom on the one hand and too little training in morals and manners on the other.

What is to be done? Is pleasure the ultimate end? Can the whirlwind be safely ignored? History records the dangers of lax moral standards and the results of uncontrolled pursuits of pleasure. "And history has the reputation of repeating." If we are to re-establish the former attitude of mutual respect among the young people, it is time for parents to assert themselves. We do not need "blue laws," but we do need common sense decency and modesty and self-respect reinstated in their proper places in the estimation of the people generally and the boys and girls in particular. "It is high time to awake out of sleep."

H. B. JONES.

St. Stephen's College, Annandale, N. Y.

CENTENNIAL OF GREEK INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. Editor: The Centennial of Greek Independence comes this year. One hundred years ago, on the Feast of the Annunciation, which is (by the Eastern Calendar) our April 7, "the Archbishop Germanos, of Patras, raised the banner of the cross, and enslaved Greeks flocked to arms." Such was the beginning of the Revolution which freed Greece.

Does not this afford us a special opportunity? Should not our parishes everywhere do something to make the Greeks within the parish bounds feel that we desire to express our friendly relations by helping them celebrate their Day of Independence? There are some Greeks in almost every community of any size in the United States, and in many places their churches are on cordial terms with our own. The fact that our Greeks know the meaning of freedom and love to celebrate the day of its birth in the mother-country makes them not worse, but better, Americans.

I should be glad to furnish suggestions as to how this can be carried out. THOMAS BURGESS.

281 Fourth Ave., New York.

The Great Commission.

A FOLLOW-UP CAMPAIGN.

(From the Publicity Department.)

The Rev. Conrad H. Goodwin, rector of Zion Church, Charles Town, W. Va., is seeking information; and inasmuch as he puts his questions in the form of a challenge, it might be said that he is very much in earnest about it. They have done well in the Nation-Wide Campaign in Charles Town, but they are not satisfied. They are out to do better. So the rector has conceived the idea of telling his story to the Church, challenging, as it were, those parishes which have not done as well, and endeavoring to seek out parishes that have done better in order to add zest to the work they are carrying on in Charles Town.

The Rev. Mr. Goodwin writes: "Zion Episcopal Church, Charles Town, W. Va., paid its quota in full to the Nation-Wide Campaign, 1920, the quota being $3,095. Because many parishes and dioceses are half-hearted about their quotas, and because it seemed good to encourage Zion congregation to larger stewardship and an abler sense of mission, at the suggestion of the rector the vestry has guaranteed an increase of 17 per cent. on our quota, making it $3,750. Can you tell me how many congregations (or if difficult to obtain data for smaller congregations, let us say all over three hundred communicants) have increased their quota, by their own request, 17 per cent. over and beyond the 1920 quota actually paid in, and have guaranteed that the 1921 quota will be paid in full?

"Besides weekly group meetings for missionary information and prayer, last autumn during the Nation-Wide Campaign, and a monthly meeting in the homes between that time and Lent, we now, during the six weeks of Lent, are meeting in fifteen homes in the parish every week for missionary intercession and study of the Survey—the groups being gathered together by captains and led by prayer leaders and information men, so that each group has three leaders. Every week the rector instructs these forty-five Nation-Wide Campaign officers in the prayer and study for that week in their groups. The Executive Committee of three majors see to the personnel, advertisement and assignments. The captains are permanent leaders of their groups; the prayer leaders and information men serve the different groups in rotation, a plan which proves advantageous in many ways. Of this band of forty-five officers, almost half are men. Last autumn a dozen of these men gave brief talks in church on the Nation-Wide Campaign.

"There are now in use for our Lenten study one hundred copies of the Survey, and we have an actual weekly attendance (which does not mean enrollment) of one hundred and seventy-five persons.

"For the encouragement both of ourselves and of others, will you kindly tell me how many parishes of which you have record excel this effort of Zion Church, in number of Surveys regularly studied, number in regular attendance, and number of officers in permanent Nation-Wide Campaign organization."

ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL.

Mr. Thomas W. Lamont, of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., recently returned from a trip to the Orient. One of his business friends in New York, knowing of the plans to proceed with the erection of the new St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, asked him the following questions:

"1. Will an enlarged St. Luke's be a definite contribution toward the support of Christianity in Japan?

"2. Is the enlargement vitally needed from a medical standpoint?

"3. Will an adequate institution of this kind tend to cement friendly relationship between the nations? Has the institution the good will of the Japanese people in Tokyo and the good will of the nation at large, in so far as you have any knowledge of the subject?"

Mr. Lamont replied by letter as follows:

"Permit me to say that my answer to all of your questions about St. Luke's, Tokyo, is an unqualified 'yes.' I regard St. Luke's as an unusually fine institution, wielding an influence far beyond the medical, surgical and nursing service, and I am most enthusiastic about its director and staff.

"It occupies a peculiar position in the regard and relations of Japanese and Americans, as many of both races assured me during my visit to Tokyo last year. It is a very definite and substantial contribution to the cause of Christianity in Japan, and its enlargement must increase that influence for good. My observation and inquiry convinced me that its enlargement is absolutely necessary from a medical standpoint, and I am confident that the extension of the work must affect favorably the relations between the two countries. There can be no question as to the good will of the Japanese for St. Luke's Hospital."

Church Intelligence

Conference of Social Service Workers, Milwaukee.

The program and plans for the National Conference of the Social Service Workers of the Episcopal Church, to be held in Milwaukee, Wis., June 20-22, have been carried to a tentative conclusion. Through the kind interest of the trustees and the president, Miss Sabin, of Milwaukee-Downer College, the buildings have been put at the disposal of the conference. We can take care of one hundred men and sixty women, charging $3 a day per person for room with two beds and breakfast; $3.50 a day for single room and breakfast. It is hoped that we can plan to have our luncheons and dinners there for Tuesday and Wednesday, the days of our own conference. The rooms at the college are placed at our disposal through the entire week of the National Conference of Social Work, from the 22d to the 29th. In order to make it possible to open up the college the Executive Committee of our conference has been obliged to make a contract promising one hundred men and sixty women for the period of the ten days. We therefore beg every one who plans to attend the conference to inform the secretary, the Rev. Charles N. Lathrop, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y., in order that reservations may be made. We are particularly anxious to get the number who will be present for the National Conference of the Social Service Workers of the Episcopal Church which will end on Wednesday afternoon, June 22, and to know how many of them plan to stay through the National Conference of Social Work.

The Conference of the Social Service Workers of the Episcopal Church will open on Monday afternoon, June 20, with a reception. There will be opportunity at this time for meetings of committees of special activities and also of those who have been appointed to prepare papers. The first regular meeting will be held on Monday evening at 8 o'clock. Temporary officers will be chosen and the plans and purposes of the conference presented. Then at 8:30 will be a paper on the "Relation of Church Institutions to the Diocesan Authorities," followed by another paper on the subject, "What Relation Ought the Social Service Work of Our Church to Bear to the Work of Other Christian Bodies?" by Mr. John M Glenn, director of the Russell Sage Foundation, New York City. On Tuesday morning, June 21, at 10 o'clock, "The Scope and Work of the Social Service Commissions" will be the general subject. First six of the Social Service Commissions will tell us what they are doing. Canada, New York, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Chicago and California have been asked to present ten-minute reports. Next will come the question, "What Should They Do?" a paper presented by a committee of which the Rev. C. K. Gilbert, Secretary of the Social Service Commission of the Diocese of New York, is chairman, to be followed by discussion. Tuesday afternoon the subject will be "The Church's Relation to the Dependent, Defective, Delinquent," starting off with the question, "What Contribution Should the Church Make?" followed by three short papers on "What Part of This Field Does the Church Cover?" For the child, Miss Katharine P. Hewins, General Secretary of the Church Home Society of Boston; for the wayward and delinquent girl, Mrs. John M. Glenn, President of the National Council Church Mission of Help; in City Mission work, Rev. L. E. Sunderland, Superintendent, City Mission Society, New York City, to be followed by discussion. Tuesday evening there will be a devotional service in preparation for a corporate communion, Bishop Brent being the leader. On Wednesday morning at 7:30 will be the corporate communion. At 10 o'clock the conference meets to discuss "How Can We Make Social Service an Effective Part of Parish Activities?" a paper presented by the Rev. Samuel Tyler, D. D., as a result of his own work and a committee of his choosing, followed by discussion. Then there will be a short paper on the question, "Is There One Definite Work the Social Service Commissions of the Dioceses of the Country Can Undertake?" On Wednesday afternoon will come the questioon, "Are the Social Service Commissions Responsible to Express the Conscience of the Church in Important Public Questions?" followed by final action for permanent organizatioon. Thursday afternoon there will be two papers on "The Church Service League and Christian Social Service," one taking up the Woman's Auxiliary and the other the Girls' Friendly and Christian Social Service; and also a paper on "The Brotherhood of St. Andrew and Christian Social Service."

On Wednesday evening begins the great National Conference of Social Work. Their tentative program has just come out and presents a great wealth of interesting material. It is hoped that a large proportion of the members attending the National Conference for Social Service Workers of the Episcopal Church will plan to stay over for the succeeding conference.

Charles N. Lathrop.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

New Parish Hall for St. Thomas' Church.

An intensive campaign to raise $50,000, with which to build a new parish hall, has been started by St. Thomas' Church, of which the Rev. C. Ernest Smith is rector. The proposed structure will cost about $75,000. It is planned to realize a third of the amount on a loan, with the balance to be subscribed and paid over a three-year period of six equal instalments, the first payment coming due May 1, 1921. Charles J. Bell, chairman; William Edwin Hall, Melville Church, and Senator H. L. Meyers compose the Executive Committee which will direct the drive for the funds. The present parish hall, which was built for a chapel about thirty years ago, is poorly lighted, badly ventilated and inadequately heated. It has not suitable class-rooms or assembly hall for the Sunday school, is inadequate for choir uses, and offers no satisfactory meeting places for the various organizations of the parish.

It is proposed to replace it with a modern stone building, arranged according to the latest and best parish hall plans, and conforming to the Gothic lines of the church building.

The Executive Committee will be aided in its work of raising the necessary funds by the Nation-Wide Campaign Committee, the Rectors' Aid Society and the Welfare Committee. Headquarters of the Executive Committee have been opened at 1772 Church Street.

A Holy Week Mission was held at Christ Church, Georgetown, with Archdeacon Percy C. Webber as the missioner, and a good attendance at all of the services. There were several services during each day and every evening at 7:45 P. M. Archdeacon Webber is well known to Christ Church Parish, having held missions there twice before, and was welcomed by all who remembered his forceful and inspiring way of delivering his message.

Epiphany Parish: The Bishop of the Diocese confirmed a class of more than fifty persons at Epiphany Church at 11 o'clock on Palm Sunday, when there were addresses by both the Bishop and Dr. Freeman, the rector of the parish. At the evening service the choir sang Gounod's Gallia, under the direction of the parish organist, Adolph Torovsky. Dr. Freeman visited Epiphany Chapel on the evening of the Friday before Palm Sunday and preached the sermon on that occasion. In his greetings to the people of the chapel he emphasized the importance of the chapel in the life of the parish, reminding the people that while there were two church buildings for matters of convenience, they all belonged to Epiphany Parish, and upon them depended much of its success.

Large Confirmation Class: One of the largest classes ever confirmed in this Diocese was presented to the Bishop on Wednesday evening, March 16, at the Chapel of the Nativity, when sixty-seven persons, including twenty-eight men and boys, were presented by the Rev. Enoch M. Thompson, vicar of the chapel.

Holy Week Services: The three-hour services on Good Friday are being held by the rectors of the several parishes with a few exceptions. The Very Rev. H. E. W. Fosbroke, dean of the General Seminary, New York, is the speaker at this service at St. Mark's Church, and the Rev. John J. Queally delivers the addresses at the Chapel of the Good Shepherd. At the Bethlehem Chapel, Washington Cathedral, this service is in charge of Canon Talbot. On Easter Even at 4 o'clock there will be a very beautiful musical service at the Cathedral in preparation for the great festival of Easter Day. This service has become a regular custom at the Cathedral, and is perhaps the only service of its kind held in the Diocese on that day.

M. M. W.

VIRGINIA

Rt Rev. W. Cabell Brown, D. D., Bishop.

A Christian Awakening.

A most unusual and inspiring movement is under way in the city of Richmond, where all the ministers are taking part in a great effort to arouse the people of all churches. Every church has been kept open and had services during Holy Week. The interesting feature of this spiritual awakening is that it is as much under the auspices of the laymen as of the ministers. The Men's Bible Classes have taken an especially active part in arousing the people of the city. They raised a fund of $2,000 to employ a special press agent for advertising purposes. Dr. Douglas S. Freeman, editor of one of the leading daily papers, and teacher of a large Men's Bible Class in one of the Baptist churches, has been very active in encouraging this effort, both by editorials and daily press notices, as well as speaking in its behalf. Preliminary street services have been held in all sections of the city immediately before the church services, the speakers being leading laymen of every church. This idea originated in the mind of the Rev. George P. Mayo, rector of Monumental Church, who first enlisted the support of the Episcopal Clericus, and then went to the other ministerial associations, Bible classes and various church organizations of all denominations, until the movement acquired a momentum of its own, which has become irresistible.

An Unusual Service.

St. Paul's Church, Richmond, was the scene of a beautiful and impressive service on Tuesday morning, March 22, when the children from the public schools of Richmond of the kindergarten age and the first and second grades gathered there for a springtime service. Each child brought a flower, and after the service they were taken to the Capitol Square, which is just across the street, for games and nature demonstration and observation. The service opened with the singing of the first verse of "Onward, Christian Soldiers," by the children, after which there was a prayer and more singing, with a ten-minute address, the exercises being closed by the singing of one verse of "America" and the benediction. The pupils were deeply interested and were most attentive throughout. They sang with earnestness and enthusiasm, that made the old church ring with the pleasant music of their childish voices. At least eight hundred were present.

The sympathy of the Church people throughout the Diocese goes out to its beloved treasurer, the Rev. G. McL. Brydon, in his bereavement caused by the recent death of his father, Mr. Robert Brydon, of Danville, Va. The latter was for twenty-five years Auditor of his home city, and was a citizen beloved and respected by all who knew him, whose loss will be keenly felt throughout the State.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor.

A mission was held in Christ Church, Emporia, the Rev. Norman F. Marshall, rector, the week of March 14 to 21, and the congregations were most gratifying, increasing each night until the church was filled to overflowing. A beautiful spirit of Christian co-operation prevails in this town, and the ministers of the Baptist, Methodist and Presbyterian churches suspended their mid-week prayer meeting services in order that their people might attend the mission services, and came themselves. On Sunday afternoon a mass meeting of all the congregations in the town was held at the Methodist Church, at which the missioner, the Rev. R. Cary Montague, City Missionary of Richmond, was the speaker.

Christ Church, Emporia, and St. Andrew's Church, Lawrenceville, have both recently installed new organs, to the great satisfaction of their respective congregations.

St. Paul's Normal and Industrial School, Lawrenceville, has been maintaining Lenten services on Wednesdays and Fridays by getting rectors of both white and colored churches throughout the Diocese to speak on these days. It is an inspiring congregation to address, over five hundred young people, who in the course of a few years will be leaders of their race. The heartiness of the responses and the wonderful unison with which they read might well be an example to many of our churches.

There is no way to estimate the value of the work this institution is doing for the colored race and through them for the entire South. It is much to be regretted that Archdeacon James S. Russell, who founded this school, is now in poor health, but his son, who is himself a graduate of the school, and also of the Philadelphia Divinity School, has for some little time been carrying on the work, so that the Archdeacon can give his entire time to the Colored Missions of Southern Virginia. The latter has recently been in Philadelphia for medical treatment, and now hopes to resume his active duties.

PITTSBURGH

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

Sudden Death of the Rev. Dr. McIlvaine.

The Rev. Dr. James Hall McIlvaine, rector-emeritus of Calvary Church, Pittsburgh, and acting rector of St. Peter's, Pittsburgh, met with a sudden and tragic death on March 14th, being run over by a motor truck as he was just about to board a trolley car. He died on his way to the hospital.

For eighteen years Dr. McIlvaine had been rector at Calvary, during which period he built and had consecrated the handsome stone church now occupied. He was many times Deputy to the General Convention. Retiring from the rectorship of Calvary just at the time the United States declared war against Germany, he served as locum tenens at St. Stephen's Church, Sewickley, while the rector, the Rev. Dr. Howells, was overseas as chaplain with the A. E. F. During the last year he has been acting rector at St. Peter's.

Dr. McIlvaine was born in Utica, N. Y., in 1846, was graduated from Princeton University and Theological School. While in the ministry of the Presbyterian Church he had charges at Beyerley and Summit, N. J., Providence, R. I., the Church of the Covenant and the Brick Church, New York. He was the author of "Modern Thought and Christian Evidences" and "Francis of Assisi." He is survived by one son, three daughters and four grandchildren.

The funeral services were held on the afternoon of March 16 at Calvary Church, the Bishop of the Diocese and the rector of Calvary, the Rev. E. J. Van Etten, officiating. More than twenty of the diocesan clergy were present in vestments. The members of the vestries of the two churches served as honorary pall-bearers, and interment was in Homewood Cemetery.

The Bishop of Wyoming spent ten days in the city lately, making the noon-day addresses at Trinity Church, preaching on the Sundays at Trinity, Calvary and the Church of the Ascension; addressing the Diocesan Assembly of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew and the Pittsburgh Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, and speaking at other times before missionary societies and in some of the city churches. He told of what an immense assistance to the Missionary Bishops had been the work of the Presiding Bishop and Council.

Clerical Union: The March meeting of the Pittsburgh Clerical Union was held on Monday, 14, at St. Mark's Church, Pittsburgh, when the Rev. Dr. Ruge was essayist.

Church Club: At the meeting and dinner of the Church Club on Thursday evening, March 17, speakers were the Rev. Dr. Homer A. Flint, Administrative Secretary of the Diocese, and the Rev. M. S. Kanaga, Field Secretary.

J. C.

SPOKANE

Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Page conducted a week's mission services at St. Paul's Church, Walla Walla, during Lent. The Girls' School, the only one under the auspices of our Church, continues to do excellent work, and is filled to capacity.

Bishop F. W. Keator, of Olympia, was the special noon-day speaker at the Pantages Theatre services the first three days of Holy Week. Bishop Page entertained the Ministerial Association in his honor in the Davenport Hotel on Monday, March 21. All the Spokane clergy are members of that Association by the courtesy of the Bishop.

The Rev. James A. Palmer, formerly of Holy Trinity, Spokane, and at present assistant to the Rev. J. M. Niblo, vicar of St. Michael's Chapel, Philadelphia, is returning to Spokane, and will resume charge of the work at Holy Trinity, after an absence of less than a year.

The Rev. Lindley H. Miller, of St. Peter's Church, Spokane, is chaplain of St. Luke's Hospital, Spokane, and his work is much appreciated. He has been very active in the healing services which are held every Thursday morning at All Saints' Cathedral, Spokane. He is also vicar of St. Mark's Church, Ritzville, Wash.

The Rev. John G. Larsen, vicar of Epiphany, Hillyard, and of St. David's, Spokane, is now the Secretary of the District of Spokane, being appointed by Bishop Page in place of the Rev. H. H. Mitchell, who left Colfax to take charge of St. Mary's Church, Moscow, in the Diocese of Idaho.

The Rev. W. A. A. Shipway was appointed to the chaplaincy of the Spokane branch of the Actors' Alliance by the Rev. Walter E. Bentley, General Secretary of the Actors' Church Alliance, New York. He visits the players regularly at the Hippodrome, Pantages, Auditorium, and the Woodward Theatre, and reports that he finds the work most interesting and the people very appreciative.

The Rev. M. J. Stevens, vicar of St. John's Church, Spokane, has charge also of St. Thomas' Church, a colored congregation, with excellent promises both in regard to church and parish hall. The work is steadily growing.

W. A. A. S.

NORTH TEXAS

Rt. Rev. E. A. Temple, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishop, who has long been in poor health, has so far recovered that he is making a few appointments for visitation. On Easter Day, at Clarendon; on Sunday, April 13, at Abilene.

Vacant Mission Stations: The two Archdeacons, the Rev. Messrs. Williams and Garner, who for several years have done arduous and faithful work, have both resigned and taken work elsewhere. A large number of mission stations have thus been vacant. For a few months the Rev. D. A. Sanford (canonically connected with New Mexico) is supplying some of these vacancies. In the past two months he has visited and held services at ten different places —Dalhart, Canyon, Farwell, Plainview, Lubbock, Post, Snyder, Hereford, Sweetwater and Shamrock.

D. A. S.

NEW MEXICO.

Rt. Rev. F. B. Howden, D. D., Bishop.

Progress in Church Work.

The confirmations in the Diocese show a slight increase; 249 for the year, at twenty-four different places.

In the past few years remarkable progress has been seen in the parish at El Paso, Tex. Work begun by a faithful missionary, the Rev. J. W. Tays, who set up the first non-Roman mission in that portion of the Southwest, has been developed into a parish of nearly eleven hundred communicants. During the past year seventy-five persons have been confirmed. A revived chapter of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew's has a membership of sixteen men. Recently property has been purchased for a new mission, two miles distant, in a growing part of the city.

At Santa Fe a parish school has an enrolment of eighty students.

Several clergy have removed, but their places in part are to be supplied by the Rev. F. A. T. Eller and the Rev. William B. Allen, who go to Carlsbard and Tucumcari.

Other vacancies should be noted, specially at Marfa, Tex., and at Gallup, N. M., at which latter place there is a good church building and a rectory, and where the Sunday school has been loyally maintained, in the absence of a clergyman. At Clovis the new church building is progressing under the zeal and energy of the Rev. W. W. Brander, the missionary.

D. A. S.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Practical Christian Unity.

The three-hour service on Good Friday at the Church of the Incarnation, Philadelphia, was conducted by clergymen of churches in the vicinity. Addresses on the last seven words from the cross were given as follows:

Introductory meditation, the Rev. Dr. N. V. P. Lewis, rector.

The first word, the Rev. Edward J. Bond, pastor of Grace Methodist Episcopal Church.

The second word, the Rev. Herman P. Guhse, pastor of Oxford Presbyterian Church.

The third word, the Rev. James O. McIlhenny, rector of the Church of the Resurrection.

The fourth word, the Rev. William Holloway Main, D. D., pastor of Memorial Baptist Church.

The fifth word, the Rev. Edwin Heyl Delk, D. D., pastor of St. Matthew's Lutheran Church.

The sixth word, the Rev. William V. Berg, pastor of the Central Congregational Church.

The seventh word, the Rt. Rev. Thomas J. Garland, D. D.

The New Diocesan House.

The Diocese of Pennsylvania has purchased the residence of the late Alexander J. Cassatt at 202 West Rittenhouse Square, Philadelphia. It will be used for the offices of the church, as the Church House, at Twelfth and Walnut Streets, has been sold to the Chamber of Commerce.

The executive offices and publicity department will be on the first floor, and the offices of Bishop Rhinelander and Bishop Garland and secretaries will be on the second floor, front. Rooms will be assigned later to various organizations, including the Churchwoman's Club, Church Club, Brotherhood of St. Andrew, Clerical Brotherhood, as well as to the Department of Education and the Diocesan Library.

The garage, one of the largest in the city, will be remodeled for the women of the Diocese, including the work now being done at the Diocesan Supply Bureau in the Inasmuch Mission, where thousands of garments are cut, sent out to the parishes to be made and then returned to the bureau for shipment to the foreign missionary fields. It is estimated that an expenditure of $10,000 will be required to remodel the garage.

Eight statues of saints adorning the roof and niches of the present Church House were not included in the sale of the property. They have been removed. Only two of them are of granite, those of St. Peter and St. Paul, above the entrance, and which were the first to be removed. They are to be placed in storage until their disposal has been decided upon.

The Rev. A. R. Van Meter, for the last seven years dean of the Cathedral at Erie, Pa., has accepted a call to become rector of Calvary Church, Germantown, Philadelphia.

Mr. Van Meter will succeed the Rev. Franklin S. Moore, who resigned last September because of illness. Since September the Rev. Dr. J. De Wolf Perry, rector-emeritus of the church, has been in charge.

Before going to Erie Mr. Van Meter was rector of All Saints' Church, Torresdale, Diocese of Pennsylvania.

Clergyman Injured: The Rev. Gilbert Pember, rector of St. Michael's Church, Germantown, was seriously injured on March 18 when the automobile in which he was riding collided with a motor truck. He was taken to the Germantown Hospital in a passing car and was operated upon the same evening for a fractured skull.

Mr. Pember was riding in a closed car and had been trailing a large covered van. As the car turned out to pass, it collided with a truck. The smaller machine was smashed and the clergyman was thrown violently against the corner of the car, fracturing his skull.

Christian healing was the subject of an interesting discussion at the meeting of the Clerical Brotherhood Monday morning, March 14, in the Church House. The discussion followed an address on the subject by Rev. H. S. Hathaway, of Norristown, who has gained considerable reputation of late for healing a number of people through the use of prayer.

The meeting Monday was the last of the Brotherhood to be held in the Church House, which was sold several months ago.

New Treasurer of Diocese: Thomas S. Gates, member of the firm of Drexel & Co., has accepted the office of treasurer of the Diocese of Pennsylvania.

The predecessors in the office now held by Mr. Gates were George C. Thomas and Arthur E. Newbold, both members of Drexel & Co.

Mr. Gates will be assisted in his duties by Colonel William P. Barba, assistant treasurer, who has had charge of the office since the death of Mr. Newbold in June, 1920.

The Church Club gave its members an opportunity Saturday afternoon to see some of the institutions in the Diocese in which Churchmen are interested. They visited the Seamen's Institute, at which luncheon was served and the work of the institute explained. After luncheon and inspection of the building the members of the club went to the Galilee Mission, and after that a visit was made to the Episcopal Hospital.

The will of George Theodore Roberts gives $5,000 each to the Home of St. Michael and All Angels, Philadelphia; the Church of the Transfiguration (Little Church Around the Corner), New York, and the Onteora Club, Onteora Park, N. Y.

R. R. W.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

St. Paul's Church, Augusta.

Five years after the great fire in Augusta, St. Paul's Church has this month paid the last amount to the American Church Building Fund Commission on the debt incurred for the rebuilding of the church and the parish house. The women of the parish are paying for the organ, and only one more note remains. It is expected that this debt will be wiped out in a few months. The members of the Young Women's Bible Class of this parish recently gave an entertainment in the Lenwood Psychopathic Hospital, which was highly appreciated by the patients. Ice cream, cake and candy were served, the money for this having been raised by a rummage sale. The rector, the Rev. G. S. Whitney, has made addresses to the students of the Georgia Business College and one of the railroad shops. Miss Marianna P. Ford, president of the St. Thaddeus' Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, Aiken, S. C., visits St. Paul's Branch every Monday afternoon, and fifty women attend her class on the Survey. The third annual Boy Scout service of St. Paul's was held on February 13. The sermon was on Gideon and the rector emphasized many of the Scout laws.

E. D. J.

NEW YORK.

Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D.,
Bishop-Elect.

Church Club Honors Bishop Burch's Memory.

The Church Club for its March meeting honored the memory of the late Bishop Burch. The Rev. Dr. Manning, who is to be his successor, related Archdeacon Burch's words to him, spoken after Bishop Greer had asked him to consent to be nominated as Suffragan, and to the rector of Trinity, whom Bishop Greer had asked to make the nomination. The Archdeacon of that day, who was to become the first Suffragan in the Church, spoke seriously of his own short service in priest's orders, of the greatness of the task, and of his desire if chosen to serve Bishop Greer in all things that would make his episcopate successful.

There was no note of faltering, none of lack of faith in his Leader or in the Church, only expression of wonder whether he could himself meet the needs demanded. Dr. Manning concluded by saying that Bishop Burch went much farther than meeting the needs, not perhaps by superior ability, or even by hard work, of which he did a tremendous amount, but by his own Godliness, his own human sympathy; in short, his own greatness.

The Rev. Pascal Harrower, of Staten Island, told in charming words of the life of the Bishop as Archdeacon of Richmond, his relation to other clergy, the things he accomplished, and concluded that never had a Bishop in the Church died with fewer enemies, he had almost said with more personal friends. He told how people accosted him in the street to express sympathy that Bishop Burch was dead; people who belonged to no church; merely felt the influence of a great heart, and their own hearts suffered by the loss.

The meeting revealed the fact that some people in the New York Diocese had felt for years that they were close to Bishop Burch and enjoyed a rare friendship, supposing they were exceptions from the great public. Conferences held since the Bishop's death prove that practically all who knew the man enjoyed the same. Such is true greatness.

No Cope, Mitre and Staff for Dr. Manning.

A local paper published a report to the effect that Trinity Parish is to present its rector with cope, mitre and staff upon the occasion of his consecration. The report was promptly denied, however, and that authoritatively.

The Rev. Dr. William N. Dunnell is dead at Red Bank, N. J., at the age of eighty-six. For forty years he was rector of All Saints', way down on the lower East Side of Manhattan, retiring from age in 1911. In spite of changed population, All Saints' held on, and still does so. For thirty-one years Dr. Dunnell was chaplain of the Twenty-second Regiment, New York. Dr. Dunnell's first rectorship was at Red Bank. He came to New York in 1871, when All Saints' was attended by many well-to-do families.

The Rev. Duncan H. Browne, of Christ Church, Staten Island, has been elected dean of the Cathedral of St. John at Denver. To this place not long since the Rev. Dr. Milo H. Gates, of the Intercession Chapel, was chosen. Mr. Browne is a son of the veteran sexton of Trinity Parish, long stationed at St. Agnes' Chapel. He is a graduate of Columbia University, and has been remarkably successful at Christ Church.

Greer House, New York, is now Greer Houses, for two large mansions have been connected and beautifully furnished. Already there is a waiting list, with the houses caring for thirty or more. The young women occupying the House are students for the most part, and report a delightful social life, with some restrictions, but not too many. The House owes its existence to the wisdom and enterprise of the Churchwomen's League for Patriotic Service.

C.

A Missionary Institute will be held at St. Mary's Church, Lawrence Street, the Rev. Charles B. Ackley, rector, beginning Sunday, April 10, and ending Sunday, April 17. Addresses will be made by missionaries from China, Japan, Alaska, Cuba and the domestic field, and it is hoped that every one interested in the missions of the Church will attend. An opportunity will be given every one to meet the missioners informally in the Undercroft after each service and meeting. Following is the interesting program for the week:

Sunday, April 10—11 A. M., Mr. A. C. Burdick, West Mountain Mission, Pawling, N. Y. 8 P. M., Rev. C. K. Goto, of Japan.

Monday, April 11—8 P. M., pictures of Cuba, Rev. C. B. Ackley.

Tuesday, April 12—8 P. M., Rev. L. E. Sunderland, New York City Mission.

Wednesday, April 13—8 P. M., services of Intercession for missions and missionaries.

Thursday, April 14—10 A. M., communion. 8 P. M., Mr. Madera, Alaska, illustrated.

Friday, April 15—8 P. M., Miss Alice Gregg, Woman's Work in China.

Sunday, April 17—11 A. M., John Wilson Wood, D. C. L., Executive Secretary Department of Missions. 8 P. M., Rev. Y. Y. Tsu, Ph. D., St. John's University, Shanghai, China.

WYOMING

Rt. Rev. Nat. S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop.

Gifts to the Diocese.

The late Rev. Dr. George C. Rafter, who died in Cheyenne on February 26, 1921, left a bequest of $3,000 to the Episcopate Fund of the Missionary District of Wyoming, and one of $3,000 for the maintenance of the organ and parish house of St. Mark's Church, Cheyenne, which he had served for twenty-two years as rector and seventeen years as rector-emeritus. He also left $500 to Nashotah House and $500 to Kenyon College.

Chapel for St. Mark's, Cheyenne: The former vestry-room of St. Mark's Church, Cheyenne, has recently been fitted up as a most complete chapel, the gift of Bishop Thomas, as a thanksgiving for the recovery of his wife from a serious illness.

L. M. T.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Walter Coe Roberts has resigned St. Mark's, Mauch Church, Pa., and will enter upon a two years' course of study on Church Unity, beginning with the fall term, at the Union Theological Seminary, New York.

The Rev. Percy C. Adams, after a year's sojourn in England, has accepted the appointment of Bishop Talbot to the care of St. John's Church, Ashland, Pa.

The address oof the Rev. J. J. Clopton, General Missionary of the Diocese of Lexington, after April 1 will be 208 College Street, Winchester, Ky.

The Rev. James A. Tancock, after a service of ten years as dean of Trinity Cathedral, has resigned and will remove his residence to the Western coast in the hope that the impaired health of Mrs. Tancock may improve under more favorable climatic conditions. The popularity of the dean and the efficiency of his administration as rector of the cathedral parish was attested by resolutions adopted by the cathedral vestry.

The Rev. Joseph Groves, of St. Alban's Church, Euclid Heights, Cleveland, has accepted the call recently extended him to become rector of St. Clement's Church, Wilkes-Barre, Pa.

The Rev. William Grainger has entered upon his duties as rector of St. Luke's Church, East Hampton, L. I.

The Rev. Leopold Kroll, for many years in charge of the Hawaiian work of St. Andrew's Cathedral, Honolulu, has accepted the rectorship of St. George's Church, Newburg, N. Y., and expects to enter on his duties there the first Sunday after Easter.

Cross-Bearing and Crown-Wearing.

There is, of course, no such thing as "little crosses" in one's daily life course, although one often hears such things spoken of. If a cross is a cross at all, it is big enough to hang on, to die on. If it is not large enough for that, it is not a cross in the Bible sense, or in the classical sense, of that term.

In the modern popular understanding of the duty of cross-bearing, discomfort or trial or suffering for Christ's sake is the all-essential of service; but in the New Testament presentation of this duty, the all-essential thing is the voluntary surrender of one's life to Christ's service—suffering or no suffering. In the one case the suffering is looked at as essential; in the other case, the suffering is recognized as merely incidental. As men ordinarily see it, he is the truest cross-bearer who has most trials to endure, and who endures them patiently for his Master. As the Bible presents it, he is the truest cross-bearer who most heartily puts himself at the service of Christ, for joy or for sorrow, for want or for fulness, for life or for death. Cross-bearing is not hard asceticism; it is cheerful and unquestioning devotedness. It is not living for the purpose of denying oneself; it is living for Christ, even though one must deny himself in order to such living.

It is such cross-bearing as this that prepares the way for crown-wearing. He who would save his life by penances and unnecessary privations shall lose it. But he who would surrender his life for Christ's sake shall find it in a joyous here and hereafter, in the presence and service of Christ.—H. C. Trumbull.

Easter Morning.

Tomb, thou shalt not hold Him longer;
Death is strong, but life is stronger;
Stronger than the dark, the light;
Stronger than the wrong, the right,
Faith and hope triumphant say,
"Christ will rise on Easter Day."

While the patient earth lies waking
Till the morning shall be breaking,
Shuddering 'neath the burden dread
Of her Master, cold and dead;
Hark! She hears the angels say,
"Christ will rise on Easter Day."

And when sunrise smites the mountains,
Pouring light from heavenly fountains,
Then the earth blooms out to greet
Once again the blessed feet;
And her countless voices say,
"Christ has risen on Easter Day!"

—Phillips Brooks.

Let us be like a bird for a moment perched
On a frail branch where he sings;
Though he feels it bend he continues his song,
For he knows that he has wings.

—Victor Hugo.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

RECREATION OUTFITS FOR CHURCHES.

By Arthur Drew.

The following article has been sent to us by the War Camp Community Service, and we consider it so well written and so appropriate for this page that we quote it in full:

Some years ago a clergyman in the State of New York called recreation "the science of forgetting." Great progress has been made in the last decade in convincing people of the virtues of this "science." The leaders in the movement are now concerning themselves with demonstrations of play and the establishment of associations, centers and other media in all parts of the United States. The "why" stage has been passed, and has been succeeded by the "how" stage.

Recreation has lent itself readily to the social program of the churches, so much so in fact that in many towns the work of the Church Athletic League or play center is compared favorably with that of civic or community organizations. Where there is a large congregation, with a sufficient number of committee workers to finance and develop the plan properly, there is plenty of opportunity for games of every sort for young and old. Where there is need of help is in the small church community, which must keep sharp watch on its budget and get the largest possible dividend of recreation on the dollar. Field days and church banquets and inter-church athletic meets are helpful, but first of all there should be provided a working outfit that will keep the largest number of persons happily occupied.

A committee to consider recreational needs—which isn't found in every church, but ought to be—could confer with all the organizations in the congregation, including the Sunday school and the Bible class study classes and the Young People's Society, and find out how large a program could be swung without outside help, and how much the budget could be supplemented with home-made apparatus.

One of the most modest equipments available nowadays is a box containing one set of baskets for basketball, a volley ball outfit with nets, one set of quoits, one medicine ball, and one baseball and club as well as a repair kit. This is a standardized set, used in many small communities. There is another outfit, put up handily for transportation, which has everything mentioned above except the quoits and repair kit. Around an equipment of this sort could be built a recreational outfit large enough or small enough for any kind of church community. It is almost impossible to prescribe a kit that would answer the needs of boys and girls, and men and women alike, but either of these boxes would help children of all ages in their play hours.

The reader can secure further information regarding these kits by addressing a letter to Community Service, Incorporated, 1 Madison Avenue, New York. There is other equipment which has the double advantage of being inexpensive and home-made and also suitable for outdoor uses among several classes of children and adults. A brief description of this apparatus and a slight indication of the material that may be used will be given. A sandbox, for instance, is beloved of the younger children, and may be made of almost any kind of seasoned wood. A good supply of fine sand is necessary, and this must be kept clean. Smaller boxes could be placed on tables if the youngsters find that method more convenient.

Just as simple to make is the swing or horizontal bar. A tree branch, a rope and a board may suffice for the swing, or else a frame of two posts set in concrete, with cross-bar, will serve the purpose. A galvanized iron pipe, well sand papered in advance of use, will do pretty nearly as well as white oak in the construction of the horizontal bar. Posts four inches square and nine or ten feet long will support the bar, after they are set in concrete.

The teeter board has made good in playgrounds from coast to coast. It may be a board on a fence or a rock, or it may be a home-made affair of wood and iron. Two joists, five and one-half feet long, will serve as supports, with a piece of galvanized iron two feet long for a pin. The plank is generally fourteen feet long.

The giant stride is another piece of equipment that may be put together cheaply and easily. An old wagon wheel and an eighteen-foot pole are the main "ingredients." By cultivating the favor of a farmer, who generally has a barnful of old wagons on the retired list, the wheel may be had for nothing.

When the church community has plenty of volunteer help and vacant land, ball fields may be laid out. The standard ball field requires two and three-quarter acres and the baseball field three acres, but of course games may be played, with certain modifications, in smaller areas than these.

A merry-go-round, fashioned somewhat after the turnstile of olden days, can be made with fir boards, and may be depended upon to delight the youngsters.

These devices are mentioned because they can be installed by the Church Recreation Committee without having recourse to playground experts, although, of course, if the advice of one of these specialists can be obtained, it will help in the long run. The point is, however, that the necessary work can be done by members of the congregation. This apparatus is useful all spring, summer and fall throughout the country, and may be kept the whole year round in the Southern States. It should be supplemented, however, with equipment for grown-ups. The standardized kits would be available for the latter element in the church, and would have many demands made upon it indoors in the winter months.

After all, it is not the quality or extent of the equipment, but the determination to get the children and adults playing and exercising, that counts most. A good thing not to do would be to sink a large sum of money in recreation equipment before the members of the church were ready to use it thoroughly. One piece of equipment and a little play propaganda will go a long way at the start. If counsel is desired, Community Service, Incorporated, at the above address, can be consulted.

In some communities a book of games would be useful. There are so many musical games, replete with action and rhythm, that may be brought into play during the winter evenings.

Somewhere between the little outfit packed in a wooden box, and the social center equipped with playground and motion picture theatre, is the recreational apparatus around which your church may build a program appealing to all ages and conditions within the congregation.

Child Welfare Association Enlarges Work.

The economic burden of preventable sickness is nowhere heavier than in the South, where, in addition to a high death rate among whites in many sections, one negro boy out of every five born alive dies inside of twelve months; and where the expectancy of life of the other four is but thirty-four years, as against the white infant's expectancy of fifty years. One may as well hunt the rainbow's pot of gold as look for adequate development of the South's resources while this handicap continues.

Maryland, Virginia, Texas, and notably North Carolina have definite educational policies regarding negro health, and other States are waking to the need. The National Child Welfare Association, in its newly-created department of negro child welfare, offers valuable co-operation to public or private agencies interested in this task. The man in charge of the new department is familiar with the field and its needs, and is in sympathy with the best thought of both races in the South. Inquiry at the Association's headquarters, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York, will bring full information.

It is here desired to call attention to the really remarkable series of posters issued for negro schools, the general use of which would serve the interests of the entire South. They are in two sets—Negro Health and Character, and the Negro Health Crusade. Printed in colors on heavy cardboard they attain no mean degree of artistic excellence, while investing the prosaic duties of daily hygiene with an appeal delightful even to a white observer. State and county boards of education and of health, negro teachers, social service workers and members of inter-racial committees of both races may increase health, good will and prosperity by promoting the use of these posters in colored schools.

"He that hateth his life shall keep it." He that would be saved must be ready to give up life itself, if necessary, in order to obtain salvation. He must bury his love of the world, with its riches, honors, pleasures and rewards, with a full belief that in so doing he will reap a better harvest, both here and hereafter. He that loves the life that now is so much that he cannot deny himself anything for the sake of his soul, will find at length that he has cast away everything most dear to him in this life, if it stands in the way of his soul, and to crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts, will find at length that he is no loser. In a word, his losses will prove nothing in comparison with his gains.—Bishop Ryle.

A sinner must not only cease to do evil, but he must learn to do good. The gospel does not contemplate a mere life of negation: it requires the most positive and active forms of right-ding as well as right-being.—Methodist Protestant.

"Christ's coming(first or second, is always the great topic of comfort in prophetical writings."

Family Department

COLLECT AND CALENDAR.

MARCH.

1. Tuesday.
6. Fourth Sunday in Lent.
13. Fifth (Passion) Sunday in Lent.
20. Sixth (Palm) Sunday in Lent.
24. Maundy Thursday.
25. Good Friday. Annunciation B. V. M.
27. Easter Day.
31. Thursday.

Collect for Easter Even.

Grant, O Lord, that as we are baptized into the death of Thy blessed Son, our Saviour Jesus Christ, so by continually mortifying our corrupt affections we may be buried with Him; and that through the grave, the gate of death, we may pass to our joyfus resurrection; for His merits, Who died, and was buried, and rose again for us, Thy Son, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collect for Easter Day.

Almighty God, Who through Thine only begotten Son, Jesus Christ, hast overcome death and opened unto us the gate of everlasting life; we Humbly beseech Thee that, as by Thy special grace preventing us, Thou dost put into our minds good desires, so by Thy continual help we may bring the same to good effect, through Jesus Christ our Lord, Who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the Holy Ghost, ever one God, world without end. Amen.

For the Southern Churchman.

Easter Chant.

Virginia C. Castleman.

My joyous notes
  Awake to life
The beauty of the fields.
The long, deep silence yields
To my exulting lay
  With murmurous echoes rife.

My thousand voices
  Taek up the strain
And blend triumphantly
In one grand harmony,
While nature rapturous lists
  The jubilant refrain.

Ye birds that sing
  Fill, fill the air!
And oh! ye happy brooks
Bring from your hidden nooks
The fragrant violets
  To make the world more fair.

Banish all sorrow,
  Let sin's dread power
Be vanquished by Love's might.
Bring, bring to the quickening light
The tenderness and truth
  Of the resurrection power.

Listen, oh hearts!
  To earth's spring song.
Lift up, oh heavy eyes!
To God's fair azure skies,
And with soul's music haste
  To join the chanting throng.

For the Southern Churchman.

Resurrexit.

Myrtle Humphreys.

It was past midsummer when the pansy seeds were sown in the bed down beyond the shrubbery; but the tiny green shoots soon forced their way through the soil. When late August arrived they were growing rapidly. Then came golden September, bringing with it the glorious season of St. Michael and All Angels; and by that time the pansies were growing so vigorously that here and there a gay blossom dotted the bed.

Just the other side of the low hedge stood the Church of Our Saviour. In the church yard grew tall elm and maple trees, and their flaming red and yellow foliage stood out in bold relief against the gray background of the church walls. But the nights grew colder, and soon nothing remained in the flower garden but late chrysanthemums. One wild November day, when the trees stood bare and somber, and their fallen leaves swirled wildly through the church yard, a young lady came down the path and called the Russian gardener.

"Ivan," she said, "it is time the pansies were covered."

So Ivan loaded a barrow with dry leaves and piled them thickly upon the flowers. The Red Prince did not like to be shut out from the light, and he pertly thrust his dark red petals up through the leaves. However, Ivan continued his work, and presently even the Red Prince was hidden.

All the other pansies complained bitterly: "Why bury us when we are not dead?"

But after all, anticipation was worse than reality. As the weeks drifted by, they faintly heard the wild wintry wind as it howled above their heads; and they also learned to be thankful for the additional covering which the snow afforded. At such times how comfortable it was to snuggle down in the warm darkness and sleep, while overhead the chimes rang out from the old tower. So the winter passed away.

A time came when warm raindrops began to trickle down, and the covering of leaves became suddenly oppressive. One morning Alexis, the undergardener, came and wheeled away all the leaves. Red Prince stretched his cramped branches and looked about him. His companions lay along the ground with their stems bent and their foliage bleached. He wondered that they did not stir when flooded by the warm sunshine.

One morning a warm rain fell copiously and continued all day. In spite of the downpour, however, great throngs of people attired in mackintoshes and goloshes passed into the church. Red Prince watched them with great interest. He wondered why the chimes were silent and marveled still more when, at an unusual hour of the day, a deep-toned bell in the tower began to toll. Mechanically he listened as it registered peal after peal until more than twenty had sounded. Twenty-two! Twenty-three! Still the strokes followed each other with unfailing regularity. Thirty-one! Thirty-two! Thirty-three!

Then silence. And it was three o'clock in the afternoon!

How cold it had grown—and so suddenly, too! Red Prince shivered and cowered closer to the earth. Silently he pondered what it all meant. As the afternoon waned, he inquired of the maple trees whom he had seen peering into the church over the top of one of the stained glass windows.

"I do not know," sighed one. "It looks very lonely inside the church, for all the people are gone and the aisles arm dim and shadowy.

It grew still colder as evening approached, and the rain splashed drearily upon the gravestones. The trees put their heads together and whispered about the mystery; but failing to find a solution, they tossed their branches in the wind and sighed so plaintively that a young man who was passing turned up his coat collar and remarked to his companion:

"What a dreary evening! Listen to the wind among those trees. It makes one quite despondent."

Next day the rain ceased and it grew warmer. It was still unusually quiet about the church. Red Prince was so engrossed with his thoughts that he failed to notice that the other pansies had grown green and were covered with buds. He slept soundly that night and awakened when the dawn was gray. The old church loomed indistinctly in the morning light; but suddenly a shaft of sunlight shot from the summit of an eastern mountain and illuminated the cross surmounting the tower. From thence it crept slowly downward over the time-worn walls until even the pansy bed was aglow.

And then the Red Prince had a great surprise, for all about him the bed was adorned with gay blossoms. Great purple and lavender beauties stood side by side with wings of gold, whose brilliant petals shone with double lustre in the resplendent light of this most wonderful morning. Even the King of the Blacks forgot to be arrogant; and his one orange-colored eye glared less disdainfully than usual. "I thought you were dead," said the Red Prince softly. "How is it that you live again?"

A clergyman in a black cassock came out of the church and looked for a moment over the hedge at the pansies. Two little girls carrying great masses of arbutus came through the church yard. "It is for the font," said one as she buried her face in the waxy pink-and-white blossoms. "O, see the sunlight! Do you know that it dances on Easter Day?"

Ivan, the gardener, came down the path. Alexis also approached from the opposite direction. Alexis was young, but he coughed continually, and of late had reluctantly admitted that he was tired all the time. The young lady from the house had been heard to say that he would never live to behold his own country again. Before the pansy bed the two men met. Both raised their hats.

"The Lord is risen!" said Ivan; and the other responded meekly, "He is risen indeed!"

Then all at once the pansies understood. Across the valley stood great mountains; and the doves were flying so low that their white wings were distinctly outlined against the background of purple slope. Overhead the chimes were pealing, and inside the church rose children's voices:

Christ the Lord is risen today,
Sons of men and angels say.

So at last the pansies comprehended; and their gay petals shimmered in the radiant sunshine as they joined their song with that of the children: "He is risen."

The Deathless Life.

On Easter we celebrate the victory of Christ over death. That is an immensely important event, and we do well to celebrate it with fair flowers and glad anthems and joyful service, but it is something which took place long ago. A truth which comes nearer to us in time at least, is that in His loved ones Christ is triumphing over death all the time. He says of them, "I give unto them eternal life;' and they shall never perish." They shall die, as Christ did, but death can take nothing from them except dust, which they can well spare; while that deathless life of which Christ is the eternal source, that life the worth of which subsists in quality rather than in mere duration, that life the glory of which will be association with Christ in His spiritual kingdom, will be theirs "forevermore."

Easter.

When in the starry gloom
They sought the Lord Christ's tomb,
Two angels stood in sight,
All dressed in burning white,
Who unto the women said:
"Why seek ye the living among the dead?"

His life, His hope, His heart,
With death they had no part:
For this those words of scorn
First heard that holy morn,
When the waiting angels said:
"Why seek ye the living among the dead?"

O ye of this latter day,
Who journey the selfsame way—
Through morning's twilight gloom
Back to the shadowy tomb;
To you, as to them, was it said:
"Why seek ye the living among the dead?"

The Lord is risen indeed,
He is here for your love; for your need—
Not in the grave, nor the sky,
But here where men live and die;
And true the word that was said:
"Why seek ye the living among the dead?"

Wherever are tears and sighs,
Wherever are children's eyes,
Where man calls man his brother,
And loves as himself another,
Christ lives! The angels said:
"Why seek ye the living among the dead?"

—Richard Watson Gilder.

Spiritual Food.

We would not deprive our children of material food; we send them to school for intellectual food; should we neglect to provide them with daily spiritual food?

If you do not believe they are hungry for it, you will be surprised to note how much pleasure they will take in listening to and discussing with you the stories of Moses in the bulrushes, Daniel in the lions' den, and Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, which have as great a fascination for children as many of the most beautiful fairy tales. These stories, found in the Bibles of Jews, Protestants and Catholics, lead children to their heavenly Father for protection in time of danger, and for comfort in their little troubles.

Many messages in the ninety-first Psalm are also very practical and emphasize the thought of God's protecting care of His children.

Do the children of today know God as an ever-present loving Father, to whom they may turn as some of us did in our childhood, knowing He would hear and answer our petitions? I well remember talking to Him as I crossed the fields on my way to school, asking Him to help me with my geography or grammar.

On looking back upon those days, I realize that it was our mother from whom we learned of God's nearness and loving care, before we went either to Sunday school or church.

A little girl of my acquaintance loves to repeat long passages from the Bible before going to sleep. When she was learning "The Lord is my shepherd," her mother asked her to close her eyes and tell her if she could see the "green pastures!" She said that she could, and then her mother asked if she saw the "still waters." She replied that she saw the waters, but they were all "bumpety." The mother explained that this was because the wind was blowing, and that when it quieted down the waters would be still.

Consider the spiritual influence of those few quiet moments before sleep, when the little child, in the heart of a great city, closed her eyes and saw the beautiful green pastures and "bumpety" waters, and thought of the tender Shepherd Whose loving care ever protects His sheep and lambs from every form of danger.

In these days of social unrest our little ones should all have at least a few moments of such spiritual food before sinking into dreamland, and parents would profit as much as their children from these quiet talks, which help to obliterate the memory of any unpleasant sights or experiences of the day, and bring a peace of mind that is a welcome preparation for the hours of repose.—Bessie Locke, Corresponding Secretary, National Kindergarten Association.

The Easter Cross.

Not o nthe crucifix, whereon Thy form
Hangs bleeding, torn, today we turn our eyes,
But on the empty cross, which high doth rise
Toward heaven this holy day; Good Friday's storm
Is past, the Easter sunlight, bright and warm,
Falls like a benediction from the skies
Upon the earth, where spring's fair garment lies;
Where springs the blossoms from the buried corn
Telling the Resurrection once again.
All things say "He is Risen"; lift thy voice
To welcome Him upon this Easter day
Ye ransomed ones; praise Him, ye sons of men;
Look on the cross and in its sign rejoice;
Behold, the Victor on His triumph-way.

A Smile in the Making.

He looked as if he had never laughed. It was known that he had not even smiled in a long, long time. He was quite dirty and very ragged; he had favus and he itched, with a reason. He was being housed at the French orphanage in Malatia, when he came to the Near East Relief Hospital for treatment for favus, but they had no clothes for him and he was isolated from the other children. So he lived apart, unsmiling, and when he came to us he came because he was sent and there was no expectation in him, no particular hope. What knowledge had he of comfort that should make him hope?

And so he stood before us stoically and because we had seen his kind before we went to work with assurance. He was stripped of his rags; he was bathed; his sores were treated: he itched no more; he was dressed in whole, clean things; and then he was turned loose with the other orphanage children.

It was then he smiled, and he said just one thing to us before we became a remote incident in his new life. It was said in a voice so joyful that it belied his previous sad little manner, and there was not one of us that will not remember the words and their pathos. He said:

"Now I am clean. I can play and eat with all the other boys. I will not have to stay alone, out under the trees."—The New Near East.

An Easter Psalm.

By Rev. Maxwell Cornelius.

Sing praises unto God with the voice of rejoicing, sing praises unto the Mighty God.

For the Lord hath broken the chill of winter and brought the springtime of love and peace.

With gladness of heart sing praises; sing praises for the First Easter Morn, whose echoes shall never cease

Rejoice in God. O ye people: despair and darkness are scattered in the glory and hope of the Resurrection Morn.

Sing praises for the Empty Tomb; sing praises for the Risen Lord; shout praises with a loud voice.

Give thanks unto God; for He hath opened the Door of Life to wonders that yet shall be.

A Risen Christ is the Light of the World: He is the Hope of our Salvation. Praise ye Him.

He giveth us the victory; He dispelleth the gloom of death; He comforteth sorrowing hearts with the Hope of Immortality.

Exult and be glad; for the Lord hath opened unto us the Gates of Righteousness.

Sing praises: for we shall be judged in Mercy and in Love by the Risen One of God. Praise ye Him.

Heaven.

Beyond these chill and gloomy skies,
Beyond Death's cloudy portal,
There is a land where beauty never dies,
And love becomes immortal.

A land whose light is never dimmed by shade,
Whose fields are ever vernal:
Where nothing beautiful can ever fade,
But bloom for aye eternal.

We may not know how sweet its balmy air,
How bright and fair its flowers;
We may not hear the songs that echo there
Through those enchanted bowers.

The city's shining towers we may not see
With our dim earthly vision;
For Death, the silent, keeps the key
That opens the gate Elysian.

But sometimes, when adown the Western sky
The fiery sunset lingers,
Its golden gates swing inward noiselessly,
Unlocked by Silent fingers.

And while they stand a moment half-ajar,
Gleams from the inner glory
Stream brightly through the azure vault afar
And half reveal the story.

O land unknown! O land of love divine!
Father, all-wise eternal,
Guide these wandering way-worn feet of mine
Into those pastures vernal.

—Selected.

For the Young Folks

For the Southern Churchman.

The Easter Song.

Martha A. Kidder.

The Easter song we hear
In accents sweet and clear,
And pause amidst the good and ill
Of life with Easter joy to thrill.

We echo back the song
Of that immortal throng,
From sin and sorrow ever free,
Our longing eyes not yet may see.

Sing, earth and heaven, sing!
Through all the ages ring.
The Easter songs of praise and love
From depths below to heights above.

For the Southern Churchman.

When Easter Came to Lucy May.

M. L. G.

"Yes," said Betty to Lucy May. "It is Easter because the rabbits have come back; and you watch! On Easter morning you will find all the lovely eggs they have laid—every color you can think of!"

Lucy May wondered. On the last Easter she had been ill in a hospital; too ill to know what day it was; and then mother had gone to heaven before Lucy May was out again; so she had to come to live with Aunt Harriet. Aunt Harriet was always very busy, and when Lucy May wondered about anything she usually saved her wonders until father's next visit. Father lived too far away to come as often as Lucy May liked; but he was coming tomorrow, and the next day would be Easter!

So Lucy May did not say anything about the rabbits; she only walked soberly along, holding Betty's hand while Betty talked.

"The rabbits come in the night," went on Betty, "and always the first thing in the morning of Easter I run out and find a basket full of such pretty eggs, red and pink and blue. Then there's the carol service, and the mite boxes and all, but the biggest part of Easter is the eggs!"

Now they had come to Betty's house, so she and Lucy May said good-bye, and Lucy May ran on to Aunt Harriet's house next door.

"I'm glad you've come in, honey," said Aunt Harriet, taking off Lucy May's cap and sweater, "because I must have supper early and go to service."

"Can I come, too?" asked Lucy May.

"No, it is Good Friday, and not the kind of service for little girls. You shall go to the carol service on Easter. Now, can you set the table for me? for Jane has a headache and I let her go home for the rest of the day."

The next morning Jane was well again, and the kitchen was full of pleasant sights and fragrance. But Aunt Harriet said Lucy May must not come in. "You will know all we have been doing on Easter morning," she said. Aunt Harriet had a blue spot on her forehead and two bright yellow fingers, and her apron had bits of purple and red beside. It was very mysterious! but Lucy May did not mind much not being wanted in the kitchen, for she had to gather a vase of white and yellow narcissus for father's room and see that all was fresh and in order for him. It was pleasant to do these things, for she was thinking all the time how soon he would be with her.

And after supper he came! Lucy May stayed up an extra half hour to sit on his lap and forget her sober ways in a good romp. It was only when she was ready for bed, and father had come upstairs to hear her prayers, that she remembered her Easter wonder.

"Father, is Easter because of beautiful eggs?" she asked, when prayers were said and she was cuddled on his lap for a good-night talk.

"No, little daughter," answered father, "Easter is because of a much more beautiful thing than that."

"I know the carols say, 'He is risen,'" said Lucy May hesitatingly, "but Betty said it is all because of the eggs we have Easter."

Then father began, and oh! such a beautiful story of Jesus and His love that death could not stop, he told Lucy May. How when He had died on the sad cross, those who had followed Him came and took His body and carried it with tears to a place made out of a great stone; how the unfeeling Roman soldiers sealed it and set a watch that His friends might not steal away His body; how they came, early on the morning after the Sabbath, the Marys, and Peter and John, to the sad garden, to find the empty tomb, the shining angels, the folded clothes; and how to Mary He Himself had come with the word of tender recollection and of glad promise. Lucy May felt very happy to hear it all; she had never understood what it means for Jesus to have risen. But the happiest part of all was when father told her how much Easter meant to Lucy May and father and mother; for it meant they should surely see dear mother again, and know her, and live always together, alive forevermore as Jesus is, and because He is.

Easter morning was fully come, and the Easter sun shone in on Lucy May's bed before her eyes opened. She knew, before she could remember fully, that it was a happy morning; then she saw her fresh Sunday clothes laid out, and a pretty basket filled to the brim with eggs of every color. Easter! But to Lucy May's happy little heart it was not the eggs—though she gave Aunt Harriet a dozen hugs for them—nor the thought of the carol service, nor even father's being there, that brought the greatest joy. It was the bright and glorious thought of Jesus risen and near to all who love and follow Him.

The Pet Ponies.

Out near the edge of a great city, where the yards were big enough for boys to have jolly times, there lived two brothers named Harry and Dick. These two boys, luckily, liked the same things, so they always had splendid times together. If Harry got enthusiastic about tennis, Dick was sure to think that tennis was the best game in the world. And when Dick had a dog given him, Harry became interested in the dog right away, so interested that his father got him a dog, too, and such fun those two boys did have with the fine pair of Scotch collies they were lucky enough to own!

So it is not much wonder that when Dick thought of a pony, Harry agreed that owning one would be jolly fun. "Why didn't we think of a pony before?" asked Dick; "ponies are even more fun than dogs!"

"Of course they are," said Harry; "we could ride all over town! Let's ask father for one this very evening!"

"For one?" laughed Dick; "for two, you mean! We are too big to ride on one—there will have to be two or none."

"Ponies?" asked father, when at the dinner table that evening the boys told him of their wish; "ponies cost money. Can you earn money?"

The boys thought they could, so after some talk about the matter father agreed to buy one pony whenever the boys had earned enough to buy the other. How those boys did work! They ran errands; they cleaned yards; they carried ashes and they washed automobiles. All through the long winter they worked, and when they counted up their money in the spring and found they had enough, what happy boys they were!

So the ponies were purchased, and then jolly days began. The boys found the care of the ponies almost as much fun as riding, and they kept Frank and Beauty looking their very best all the time.

But in spite of good care, one of the ponies was taken sick—so sick that a doctor had to be called. He prescribed medicine and a rest. So Harry could not take the ride he had planned for that day.

"Never mind about me," said Harry to Dick when the doctor had gone; "you don't need to stay at home just because my pony is sick. You take Beauty and go on."

But would Beauty go without Frank? Not a step! Dick put his bridle on and tried to get him out to harness him, but he laid right down on the floor of the barn and stayed there! The doctor was called again—this time to see Beauty.

He examined him carefully, then he leaned back and laughed heartily. "Boys," he said, when he could speak after his laugh, "you surely have spoiled these ponies! They think each must do exactly what the other does—just as you two do. Beauty is not sick. Just wait till Frank can go out tomorrow and see if Beauty is not able to go, too."

And, would you believe it, the next day when Frank was well enough to go out Beauty looked out of his stall; saw his friend being harnessed, and of his own accord he trotted out and put down his head for his bridle! Wasn't playing sick a joke to play on his little master?—Selected.

For the Southern Churchman.

Easter Eggs.

Henrietta Morgan.

On Easter morning, bright and fair,
Before the sun was up,
A little fairy went abroad,
And touched the buttercups.

Forthwith there sprang from every one
An egg as bright as gold,
And tumbled all about the grass,
Like little elves of old.

Then next she sought the violet—
The merry little fay!
And out there sprang a purple egg,
As sure as Easter Day!

The rosebuds climbing over the wall,
Were next along her rout.
From every red and crimson bud,
Bright rosy eggs did sprout.

Why ask from whence our Easter eggs?
You see it is as plain,
That fairies did it all, my dear,
As rainbows after rains!

The Home That Red-Head Built.

"Something has been pounding on the old apple tree all morning," Willie said as he went to breakfast.

"It is old Red-Head Woodpecker chopping wood," his father answered. "He is building a nursery."

"Is he a carpenter, father?"

"He has a strong, wedge-shaped bill which he uses for a hammer and drill. Red Head has a two weeks' job on hand. Watch him, son, and you will learn more about him than any book can tell you."

Breakfast finished, Willie found a place near the apple tree where he could watch the beautiful bird as he worked. He saw that Red Head used his strong beak just as though it was a hammer. The stroke drove his long, sharp bill into the decaying wood where he had already bored several holes.

Red Head kept on striking and boring until there were so many holes that he could tear the wood away by mouthfuls.

After a few hours of hard work there was quite a hole in the tree, and Red Head would go inside and back out with a load of chips in his mouth which he would fling over the ground.

Willie was so interested that he spent much time watching Red Head work.

"Where is his wife?" Willie asked his father one morning as he joined him.

"Down South. She will follow him in two weeks. He must have the house ready for her when she arrives. Sometimes it doesn't suit her, and he is obliged to build another one."

"I have noticed that Red Head's claws are like sharp hooks and his tail feathers very stiff," Willie said.

"The hooked claws help him cling to the tree," his father explained, "while the stiff tail feathers hold him against the bark. His breast-bone is flat, so he can press it against the tree."

"I peeped in the hole while he was away, and I saw that he is making a crooked tunnel."

"To keep out the rain," Willie's father told him.

"What sort of clothes does his wife wear?" Willie asked, becoming interested in the entire Red Head family.

"She dresses just like her husband. Her head is red like his and her coat is black, with a white waistcoat."

"And are her tail feathers black and her wings tipped with white like Mr. Red Head's?" Willie asked.

"Exactly," his father answered.

In about two weeks the home in the tree was finished, the entrance was round and clean, the tunnel smooth and nicely shaped, while at the bottom was a little bed of saw-dust. Red Head was restless after his work was done. He would peep into the little house and then stand expectantly as though he looked every moment for some one to come.

"His wife will soon be here to see the house he has built for her," Willie's father said as they watched the restless builder.

The next morning Willie was awakened by a tapping on the tin roof outside his window. He looked to see who was making such a noice, and there was Red Head, drumming a regular tat-a-tat-too, tat-a-tat-too.

"There aren't any worms in the tin, Red Head!" Willie said, leaning out the window.

But Red Head kept on drumming. He thought it very stupid of the small boy that he did not understand he was entertaining Mrs. Red Head, who had arrived during the night.

The drumming continued for more than an hour; then Willie saw a second Red Head shyly tapping on the tin at the other end of the roof. He ran to his father. "Mrs. Red Head has arrived," he cried. "Come see if she likes the house that was built for her!"

Father and son slipped softly to the corner of the house. They saw Mrs. Woodpecker follow Red Head to the apple tree. She entered the doorway, and when she came out again Willie's father said:

"She thinks it a very nice house indeed."

After a while Willie did not see Mrs. Red Head coming and going from her little house, and his father told him there were six eggs in the nursery which she was keeping warm.

After two weeks Willie saw Red Head carrying out shells and dropping them as he flew. "There are babies in the nest now," his father said. "Watch how careful the parents are about the food for the fledglings. I am going to give you my field-glass so you can draw them near enough to see what careful parents they are."

When Willie met his father at supper time he had a wonderful story to tell him.

"Red Head caught an insect and I saw him tear the wings off. Then he pushed it into a small hole he had bored in the tree, and he pounded the meat into a pulp before he fed it to his babies."

"Did you see him catch the insect?" his father questioned.

"Yes; he stuck out his long tongue and the bug stuck fast as though it had been glued on."

"You have learned what every one does not know, that Red Head's tongue is covered with a glue-like liquid to which insects stick fast. When the fledglings are a few days older father Red Head will feed them meat without grinding it or removing the wings."

"I peeped in the nest," Willie said, "and saw the babies. They have on little coats of down that look like fur."

At last the little family in the tree were ready to come out and see the big world. Willie saw one little fellow sitting in the doorway while his mother coaxed him to fly to a twig nearby.

After a day or two longer they all came out, dressed in soft smoke color and looking very clumsy when mother Red Head tried to teach them to fly.—The Presbyterian.

The South's Best Book Store

HUNTER & CO

105 E. Broad Street

Richmond, Va.

Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen

Prompt and Reliable Service

Spring Styles

NOW READY

Have Your Old Hat Fixed Like New

Many customers use their old hats by having them made over for their children. We specialize on children's hats.

PARCEL POST DEPARTMENT AT YOUR SERVICE.

VERRA HAT WORKS

211 NORTH FIRST STREET

RANDOLPH 90

"The Store that Pleases"

FOR FURNITURE

Jones Bros. & Co.

Incorporated

1418-20 E. Main St., Richmond, Va

Jno. L. Williams & Sons

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565)

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds.

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson

Security Storage Company, Inc.

Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage

Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 843

NAVAJO SANITARIUM

"In the Land of Waterfalls"

2250 Feet Above Sea Level

Conducted by

Thomas J. Summey, M. D.

Brevard, N. C.

A private hospital for mild nervous and mental cases, chronic heart and kidney diseases and general debility.

On strictly ethical lines. Equipped to care for a limited number of patients. In town and mountains.

Strict attention given to dietetics.

For the Southern Churchman.

The Little Lost Boy.

Mrs. E. Steirling Gunn.

A True Story.

Yes, he was really lost, this dear little boy of five; and was it strange that the tears rolled from his big brown eyes, wetting the roses in his cheeks and spattering down on the big tablet and pencil he was holding so close to his fearful little heart?

The great red brick houses from the four corners of the streets looked frowningly down upon him with never a beckoning hand held out to point him in the right direction home. The big brown school for little boys was a long block behind him; the big door was shut, teacher was nowhere to be seen, all his schoolmates had bounded joyously away, and big brother was not at the usual meeting place to guide him safely home.

What should he do? Deeply he thought for a moment; then with a hurried brushing away of the tears and a quick upward movement of the brown head, he exclaimed, "Oh, I see it, the cross!" Then, with his eyes steadfastly fixed on his guide, gleaming far above him in the morning sun, he ran as fast as his feet would go until—oh, joy! there in front of him stood the big stone church under the cross that had seemed to him so far away; then Martha Jane's pretty house, and right next his own dear home, with mother and daddy in the big front porch anxiously looking for their little boy. "Mother," he said when he felt himself safe in her arms, "I was lost for good this morning when school let out, and for a second I was afraid, but I 'membered you told me one time if I lost my way on the street to look up and find the cross on our church near home, and to let it lead me all the way; and I did."

What if we always kept our eyes steadfastly on the cross as it is being lifted up that it might lead us safely back to our Father's home when we stray away and are lost?

Grandpa's First Speech.

"I've got to speak a piece next Friday at school," said Ted. "Help me find something, will you please, mamma?"

Mamma said she would.

"Makes me think of the first piece I ever spoke," said grandpa. "I was just a little fellow, not near as large as you. And mother taught me this speech:

"'If all the trees in the world were in one tree, wouldn't that be a big tree?

"'If all the axes in the world were in one axe, wouldn't that be a big axe?

"'If all the rivers in the world were in one river, wouldn't that be a big river?

"'If all the boys in the world were in one boy, wouldn't that be a big boy?

"'And if that big boy would take that big axe and cut down that big tree and it would fall into that big river, wouldn't that make a big splash?'"

So grandpa said he learned this speech so he could say it right through, and when it came his time to speak, he went right up on the platform in front and spoke it out very loud, and everybody laughed.

Then he went to go down off the platform—it was higher by several steps than the rest of the floor—he tripped on something there and fell clear down to the bottom of the steps. But it didn't hurt him a bit, and when the teacher helped him up and brushed off the dust from his clothes, he said to him:

"Well, my boy, you made a big splash and had a big fall after it!"

Then grandma told about her first speech in school, and it was:

"If I was tall as I could reach,
I'd make a long tremendous speech,
But since I'm very short and young,
I think I'd better hold my tongue."

—Selected.

Service

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley
FURNITURE
CARPETS DRAPERIES

R. L. Christian & Company
514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.
Leading Fancy Grocer
AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES
Special attention given to out-of-town orders.
Catalogue mailed on application.

The Wing-Foot Electric Shoe Repair Shop
ALL KINDS OF GENERAL REPAIRING
Mail Orders a Specialty
Owned and Managed by T. A. BUNNELL
311 N. Second St. Phone Ran. 1286-W

NICK BULL'S MARKET,
Richmond's Leading Dealer in
FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME
812 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va
Phone Randolph 1680
WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

Reliance
"Perfect Protection"
Continuous Income Means
$50 per week, for 52 weeks, while confined by sickness.
$50 per week, for 104 weeks, while disabled by accident.
$100 per month, for life, is totally and permanently disabled, by either accident or disease. No further premiums to pay in event of disability. No deductions from face of policy to offset indemnity received unde this lause.
$50 per month to your beneficiary, for life—commencing immediately after your death, and $10,000 to your estate, or whomever you may designate, payable immediat ly upon death of above mentioned beneficiary.
$10,000 to your beneficiary in addition to all of above benefits in event your death results from accident.
H. S. RAWLINGS, General Agent
511 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.
Can You Afford to Deny Yourself Such Protection?

R. Geissler, Inc.
56 West Eighth Street, New York
Memorials
FOR THE CHURCH
Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

HOW DOCTORS TREAT COLDS AND THE FLU

First Step in Treatment Is a Brisk Purgative With Calotabs, the Purified and Refined Calomel Tablets that are Nausealess, Safe and Sure.

Doctors have found by experience that no medicine for colds and influenza can be depended upon for full effectiveness until the liver is made thoroughly active. That is why the first step in the treatment is the new, nausealess colomel tablets called Calotabs, which are free from the sickening and weakening effects of the old style calomel. Doctors also point out the fact that an active liver may go a long way towards preventing influenza and is one of the most important factors in enabling the patient to successfully withstand an attack and ward off pneumonia.

One Calotab on the tongue at bed time with a swallow of water—that's all. No salts, no nausea nor the slightest interference with your eating, pleasure or work. Next morning your cold has vanished, your liver is active, your system is purified, and you are feeling fine, with a hearty appetite for breakfast. Druggists sell Calotabs only in original sealed packages, price thirty-five cents. Your money will be cheerfully refunded if you do not find them delightful.—(Adv.)

"If you want a bank with a heart, try the American National"

This is a bit of advice one of our customers gave to a friend who was coming to Richmond.

Our modesty would never lay claim to such a title, but as it was given us unsolicited, we ask you to put us to the test.

American National Bank

Richmond, Va.

The Evangelical Education Society
Of the Protestant Episcopal Church

Office: The Church House, Twelfth and Walnut Streets, Philadelphia

AIDS STUDENTS FOR THE MINISTRY AND DISTRIBUTES EVANGELICAL LITERATURE

President: WILLIAM S. HARVEY, ESQ.

Active Vice-President: The Rt. Rev. THOMAS J. GARLAND, D. D.

General Counsel	Treasurer	General Secretary
HAROLD GOODWIN, Esq.	ALFRED LEE, Esq.	Rev. S. LORD GILBERSON, M. A

FORM OF BEQUEST

I give and bequeath to "THE EVANGELICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH," incorporated by the legislature of Pennsylvania, the first Monday in November, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine, ———— dollars, or ———— real estate, to be used for the general purpose of the Society.

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor

Richmond, Va.

MUSICAL CLASSIC

will make a specialty of strong, appealing articles for thrifty people. "FEEDING THE DRONES," an article to expose the "fakers," will soon appear in MUSICAL CLASSIC. Every issue is interesting and instructive. We give you the latest news of the music world. Subscription, $1.00 year; sample, 10c. MUSICAL CLASSIC, Dept. AHN, South Bend, Indiana. Send for it now.

What a Dime Will bring You From the Nation's Capital

The little matter of 10 cts. will bring you the Pathfinder eight weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for all the Nation; an independent home paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth; now in its 28th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, strongly, briefly—here it is. Send 10c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation eight weeks. The 10c does not repay us, but we are glad to invest in new friends. Address: THE PATHFINDER, 1008 Langdon Sta., Washington, D. C.

Washington has become the World's Capital and reading the Pathfinder is like sitting in the inner council with those who mold the world's destiny.

Earn Extra Dollars in Your Spare Hours

You need no experience to be successful—You can learn as you earn. Let us tell you about our plan.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN is the oldest Episcopal Church Paper published in America. Every dollar received in subscriptions will be devoted to the improvement of the paper and the extension of its service in the work of the Church.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

Street.....

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

FAMINE RELIEF.

For the convenience of our readers we publish the addresses of the treasurers of the various Relief Funds whose appeals for the starving, and especially for starving children, are so urgent and touching. The Southern Churchman will forward contributions to any of these, but to save time, postage and possibility of miscarriage, checks would better be sent directly to the treasurers as below:

Near East Relief (formerly "Armenian and Syrian Relief")—Cleaveland H. Dodge, No. 1 Madison Ave., New York City.

European Relief (Central and Eastern Europe)—Franklin K. Lane, 42 Broadway, New York City; or locally for Virginia, DeSoto Fitzgerald, 218 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.

Chinese Famine Relief—Remit through Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer, Presiding Bishop and Council, 281 Fourth Ave., New York City.

PIPE ORGANS

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID in building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

DON'T TRY ON YOUR NEW DRESSES over your old corset. Let us help you select and fit to you the corset that does greatest justice to your figure. The Corset Shop, 317 N. Fifth St. Mrs. A. J. Pyle, Prop. Phone Ran. 3397.

Doll Skirts Accordion Pleated Free. ASHBY B. PYLE, 315 N. 5th St. Hemstitching, Pinking and Button Covering.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER

Invites you to inspect her line of GAGE Tailored HATS. Also the ADVANCE Showing of Spring Hats in the most attractive shapes.
209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

STAR CLEANING CO.

Richmond, Va., Cleaning, Pressing, Dyeing and Repairing. Prices reasonable; workmanship the best. Special attention given parcel post orders.

NIAGARA METAL WEATHER STRIPS
Saves 25 per cent. Fuel, Prevents Rattling Windows, keeps out Dust, Dirt and Storm.
CINCINNATI REWIRABLE METAL AND WOOD FRAME SCREENS.
L. F. HEROLD,
2 N. 11th St., Richmond, Va.
Phone Randolph 3550.

CATHEDRAL STUDIO, ENGLISH Church embroideries and materials. Stoles with crosses, $7; plain, $5.50; handsome gift stoles, $12 up; burse and veil, $15, $20. Surplices and exquisite altar linens. L. V. Mackrille, 2604 Thirty-sixth St., N. W., Washington, D. C. Tel. Chev. 1915.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

HELP WANTED

YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCATION AND refinement wanted to enter the St. John's Hospital Training School for Nurses (Episcopal), Brooklyn, N. Y. Applicants required to have one year of high school or its equivalent. Course three years. A registered school of high standing. Nurses receive remuneration. Many social privileges. Home life pleasant. Graduates are now receiving $6.00 per day. Apply to St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED FOR 1921-22 AS MASTER IN the Grammer Department of a Church school, an unmarried man with teaching and playground experience. Apply St Albans School, Washington, D. C.

WANTED—POSITION AS COMPANION. Good home desired with moderate salary. Best references. Eastville, Va., Box 16.

WANTED—POSITION AS COMPANION OR companion governess to one or two children. Accustomed to responsibility. Episcopalian. Address Miss A. M. F., care Southern Churchman.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

IN MEMORIAM.

When, in the early days of February, the news came that MISS MARGARET TELFAIR McKIM had passed into the unseen life, those who loved her and many who knew her only through their words felt a great soul had gone from our midst.

Coming of two distinguished families, the McKims of Baltimore and the Harris, sons of Brandon, Va., she united the traditions of a deeply religious life with the grace and dignity of noble ancestry.

Added to this were intellectual gifts well trained.

Belvidere, her father Mr. John S. McKim's home, originally built by General John Eager Howard, was a handsome colonial house on a hill where now Chase Street and North Calvert meet. Here a group of young people, the most charming circle in Baltimore, loved to gather in the late fifties and early sixties.

But, alas! War broke into their midst. The eldest son, later the Rev. Randolph Harrison McKim, then at the University of Virginia, entered the Confederate Army, and others, relatives and friends, also went. Some never to return.

In the midst of all their anxiety Miss Margie and her sister, Miss Mary, with their beautiful mother, did all in their power for the succor of soldiers and refugees.

At this time the McKim family were members of the Franklin Street Presbyterian Church. Some years after, Mrs. McKim and her daughters went to Emmanuel Episcopal, Dr. Eccleston being then rector.

In the first, Miss Margie began her Bible class, later in her own home, where for many years every Friday morning there gathered a group of young ladies to study the Bible under her guidance. And it was real study.

Every week she prepared a set of questions on the portion of Scripture, they were mimeographed and each student had a copy and a question, for which she was responsible. Miss McKim had spent hours of study herself on every lesson, but each member of the class was expected to have her answer ready and to give it without interruption, also to have made it as brief and as conclusive as possible. A doctrinal question was answered by texts of Scripture, not more than eight or ten.

For a historical question much reading was done, but it must be condensed and given in the student's own words. If any further elucidation was necessary, Miss McKim gave it, but never anticipating or interrupting.

Thus were studied the New Testament with the Old, and no one who had the privilege of that study under a leader of such faith and consecration, but has felt all her life that she was equipped for holy service in a way to make her very humble and very responsible.

The last years of Miss McKim's life were marked by sorrow in the passing of her beloved mother, sister and brother. There were several years of weakness and suffering, borne with a cheerful faith and submission, that left no room for pity, only to those who saw her often, the consciousness that she was hopefully awaiting the call of her Master.

It came February 9, 1921, and she entered into rest with her loved ones who had gone before.

"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. Yea, saith the Spirit, for they rest from their labors and their works do follow them." M. L. S.

AGNES BURWELL PAGE.

On January 22, 1921, at her home, "Saratoga," near Boyce, Clarke County, Va., MRS. AGNES BURWELL PAGE, beloved wife of R. Powel Page, Esq., entered into rest.

Mrs. Page, the youngest daughter of George H. Burwell, Esq., and Agnes Atkinson, his wife, was born at "Carter Hall" on September 28, 1850. She was one of a large family of children, of whom one brother, Mr. George H. Burwell, of "Mt. Airy," and one sister, Mrs. T. H. B. Randolph, of "Powhatan," outlive their sister.

The period of her life, though not unusually long, had spanned some of the most important epochs of our history. Her childhood was spent in an environment in every way typical of the civilization of the Old South at its best; an atmosphere of genuine and generous hospitality, of social sincerity, and of Christian living pervaded the life at "Carter Hall" and made its social influence potent, wide and beneficial in our antebellum days. The young girl's plastic mind was permanently moulded by this early contact with the old regime and her subsequent life more or less consciously conformed to the models furnished by her youthful experiences. The dark days of Civil War and the darker days of Reconstruction were formative influences which helped to round out the character of one who was to face a new era and who, as mistress of her own home, was to adjust herself to new conditions and to untried surroundings.

On December 18, 1873, the subject of this sketch married R. Powel Page, Esq., of "Saratoga," son of Dr. Robert P. Page, of "The Briars," and removed from "Carter Hall" to her new home. Here the remainder of her life was spent—forty-seven years of happy home life, of community service, of church work. Six children were born—Agnes R., Mary F., Susan R. (wife of R. G. Mitchell, Esq.), R. P., Jr., George B. and N. B. All but one of these survive to cheer their father in his sorrow. George, the second son, a young man of sterling integrity and finest feelings, died some years ago.

Though Mrs. Page possessed unusual physical beauty, rare charm of manner and vigorous mentality, it was her clearly marked and positive character which was predominant and overshadowing. She was loyal in a remarkable degree—loyal to her friends, loyal to her conception of right, loyal to her God. Her thoughtfulness of others was unfailing her desire to aid the needy was instinctive; her kindness was unmeasured. Her love of truth was a dominant principle; sham and subterfuge were peculiarly distasteful to her; she tolerated no deviation from the literal truth; exaggeration and hyperbole found no favor in her eyes; perfectly sincere and frank herself, she expected sincerity and frankness in others. To her, duty was the mainspring of action; a given line of conduct might not be agreeable or pleasant; but, if it was a duty, that was the end of the matter—the thing was done.

Upon this foundation of unswerving loyalty, of kindly altruism, of transparent sincerity, of compelling sense of duty, a character was developed which stood four-square to every wind that blew. Had circumstances required, she could have shown the heroic spirit of the early martyrs, could have faced the lions and the stake. But, living in gentler times, she was the careful home-maker, the kind neighbor, the loyal friend, the loving wife, the watchful mother, the cultured lady, the devout Christian.

Such a character was an inspiration to her friends; such a life will long be a blessing to the world; "the woman that feareth the Lord she shall be praised."

DISTANCE

Makes no difference to Berry patrons—our Mail Order Department can serve you anywhere; delivery free.

Write for our new catalogue of MEN'S and BOY'S CLOTHING.

The South's "Old Home" store with new blood and best values!

O. N. Berry Co.
ESTABLISHED 1879

Main and 11th Sts., Richmond, Va.

SILK HOSE
DIRECT TO YOU

Saves you 25c to 60c a pair. Our leader—Ladies' full-fashioned, highest grade pure silk stockings, five-thread linen spliced heel and toe: $2.60 a pair, three pairs $6.00. Strongest and best wearing hosiery on the market. Money back if not satisfied.

Free Samples showing colors and quality of silk.

Write for these today with new descriptive Price List of our full line of Silk, Silk Lisle, Fibre Silk and Cotton hosiery for women, misses, men and children—all at our direct-to-you money-saving prices.

HARTLEY HOSIERY CO., Louisville, Ky.

JOHN M. DOYLE
MEMORIAL TABLETS
14 S. THIRD ST. PHILADELPHIA
CATALOGUE ON REQUEST

JUST READY

More "FIVE-MINUTE TALKS"

By Walter R. Bowie, D.D.

SUNNY WINDOWS

Author of "The Children's Year"

AND OTHER SERMONS

Here is another volume of Dr. Bowie's talks to youngsters, all attractively suited to the child mind. The subjects are arresting themes, calculated to almost invariably catch the attention of boy or girl—while the treatment thereof is simplicity itself.

As the Record of Christian Work said: "Dr. Bowie's talks are capital—straight to the hearts of children, clever, interesting, helpful."

Cloth, $1.25 net

For Sale by
Southern Churchman Co., Richmond, Va.

Easter Fashions

Sounding a New Price Note

Easter is symbolical of awaking. It is applicable to the Easter season in the Store—a veritable hive of industry, ideas and fresh new apparel for the glorious Spring Season.

Interest has awakened anew in the Store's goods with the re-appearance of good-looking merchandise of recognized QUALITY and authoritative STYLE at prices strikingly moderate. There is no reason why any one should forego the pleasures of a charming Easter outfit with prices sounding this welcome note.

Women, Misses, Children—all are invited to view the radiant richness of the new modes.

Those who reside too far from the Store to visit it in person are invited to use our Mail Order Department. Write us for what you want.

Miller & Rhoads

"The Shopping Center" RICHMOND, VA.

The Symbol of Happiness

The bluebirds will soon be here, and so will spring. Start a Savings Account and, as in Materlinck's famous story, you will soon find in your own home the "bluebird"—in other words, CONTENTMENT. Money in the Bank is one of the ways to find it.

Planters National Bank, Main & 12th Sts.

Resources Over $20,000,000.00

The Emerson Shoe
HONEST ALL THROUGH

Black and Dark Tan Men's Vici Kid Shoes
THE CORRECTOR
And
EMERSON LASTS
A $10.00 Shoe, Extra Special
at $7.25
Send us your size

Woodall & Quarles

7 E. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

NOW
is the time for all good GARDENERS
to plant

DIGGS & BEADLES

Early English Peas, Radish, Beets, Kale, Cabbage, Onion Sets, Irish Potatoes, Asparagus, and many other vegetable and Farm Seeds.

Ask for our catalogue, which tells

How, When, and Why

DIGGS & BEADLES, Inc.

SEED MERCHANTS

Three Stores, Richmond Va.

Headquarters for Superior Seeds

JULIA LEAVELL McDONALD.

Entered into the joy of her Lord, March 4, 1921, JULIA LEAVELL, widow of Major Edward H. McDonald, of "Media," near Charles Town, W. Va.

She was the oldest child of the Rev. William T. Leavell and Anne Yates. Upon her mother's death she took charge of the rectory at Wickliffe, Va.

In 1869 she was married at "Media," and moved to Louisville, Ky., where for years she was actively identified with St. Andrew's Church.

In 1892 the family moved to the Shenandoah Valley, where she spent the remainder of her life in the home in which she had been married.

Mrs. McDonald was the mother of ten children, eight of whom are still living. She also brought up as her own child the orphan daughter of her brother, the Rev. Francis K. Leavell.

Her heart and home were both large, and many in the "Lower Valley" were happy to share her love and hospitality. She was a woman of culture and had a wide circle of friends. Sweetness, unselfishness and gentleness were her most outstanding characteristics, and the memory of these are a heritage which will be long prized by those who knew her intimately.

The burial service was held in Zion Church, and she was laid to rest in the old church yard.

"Father, in Thy gracious keeping,
Leave we now Thy servant sleeping."

F. M. D.

MARIA LAWSON BOLTON.

Born in Richmond, Va., August 4, 1851; died in Washington, D. C., February 16, 1921.

A maiden aunt with a mother's love in her heart, "MISS MARIA BOLTON," as she was affectionately known to a host of friends throughout Virginia and South Carolina, who will mourn her death, was ever a ministering angel, quick to hear and prompt to respond in time of need or distress. As a member of the household of her brother-in-law, Dr. John M. McBryde, President of the University of South Carolina and later of the Virginia Polytechnic Institute, she was a second mother in the home, with exquisite tact and fine restraint, identifying herself with the lives of the children, entering fully into their childish sports, smoothing out trouble, alleviating pain, bringing comfort and joy and strength by her happy smile, her tender affection, her tranquil courage and simple faith, living wholly for and in those whom she loved. At the University of South Carolina and at the Virginia Polytechnic Institute she took part in every entertainment for the good of the students and of the community and left on all with whom she came in contact the permanent impress of her loving personality. In church work quiet, unobtrusive, zealous, faithful, she stood out as a conspicuous example of spiritual strength, moral courage and Christian charity. Her whole life was spent in the joyful service of others. Freely she gave because she freely loved.

RESOLUTIONS.

Resolutions of the vestry of Christ's Church, Bremo Bluff, Va., Rivanna Parish, Diocese of Virginia.

Resolved. In the recent death of MR. JOHN HARTWELL COCKE, son of the late Dr. Charles Cary Cocke, of Bremo, on December 27, 1920, an earnest Christian gentleman passed to his reward, at the age of seventy-three years.

Mr. Cocke was reared in one of those blessed old homes, where the simple Christian faith and devotion of saintly parents produce an atmosphere which it was impossible to breathe without bringing into one's life the sweetest benedictions of God.

Under these sacred conditions Mr. Cocke grew up and gave himself early to a sincere Christian life, and upon his father's death in 1888 succeeded him as a vestryman and senior warden in Grace Episcopal Church, near Bremo Bluff.

He loved his church and served it faithfully. He was a devoted servant of God.

He illustrated in his daily life, as a man of God, that death held no fear for him.

His was a long and lingering illness, but through all the years his faith never faltered and he bore his sufferings with great patience. His was essentially a loyal nature, and his love and loyalty to his church was one of his strongest characteristics.

Sick or well, a Sabbath never passed that he did not go through the services of his church, and it was often a great privilege to his near by church people, when weather or other circumstances made it impossible to attend church, to join with him at his home these services, which he read so beautifully.

To his widow, who was Miss Lettie Wcolling, of Fork Union, Fluvanna County, we send our sincere and heartfelt sympathy. Through all the years of his long illness she nursed him untiringly, relieving him of every responsibility possible.

Resolved, further, that a copy of these resolutions be sent to her and to his sisters, and published in the Southern Churchman.

L. W. CABELL.
S. T. RANSON.
Committee of Grace Church Vestry.

Easter Day.

Words cannot utter Christ His returning:
Mankind, keep jubilee,
Strip off your mourning,
Crown you with garlands.
Set your lamps burning.

Speech is left speechless;
Set you to singing,
Fling your hearts open wide,
Set your bells ringing:
Christ, the Chief Reaper,
Comes, His sheaf bringing.

Earth wakes her song-birds,
Puts on her flowers,
Leads out her lambkins,
Builds up her bowers:
This is man's spousal day,
Christ's day and ours.

—Christina Rossetti.

simply to be his friend. I have no wealth to bestow upon him. If he knows that I am happy in loving him, he will want no other reward. Is not friendship divine in this?—H. D. Thoreau.

"The Musical Edition of the Hymnal

Has been in use in St. Paul's Chapel for almost a year," writes the Rev. Joseph P. McComas, Vicar of St. Paul's Chapel, New York.

"We have found it both popular and devotional. The objective character of many of the hymns for altar worship is a distinct advance over any hymnal published by the American Church before."

THE NEW HYMNAL

Single copies.....$1.20 per copy
In lots of 100 or more..... 1.05 extended payment
In lots of 100 or more..... 1.00 cash

Carriage Charges Extra

THE CHURCH PENSION FUND

14 WALL STREET, NEW YORK CITY

WANTED Commission Agents And Dealers

To sell Nursery Stock—all kinds of fruit trees, ornamentals and plants. Beautiful illustrations supplied with full information on growing trees and plants. Two propositions offered. Commission agreement and confidential terms to dealers. Big profits. Only TRUSTWORTHY men need apply. Write today.

THE HOWARD-HICKORY CO.,
Box 584, Hickory, N. C.

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health, and, above all,

Provide yourself with Traveler Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank
Richmond, Virginia

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS

FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG

S. T. Beveridge & Co.
Office: 1217 East Cary Street
Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd
Richmond, Va.

HICKORY HILL DAHLIA FARM
QUALITY DAHLIA
Box 227-C, Richmond, Va
Send for a Catalogue

HOT WATER HEAT
For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars
ARCOLA SYSTEM
R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.
9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

O. Luetke's Art Works
Church Furnishings
IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.
Est. 1886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

Skin Troubles
Soothed
With Cuticura
Soap, Ointment, Talcum, 25c. everywhere. Samples free of Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. V, Malden, Mass.

WHEN WRITING OUR ADVERTISERS PLEASE MENTION THIS PUBLICATION

Not Merely

a counting house, but a people's bank and a useful servant in this community.

We believe that it is the duty of any company which serves the public to be a builder of good will in its community, and that its success depends upon the efficiency of its service.

3% interest on savings and dormant accounts. Interest figured on daily balances.
Irrespective of its size, we invite your account.

Richmond Trust Company

Capital and Surplus, $1,200,000

Main and 7th Streets

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary
J. M. Leake, General Agent
E. B. Addison, Vice-President
J. C. Watson, Treasurer
Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

(Just Published)

The Gospel of Life

By the Reverend
PHILLIPS STANDISH GILMAN
Author of "The Church and the Individual," etc.
With an Introduction by
THE BISHOP OF EAST CAROLINA

A pithy book for a busy age, with a vital, practical message of divine truth for the attainment of HEALTH, HAPPINESS and HOLINESS.

READ THE FOLLOWING OPINIONS

"I pray that it may bring a fuller appreciation of all that the blessed Christ may mean to those who are willing to accept His promises and follow Him all of the way."—Bishop Darst.

"It is splendid."—Rev. H. B. Wilson, Society of the Nazarene.

"Spiritual, practical and full of the Gospel of Christ."—Rev. Prof S. A. Wallis, D. D., Virginia Theological Seminary.

"Particularly apt and inspiring. The appendix is of tremendous value."—Rev. F. M. Wetherill, St. John's, Philadelphia.

Price, 75 Cents, Postpaid

The Southern Churchman Co.,

Richmond, Va.

. . . THE . . .

Hundredth Anniversary

Of the Founding of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society

Will be Celebrated

By the Church This Year

The growth of interest during this century of missionary effort, as expressed by the offerings of the people, is shown in the figures which follow.

The offerings listed do not include bequests, interest on invested funds and other exceptional sources of income.

	Number of Communicants	Total Amount of Offerings	Amount Per Communicant
In 1832, the 1st year.....	28,500	$4,476	$0.15
In 1847, the 25th year.....	67,550	51,130	0.76
In 1872, the 50th year.....	251,670	218,521	0.87
In 1897, the 75th year.....	641,951	312,491	0.49
In 1919, the 98th year.....	1,085,068	1,424,997	1.31
In 1920, the 99th year.....	1,096,895	3,027,518	2.76

In 1921, the 100th Year, What Shall Be the Record?

It is to be noted that the increase made in 1920 was equal to all the progress made in the previous 98 years

---

The Presiding Bishop and Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church -Publicity Department, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York

Southern Churchman

DOMINUS FRUSTRA ISIN 1835

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., APRIL 2, 1921. No. 14.

A Peace Message from Old England

Out of the wreckage of the past, this unreality, this hatred on the part of others, let us come at last consoled and comforted.

May the unhappy memories of our lives be scattered in the sunlight of a happier future.

May the wounds in our hearts lose their festering soreness, and may the Beautiful and the Good once more have dominion over us and bring us back into the ways of quietness and peace.

Because of what we have suffered, may we become more merciful, less exacting.

May our faith in the goodness and gentleness of others be restored.

May all clamour and evil-speaking be blotted out, and if we have to suffer, let us suffer splendidly, forgive nobly, and live fearlessly.

MARY PAGE BIRD,
Teignmouth, South Devon, England.

EDUCATIONAL

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

Established A. D. 1823.

The ninety-seventh session will open on Wednesday, September 15th, 1920.

Special Students Admitted

For catalogue or other information, address the dean or Secretary.

Theological Seminary
Alexandria, Va.

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to
REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean
Petersburg, Va.

The Virginian Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded and Epileptic
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-third year of this School for Boys opens September 15, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university. Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to
REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

National Cathedral School

A Boarding and Day School for Girls. Fireproof buildings in Cathedral Close of 40 acres. College Preparatory. Advanced and Special Courses. Music and Art.
The Bishop of Washington,
President of the Board of Trustees
Jessie C. McDonald, M. S., Principal.
Mount St. Alban, Washington, D. C.

CHATHAM Episcopal Institute

FOR GIRLS CHATHAM, VA.

Rt. Rev. A. M. Randolph, D.D., LL.D., Episcopal Visitor
Rev. C. Orlando Pruden, Rector. Beautiful and healthful location. 10-acre campus. Modern equipment. Athletics, Gym. College Preparatory. Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Certificate admits to leading colleges. Catalog.
Mrs. Elizabeth May Willis, B.P., Principal, Box 13

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 3 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each.

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

God keepeth His best till last.

The neighborhood of Christ's cross makes ours easier to bear.

Prayer and pains, through faith in Jesus Christ, will do anything.—John Eliot.

That which ends in self is mortal; that alone which goes out of self into God lasts forever.—Frederick W. Robertson.

Scientific unbelief has its strength in imagination; in reason it finds no support at all.—Canon Knox Little.

"No man can get away from himself. He should therefore be the kind of self he would like to live with always."

Remember who your Father is, and be true to the best traditions of the Family to which you belong.

Christ must taste death for every man before He could offer deathless life to every man.

ST. MARY'S

AN EPISCOPAL SOUTHERN SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

Founded 1842. Four-year preparatory and two-year collegiate courses. Music, Art, Elocution, Domestic Science, Business. Gymnasium. Mild climate makes outdoor life possible the year round. 25-acre campus of old oaks. Fourteen electrically lighted, steam-heated buildings. Moderate rates. Catalog.

REV. WARREN W. WAY, Rector
Box 19, St. Mary's School, Raleigh, N. C.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,
REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt

St. Christopher's School

(Formerly the Chamberlayne School)

A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND VA.

Tenth session begins September 22, 1920 Tuition in boarding department limited to twenty-two boys—$700.

For catalogue, address

Rev. C. G. Chamberlayne, Ph. D., Headmaster

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.
A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. College preparatory. Boarding department 503 W. Franklin Street. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health; out-door life.
MISS ROSALIE H. NOLAND, Principal

ST. ANNE'S SCHOOL

Boarding and Day School for Girls, Under the Auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia
Charlottesville, Virginia
Location healthful and beautiful. General and college preparatory courses. Music and Art. Intermediate and Primary R. R. v. W. C. Brown, D. D., Pres., R v. W. R. Mason, Rector. Third term begins April 1st Catalog sent on request.
MISS EMMA S. YERBY, Principal

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLES TOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

St. Paul's Girls' School

BALTIMORE

A church school where the usual Grammar and High School grades are taught; also classes in Domestic Science. Spacious building; grounds for athletics and outdoor life. Moderate tuition. A few scholarships. Address
MISS MARION MITCHELSON
2411 N. Charles St., Baltimore, Md.

Holderness School for Boys

Five buildings. 20 acres. Prepares for Colleges and Technical Schools. Ranks with highest grade schools of New England, yet by reason of endowment the tuition is moderate. Modern gymnasium. Skating. All winter sports. 41st year.
Rev. Lorin Webster, L. H. D., Rector, Plymouth, N. H.

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., APRIL 2, 1921. No. 14.

THE INFLUENCE OF WOMEN, AND DISARMAMENT.

If there is one thing surely which the coming of women into power as voting citizens ought to mean it is a strengthening of the influences that tend to the avoidance of wars. Though they have borne the less dramatic part, women have been the chief sufferers in the wars of the past and will be the chief sufferers in the wars of the future. Men, of course, have the obvious hardships of the fighting line, and theirs may be the agony of wounds and physical death. But the suffering of women is a more intolerable one because it is more vicarious. They must remain at home and send the ones they love best into danger. They must watch and wait and feel the desolating sense of helplessness to do anything to protect those who are far away. They are the ones who take up the burden of life after the war and sacrifice is over—mothers without their sons, widows without their husbands, sisters without their brothers, maidens without their lovers. Nor is there to be in future wars a protection for the women, and for the children whom they peculiarly must shelter, from the actual hazards of destruction. The recent war lasted just long enough to show the beginning of a hideous inclusiveness of slaughter which reaches out to non-combatants as well as to the fighting army—air raids by day and night on defenseless towns, the spread of poison gas, the stalking of pestilence, and the long, slow effects of starvation which comes from the waste of war. These things were but the edge of the shadow of something that in wars to come might become a complete eclipse to throw the whole of civilization into darkness and ruin.

Women can bring to the question of avoiding war also a certain detachment of mind from those inherited instincts of the fighting savage which belong to the male. Men have been for many centuries so used to war—used to its panoply and its intoxicating passions—that it is difficult for them seriously to conceive of a world without it. Women are less moved by this herd instinct of the fighter. They can see war with clearer eyes for the horrible insanity which in this twentieth century it is, and women have a capacity for idealism which makes them able to believe in the power of the silent motives to conquer old and obvious facts.

It is encouraging to know that there was held in Washington last week a conference of the "Women's World Disarmament Committee." Upon it are such prominent women as Mrs. L. D. Brandeis, wife of the brilliant Justice of the Supreme Court; Mrs. Charles E. Russell and others. The conference is one of many which are to be held in different parts of the nation, arrangements having been already made in fourteen of the States. It was addressed by Senator Borah and Representative Frear, both of whom pointed out the fact which—if public opinion would ever set itself to consider it—ought to stir the whole common sense of the nation into revolt. Ninety per cent. of the total revenues of the United States are spent on wars, past, present or future, on pensions for the struggles already fought, on interest for the fearful indebtedness of the recent war, and on the piling up of expenditures for the army and navy against the dangers of tomorrow. The particular proposal back of which the women are determined to throw their influence is the calling of a conference between the leading nations of the world to consider the reduction of naval armaments. At the present moment the nations, regardless of the great hope that the last struggle was a war to end war, are increasing their navies with the frantic haste of fear and panic, and the country, burdened by such a weight of debt and taxation as it has never known before, is solemnly assured by scare-faced men that to take a holiday in naval building would mean destruction. It is from this madness that the peoples of the earth should insist that we shall all come to our senses, and put an end to the race of armaments which is not only impoverishing the world and threatening society with economic breakdown, but is inflaming the very temper out of which wars must spring.

Has the world, and particularly has America, as the most detached of the great free nations, enough sense and self-control to determine upon a policy which shall keep humanity from general suicide? This is the question which has got to be determined, and we need the sense and spirit of the women to help settle it right.

ROMAN CATHOLICISM AND DEMOCRACY.

A saintly layman of this Church, who through a long life had served in the spirit of Christian brotherhood not only the interests of his own communion, but all Christianity in the city where he lived, when he was dying sent for his bishop and said that there was one thing which he wanted to talk to him of as his final message. He wanted to tell him how much he felt the need of a larger spirit of fraternity among the different churches, and particularly in the relationship of the churches of Protestant spirit to the Roman Catholic. He said that his life had made him know that there are so many noble men and women in the Roman Catholic Church that the gulf of thought which often stops us from a sense of contact with them ought to be bridged. He was urgent for everything that would reduce misunderstanding and promote goodwill.

It was a beautiful message and a true one. There are sheep of many folds which belong to the one Good Shepherd. As men love Christ more, and are sensitive to His Presence, they will be quicker to recognize His influence in those who worship in different ways from themselves. There ought to be, and there can be, an increasing sense of friendship between Christian laymen and Christian ministers and priests, too, of the Protestant Churches, on the one hand, and the Roman Catholic on the other, insofar as we can share together common religious desires and the effort to make Christian idealism count for public betterment.

Yet, at the same time, there is need for that sort of clear-sightedness which distinguishes between religious charity, and an awareness of certain dangerous things which may be promoted under the name of religion. The Roman Catholic Church has often borne a double aspect. It has been, on the one hand, a great fellowship of men and women who are seeking, like the rest of us, the guidance of God. On the other hand, it has often been a compact organization, governed with authority by a little hierarchical group, and so used as to regiment the thought and direct the influence of its people for semi-political ends. In this latter aspect the Roman Catholic Church can be a menace to democratic institutions. Its best friends, both within it and without it, are those who recognize this fact, and where the tendency is seen, try to check it. When, for example, a few years ago, the Roman Catholic cardinal in Boston sought to enlist the vote of the Roman Catholic Church in behalf of such a shaping of the new State Constitution as would have made possible the diversion of public funds for parochial schools, those were the wiser friends, both of Church and country, who refused to follow that direction. And when also in New York City, at the last election, Roman Catholics sought to punish Mayor Mitchel for his attitude toward the regulation of Church institutions which had been receiving public gifts, there was revealed a menace to freedom which hurt the Church and community, too.

That this question has genuine and immediate bearings is well expressed in a sermon preached a few weeks ago in St. Bartholomew's Church, New York, by the Rev. Dr. Leighton Parks, a part of which was as follows:

"The great problem of this country for many years—and it is going to be a great one in the years to come—has been the problem of immigration. In the beginning it was so essential to have vast immigration for the economic needs of the country, that we paid little attention to either the intellectual or moral condition of those who came in. Now, in order that those people may be assimilated, and made a part of the country, the English language, spoken and written, is of chief importance. Very good. The Archbishop of St. Louis, calling attention to this vast immigration which as he says is largely Roman Catholic, and is going to be more so in the years to come, insists that these people should be kept in the racial atmosphere in which they have heretofore lived and to speak their own language—in other words, the perpetuation in this country of all these racial differences that have made Europe what it is today. The result—I do not say that it is the purpose—the result of that would be that all over this country you would have communities of people absolutely under the direction of the priests, as are the people in the Province of Quebec today.

"Another thing is this: Our relations with other nations. Inasmuch as the Roman Catholic hierarchy in this country is largely Irish, there is nothing that they more desire than to bring about war between this country and England, not only on account of an ancient grudge, which may or may not be justified, but because England is today the great Protestant country of Europe, as we are the great Protestant country in the Western Hemisphere; and if these two English-speaking peoples can unite for a great and noble cause, then all the things that these men stand for politically will be swept away. If they are united in a common purpose, then that which is the essence of Protestantism—spiritual freedom and the sense of personal responsibility—will influence the religious life of the world. But if these countries can be divided, then, my friends, the Roman Catholic Church will have domination in this land; the Republic, as we know it, will fail. This is the reason I say that in order to have fellowship, we should face the great danger. * * *

"But if there could be fellowship among Protestants and co-operation to secure that which our fathers bequeathed to us, it would be found that many devout Roman Catholics would unite with us in the endeavor to perpetuate the liberty which is as dear to them as it is to us. That this is not idle speculation is shown by the fact that when an attempt was made a few years ago to distribute the school fund on a sectarian basis in the city of Boston, it was defeated by a decisive majority, notwithstanding that Boston is now a Roman Catholic city. A Protestant fellowship which would create an atmosphere of true democracy would be welcome to not a few of our Roman Catholic fellow-citizens."

WHAT HAS EASTER MEANT?

We have passed through the great festival of Easter We have listened to its immortal message of the deathlessness of life. We have stood in the presence of that Risen Lord, Who transformed the lives of the first disciples, and Who can transform ours, if we will have it so. But what new and actual result can we claim from this experience once more of Easter? Is its gospel to us the mere hearing of an old story, or the new apprehension of something thrilling in its immediate power? As the blind man whom Jesus healed said to his questioners, when already he had told them the wonder of what Jesus had done, "Wherefore would ye hear it again?"

Concerning then the Easter gospel, to what purpose do we "hear it again"?

If this life be all, then that philosophy might commend itself which tells us to eat, drink and be merry, for tomorrow we die. In other words, if this is the only period in which the living spirit exists, and therefore can have any satisfactions whatever, it is wise to seek those satisfactions which this time affords. But if this existence be only a fragment of the true life into which the sons of God shall enter, then what we need to do is to cultivate in ourselves such interests as are fit for noble and continuing exercise. Most of the mistakes which dwarf and damage human character are mistakes not of deliberately vicious choices, but of shriveled perspectives. The boy grows impatient of school and decides that he will stop because he has the offer of some petty position which nevertheless gives him money that to his boyish mind means independence and importance and the intoxication of freedom to do as he may please. He cuts his education short and goes into the thing he thinks is so much more worth while. He plucks the hasty fruit, and sacrifices the deep roots of his life's ultimate resources and power; and his life, because of that first foolish and hasty choice, may be like a tree planted in shallow soil, doomed to littleness all its days. The girl looks forward to her debut into society, and to her excited imagination that year holds the very heart of life. She may not see anything beyond it—may not realize that life's best values, while wholly consistent with all sweet, innocent pleasures, yet are greater than these, and that she must go on past them on ways of steady duty and unselfish choice. And because she does not see this, she may cultivate in herself such habit of self-indulgenge as only by the dicipline of much pain, if indeed at all, can be corrected. The young man goes into his business full of ambition to make a quick success, hasty and impetuous to grow rich, choosing the obvious advantages with no calm discrimination to make him know what the best possibilities of his large service are as leader not merely of financial, but of human interests—as citizen in a community of souls—as a fighter not only for his own advantage, but for the far ideals of the kingdom of God. And when these mistakes are made, which come from the lack of true perspective, the result is always the same. The life is lived by a measure which seems respectable enough when compared with the standard of the things that last through this little compass of our mortal days; it may be successful in its money-making; it may be popular in the estimates of contemporaries who are as transitory as itself; it may win a reputation for shrewdness and ability according to the minds of its day. But the soul has not linked itself with the great, calm processes of truth and changeless duty. Unclothed and empty-handed of all its perishable honors, it goes to that inexorable assize of death. It has not left behind it motives and impulses that are of such stuff as to outlast the years, not has it within itself the eagerness and enthusiasm of spiritual desires which can find their exercise in the endless life.

"Wherefore would ye hear it again?" This question was asked by one who himself has passed through a great experience concerning which he could speak with absolute sureness. His eyes had been opened to behold the glory and sufficiency of Jesus. By such men the Easter gospels were written. As the physical eyes of the blind man at the Pool of Siloam had been opened, so their spiritual eyes had been opened to see through the wonder of Jesus' resurrection the real meaning and the perspective of all life. They knew that henceforth life and its ambitions must be judged in relation to its eternal continuance. It is this most immediate message that the Easter gospel would bring us year by year. To what degree are we in earnest to receive it and to understand it? "Wherefore would ye hear it again?" If it means anything supremely real to us, then this is what it means: that because we have heard it, we must go out into the practical life of every common day, trying to think, to choose, to build as those who feel within themselves at once the challenge and the power of the endless life.

China's Famine and America's Responsibility.

Bishop Gailor, who was appointed by President Wilson on our National Committee for China Relief, sends us the latest statement of the committee with a request for further appeals for these suffering people. The Bishop is distressed at the discovery of certain sinister forces which seem to be operating against our activities in this direction. Misleading statements have been made through the press that the need has already been met, that China is able now to meet the situation herself, that the lack of transportation facilities make it impossible to get food supplies to the stricken area, etc., etc., all calculated to discourage further gifts to save these suffering people from starvation.

We need not be surprised at this. There is an old saying to the effect that "wherever the Lord builds a church the devil builds a chapel," which is another way of saying that there is a spirit of evil in the world, a spirit of Anti-Christ, ever purposeful and ever watchful to counteract the spirit of love and of good works, which is the Spirit of Christ. Surely we have seen enough of this age-long conflict going on in the world, in America, in our own communities, in the past few years to recognize the fact, to cease to be astonished at it, to be warned to "believe not every spirit" or every statement we see in the newspapers or hear in the market-place.

"Unless," says the committee, "these unfavorable influences can be quickly and sharply counteracted, it is impossible to secure the additional funds which must be raised during the next few weeks in order to save from death by starvation these millions who have no other hope of life than that which the additional funds from America will provide.

"The truth is simply that the extent of the famine in China and the consequent suffering has not been exaggerated. The amount of money needed to save the lives of these people until the new harvest comes has not been overestimated. The facts upon which the American Committee bases its statement and appeals come from the Relief Committee in Peking, from leading missionaries, from representatives of American business interests in China, and from members of the diplomatic service. Representatives from these same groups constitute the Relief Committee in Peking. They are responsible for distributing the money which America cables to China. They determine where the money is needed and how much is necessary.

"After allowing for those who are being cared for through the remittances of $4,000,000 which have already gone forward through the American Committee, through the Mission Board channels and the Red Cross, and after allowing also for those who are being cared for by funds from Great Britain, Canada, Australia, and from funds raised in China, there still remain between five and six million people in the famine-stricken provinces who are in danger of death from starvation. There is no hope for these starving millions unless the flow of money which for the past weeks has been going to China from America can be increased and continued until about July 1, when it is expected the new harvest will bring relief. America's unfinished task, therefore, on behalf of the famine-stricken peoples of China is that of providing for between five and six million peoples during the next three months.

"It is interesting to note that the committee's estimate as to the further help needed from America takes into account all that the Chinese are themselves doing to help their fellow-countrymen, which is far more than was originally anticipated, and all that is being done by countries other than America.

"It should be borne in mind that the plans of the United States Government and other plans for the free transportation of food to China have entirely collapsed. The latest and most authentic word from China strongly advises against sending food from America. Sufficient food is obtainable at reasonable cost in Manchuria and South China, thus saving the excessive cost, delay and risk of long distance transportation. The call from the American Committee in China, backed by letters from the missionaries, is, therefore, for funds with which to quickly purchase foodstuffs obtainable on the other side of the Pacific.

"A considerable portion of the famine fund is being paid out as wages to workers on public improvements, particularly in building roads and reservoirs to prevent floods, which will stand as assets for China's progress through centuries to come. Women are being furnished occupation which will be profitable in better times. Children brought together for feeding are being taught the new phonetic alphabet which is destined, it is believed, to diffuse common school education as generally in China as it is in America.

"There is not time, nor does it seem desirable, to put into effect the elaborate methods followed by many of the 'drives' through which big funds have been raised in America. The committee is seeking, however, to create in every important American community a strong China Famine Fund Committee, which must naturally be composed very largely of Church people. Through these committees it is hoped to get the facts before the people in the respective communities and to plead for their generous interest in the China famine cause."

THE RESURRECTION.

When we see the sun set, we know that it will rise again, and so when we see the forms of our friends borne to the voiceless dwelling of the tomb, we know that they also shall rise again. Every night of Death is followed by a resurrection morning. How precious is the truth that God's people shall rise from the dead! How rice? With glorified bodies upon which the second death can have no power. Rise by what power? By the mighty power of God. Rise when? When the Lord shall be revealed from heaven with all His mighty angels, then shall they be caught up to meet Him in the air. Rise to what? To glory, honor and immortality in the presence-chamber of God. How these thoughts light up with brightness the sepulchre of the righteous! How the doctrine of the resurrection throws a halo over every Christian headstone, and makes each open grave a little postern gate leading unto glory! Have you lost a father, mother, child, lover; and were they Christ's? Then lift up your heads, wipe away your tears, cheer up your hearts, for they shall come forth again before your face. Their sunset, though it left you in gloom and midnight sorrow, will soon be followed by the dawn of the Resurrection Day, and when the archangel's trump shall awaken the myriads who slumber in earth's bosom, your loved ones who sunk to rest in Jesus will rise again to meet and glorify their Lord. When the resurrection dawns, it will usher in a day that has no clouds, a day that has no sunset, a day that is followed by no night of sorrow or of death.—Bishop Stevens, in The Lutheran.

THE RELIGIOUS EDUCATION OF THE YOUNG.

The Rev. Elwood Worcester, D. D., Ph. D.

Behold I and the children which God hath given unto me.—Heb. 2:13.

I believe, with Israel of old, that the greatest gift God bestows on us is the gift of children. In them our life begins again, and from them we learn many of the best lessons of life—patience, love, forbearance, happiness, the joy of innocence which we have learned from no other source. "No crucifix," says Stanley Hall, "ceremonial, rite, song nor act of worship is more satisfying to dying eyes than that object which is more worthy of love, reverence and service than any other in the world—a newborn child." We naturally desire for our children the best gifts and the fairest, happiest life, and we who have had experience of life, and who know the value of what earth sells, what it lends and what it gives away, long to impart the lessons life has taught us to our children. If we have found our deepest peace in God, and if the religion of Jesus Christ is to us the best philosophy of life, these are the things we naturally desire to give to them.

The late Pierpont Morgan felt this so keenly and conceived of it so literally that he actually attempted to transmit his faith in Christ to his children by testamentary bequest. There is something touching and child-like in this thought of the old, world-experienced financier, though we know that, as a rule, faith is not bestowed in this way. It comes by contact with persons who possess it. Faith, the greatest thing in the world, comes to us all, at first, partly by example and partly by authoritative teaching. It was the profound wisdom of the Jesuits which formulated the saying: "Give me the child to teach until he is twelve years old, and I care not who teaches him afterwards." We do not believe at first because it is good to believe, or because it is reasonable to believe, but because we are taught to believe, because others believed before us and still believe all around us. And this old traditional motive, though not the highest motive in religion, is apt to be the strongest, the most persistent, the least inclined to change. But just on this account we ought to be very careful as to what we teach our children and what we allow them to be taught as to God and Christ, God's government of the world, the Church, the Bible, the origin of life, creation and the life after death. For in the long run faith is judged by truth. Most of us remember the struggles we went through in early life when we attempted to reconcile the old faith we learned as children with the new knowledge we learned at college and from our reading. This struggle, the reconciliation of faith and knowledge, which is only another name for the attempt to unify the spiritual and the intellectual elements of our own nature, will go on forever. But we ought not to make it too difficult to our children by imparting to them shallow, false and outworn views in regard to the supreme mysteries.

We criticize the Church today, and we look back to the teaching of our childhood, when everything seemed so much simpler and more easily understood. But whatever loss of influence the Church has sustained, she has gained enormously in spirituality and fearlessness in her differentiation of the important and the unimportant things of religion and in her attitude toward truth.

The greatest blessing that has come to the Church has come through her renewed knowledge of Christ. This is one field where science and religion have worked helpfully together. No religion is so intimately associated with the person, the life, the example of its Founder, as Christianity. Jesus, in a literal sense, is the author and finisher of our faith. To know Him is to know all, and to be ignorant of Him is to be ignorant of His religion. No generation of Christians, since the first, has had such opportunity to know the mind, the purpose, the spirit, the life, death and resurrection of Christ as we have today. There never was a time when Christ's influence in the world, despite this war, which was largely the overturning of principles opposed to His, was greater than it is now. Christ and His conception of life are the great outstanding moral fact of our world. There can no longer be any question that His religion will be the final and all-conquering religion, the religion, if we are worthy of our calling, of all mankind. It is the religion of freedom and of the Spirit. His Spirit is working today not only in the Church, but everywhere where men aspire to liberty, human brotherhood, the life of the soul and the love of God.

Whatever claim of His may be accepted or rejected by this generation—this claim must stand: Jesus Christ is the teacher of mankind. Lessing praised Him because He first won mankind to belief in eternal life and did away with temporal rewards and punishments. Higher praise is due Him because He changed all man's conceptions of his spiritual and moral relationships, thereby creating the possibility of a new heaven and a new earth. He found men either without God in the world or seeking to disarm the anger of a jealous and revengeful Deity, and He taught them to believe in a God of love. And He did this not by a lowering of moral standards, but by laying down a law of life which seems only designed for angelic beings. He found the human family divided by national jealousy, by racial antipathy, and by mutual hatred, and rising above all these prejudices, He first conceived of the human race as a unity as children of God, and He sought to unite the whole world in His great bond of love. That no one had done before Him. That no one could do after Him, for He had done it.*

No matter in what company we find ourselves, Jews, heathen, the learned, the sceptical, we need never blush for Jesus Christ, though He may often be ashamed of us. Some one once tried to flatter Immanuel Kant, perhaps the greatest thinker of all time, by comparing him to Christ, but Kant rebuked him, saying, "He is the Master from whom we must all learn. I am but a bungler trying to express His thought." The world of His day, wearied by too much vice, desired to see a righteous man. Jesus showed them one.

The surprising fact in regard to Jesus is that if He did not convict Himself of sin, neither can we convict Him. His life has been studied under the microscope as no other human life ever has been, or ever will be studied, and even His least prejudiced critics—Strauss, Renan, the Jew Spinoza—hail Him as "the one pure temple of God," "the Being without Whose presence in the heart true piety is impossible"; "the most beautiful incarnation of God in its most beautiful form." We shall make no mistake in teaching our children to know and to love this Being.

Among His ideals I select three which seem to me of profound pedagogical importance: the estimate He placed on the human soul, the place He gave to love, and His reverence for childhood. All true education is based on belief in the value of individual souls. Teachers who crush children and who tyrannize over them deserve the abhorrence they inspire. In countries where human nature is despised and where human life is held cheap, people do not concern themselves with the long labor of education. The more we value life, the more pains we take to train it. At the time of Christ, owing to the general relaxation of marriage, children were not desired, and when they came, their education was generally intrusted to slaves. The Emperor Nero was brought up by a dancer and a barber. Jesus, to His glory be it said, successfully opposed His ideal of the sanctity of human life to the swelling tide of sexual immorality which threatened to overwhelm the world. The great historian Harnack says: "No mind can conceive, no pen describe, the depth of moral depravity to which the world would have sunk, but for Christ, in the second and third centuries." Wherever His religion took root virtue sprang up. No one fact in the new religion amazed the heathen so much as the purity of Christian lives and homes. In spite of the liberty granted to women for the first time in the ancient world, and the great freedom of companionship between men and women in the little Christian communities, hardly a story from a lapse from virtue has come down to us from those days. But where women are honored, children are loved. Other things being equal, teachers who recognize in their pupils spiritual beings in whom their labors will bear eternal fruits, find a motive and an incentive in their work that others do not find. The reverence we feel for human nature and our sense of the worth and eternal significance of every human soul, comes to us almost altogether from Jesus. It was He who said: "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" This Kant recognized as the highest principle of moral conduct, which he expressed in the maxim—"To treat men always as an end in themselves—never as a means to an end."

Secondly, I would cite the universality of Christ's love and sympathy. With Him this was no mawkish sentimentality, based on high-sounding phrases, but the direct corollary of His belief in God as the one Father of Mankind. If all men are the children of one God and that God is love, love is the natural disposition of those who believe themselves to be sons of God. This is the greatest principle of our religion and also the most difficult to realize. It aims the dissolution of the system of caste, at breaking down the eternal enmity and hatred which exist between man and man, between nation and nation, and at uniting us all in the bond of a common spiritual life. The bearing of this principle upon education is very obvious. Christianity, as a religion, was offered to all. If any distinction was made by Jesus, it was in favor of the poor, the simple, the uninstructed. "In Christ Jesus" Paul was able to say, "Neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision." In them is neither "barbarian nor Scythian, neither bond nor free." The gospel was preached to all. The highest life was offered to all. The ideal of the religion is that all men, without distinction of race or sex or social status, shall be brought to the perfection of which their natures, under God's fostering care, are capable, and until that ideal has been realized the greatest principle of Christianity has failed, just in proportion to the number of persons in the world sunk in ignorance, evil, hatred and sorrow.

---

*" I do not deny or forget the beautiful Stoical doctrine of the moral unity of the human race, but that which in Stoicism remained a mere idea, in Christ became the creative principle of a new world.

I know that there are persons in Christian lands today who value the advantages of education and culture, chiefly because such advantages set them apart from the common herd of mankind. But that culture is a spurious culture, and their religion is a false religion, I care not in what terms they express it. To me it is a cause of deepest sorrow that all mankind cannot share the blessings God has given me, chief of which I count revelation of truth. If this knowledge were a mere luxury, an elegant accomplishment out of place, as a silk dress, in a poor hovel, there might be reason in what they say. But if the culture of the soul is a holy thing, holy as religion itself, they are blasphemers and false stewards of the mysteries of Christ, who wish to exclude any human being from its blessings, and who deny that man is by nature the child of God and of the light. Teachers and ministers ought not to be suspected of entertaining mercenary sentiments in making choice of their professions. But if our calling, which is at bottom one, is not lucrative, it is holy. The teacher is one called of Christ. He has received his commission, "Feed My lambs." Of him also it may be said, "It is not you that speak, but the spirit of My Father which speaketh in you."

Thirdly, let me speak briefly of Christ's attitude toward children, one of the loveliest traits of His character. When the disciples were disputing as to who should be first in the kingdom, He took one of the little children which believed in Him, embraced him and set him in their midst, saying, "Except ye become as little children ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." Like all great men Jesus adored children. In the child's humility and innocence and faith and love, He saw the truest picture of the kingdom of God. He demanded the highest reverence for children, "Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones." He said, "He that receiveth one of these little ones, receiveth Me," and against the oppressors and corrupters of children He uttered His terrible malediction, "Better were it for that man that a mill-stone were hanged about his neck and that he were drowned in the depths of the sea."

We imagine that the religious teaching of children in Sunday school is a new thing, but we are mistaken. St. Luke, in the introduction of his gospel, dedicates his work to a certain very excellent Theophilus, and he tells him that he has written one of the greatest gospels we possess in order that Theophilus may know the certainty of the things in which he has been catechised. The old Church devoted far more time than we do to the religious instruction of the young, and she proved her wisdom by her success. After the death of the apostles few great missionary preachers arose, and yet during those years the whole Roman Empire was converted. How was this accomplished? Largely through the schools.

There is a general feeling abroad today that nothing but religion can save the world. And if the world is to be saved by religion, it must be by the Christian religion, for no other religion can do it. But if this is so, then we must look to our children, for if they grow up pagan at heart and indifferent to religion, where are the true Christians to come from? It is in childhood that the indelible impressions of life are made and the foundations of a fair and useful life are laid. All churches and associations, with views to propagate, recognize this and are looking more than ever to the religious training of children. The Socialists have their Sunday schools. The Christian Scientists have theirs. Their great period of conversion has already passed, yet the movement continues to grow and spread through the education in Christian Science of the children of believers. The Jews are keenly alive to the necessity of doing something to offset the tremendous disaffection of their young people toward Judaism, and they are right. The godly and devout Jew, like Jacob Schiff, is among the most admirable of men. The ungodly and irreligious Jew is a curse and a menace to mankind.

Our own Church and our own Diocese and parish are keenly alive to the situation. We at Emmanuel are doing all in our power to make our church school more attractive, a model school in its courses and its teachers, but we cannot succeed without your help. We have our children with us for so short a time. When we begin with a new child it seems as if the time would be long, but in a few short years the child passes from home to school and college, and our direct opportunity to teach and influence it is over. May I then ask these things of you? At all events, to give the Sunday school a fair trial by sending, or better, by bringing your children, and by taking part in the children's service?

But there is another thing of even greater importance—the recognition and practice of religion in the home. True religion is not taught, it is transmitted. We who possess a religion today derived it from some one who possessed it before us. I have been in Boston more than sixteen years, and I have had the opportunity to observe many families and many persons. And I have seen that the happiest and the most united families are those in which religion is a real and living thing, and that our finest and most useful men and women are the children of believing parents. We who can look back to such fathers and mothers know what we owe to them, and how their bright images have gone with us through life, and how their words and examples rise in our hearts through the infinite depths of memory, and their counsels fall on our ears like voices from another world. "I have given myself to the service of God," said Hillel the Jew; "no cry of despair shall go forth from my house."

How the First Protestant Missionary Came to Rio Grande.

The Rev. James W. Morris, D. D.

I was talking recently to a man, whom I shall call Mr. C., who was instrumental in bringing the first Protestant missionary to Rio Grande. Far back in 1868 C. was a youth living with his widowed mother near Rio Grande. His mother had planned to send him to New York, where he had a relative; but as this latter died just as the boy was ready to go, the plan came to nothing. But one doy C. rode into Rio Grande to make some purchases at the English drug store. The proprietor of this establishment quite suddenly suggested that the youth go with him to England. He was to leave within three days, and would take him and locate him in some business house connected with Brazil. Young C. at once mounted his horse and rushed home to secure his mother's permission. As he needed not to buy any outfit, clothes in England being much cheaper and better, he was able to persuade his mother to consent, and bade farewell to his country for many more years than he ever anticipated. He was left by the English friend in Liverpool, under the care of a great merchant, who promised not only to give him employment, but to aid him in other ways. It is interesting that the first book that he read through was the Bible, and the next was an illustrated copy of Pilgrim's Progress, solid enough literature for a young foreigner. One Sunday morning, after he had begun to talk a little bit, his employer invited him to attend church with himself and wife. They went to a great Methodist Church, where a distinguished man was preaching that day. C. was deeply impressed by the singing of the immense congregation, but could catch not a sentence of the great orator, who, like most of his kind, spoke like a whirlwind. Finally the offering was taken—a thing he had never seen. He watched closely, and noted the usual amount that people gave. and so when the plate approached him and his two dignified friends, he quietly sprang up and in broken English cried, "A shilling for three, please!" Then from the horror of some and amusement of others, he saw that he had made a mistake of a serious kind.

This, however, was the beginning of C.'s attendance upon the Wesleyan Church. He later married a daughter of a prominent Wesleyan layman, and settled down regularly in England.

After many years business, connected with family affairs, took C. back to Rio Grande, where he remained for a considerable time. He was impressed by the sad state in which Christianity had fallen: the one priest in the city of Rio Grande was a man of vicious habits, the church was abandoned except at times of festivals, and the whole religious tone was distressingly low. Therefore, when he returned to England he wrote a letter to one of the principal religious periodicals, telling something of his life, and setting forth the unhappy impressions that had been made on him by his visit to his native land. He concluded with an earnest appeal that some competent missionary be sent to Rio Grande to teach the truth to his people.

As a result of this letter, Mr. Hodder, the publisher, and other prominent men raised money and sent out to Rio Grande the Rev. Mr. Vanorden, who was, I think, a converted Jew.

This man established services, gathered a little congregation, and especially set up a small book store and printing press, thus distributing much Christian literature. He had to endure severe persecution, and on several occasions the then American consul, Mr. Krischke, father of Mrs. Meem and of our Rev. George Krischke, rescued him when indeed his life was in danger. Mr. Vanorden became connected with the Synod of St. Paul's, of the Presbyterian Church, and later removed thither with his printing establishment. Mr. Kinsolving and myself met him there when we arrived in 1889.

Later the little congregation in Rio Grande was given by the Presbyterian brethren to our care, and under Kinsolving, Brown, Ribble and others, developed rapidly. Today in the flourishing congregation of the Church of our Saviour in Rio Grande, there are still those who trace their knowledge of the gospel back to the work of Mr. Vanorden.

THE CALL TO UNITY.

Christian unity is no mere ecclesiastical problem. It is the greatest and the most far-reaching of all present day questions. It lies back of, and holds the key to, all our other problems, national and international, social, political and economic. As men face the tremendous responsibilities and tasks of this new time, they are feeling the need of support and guidance. They know that if there is to be a new order it must be filled with a new spirit. They are looking for moral and spiritual strength and help. But they are not looking with confidence to the Church for this. A disunited Church cannot call forth the faith of men, nor give the message of Christ to the world. Its own inconsistency and self-contradiction are too evident. How can the world learn the gospel of fellowship from an organization which is at variance with itself? What power is there in an appeal for a united world issued by a divided Church?

The Church should be the inspiration and guiding force of the present movements for social advance. Changes far greater than any of us realize are taking place. We have entered into a new era. The truer order of co-operation, fellowship, brotherhood, is to be established. In all this the Church should be, not a spectator, nor a mere sympathetic influence, but the great guiding power. The one true hope of the world is that these movements shall be actuated by the spirit and the principles of Christ. There should now be a world-wide call from the Church for a redeemed social order, in which the spirit and law of Christ shall rule for the bringing of Christian principles into the whole fabric of modern civilization in every department of life. Who but the Church can issue such a call? What other power but that of religion is able to bring the spirit of brotherhood into human relationships and "to make justice and love the controlling motive in all social conditions?" But her own divided state makes it impossible for the Church to give such a call with effect. "Doth a fountain send forth at the same place sweet water and bitter?" Can a Church which is divided by the spirit of sect liberate men's hearts from the spirit of class and caste? Can a Church which maintains barriers of religious antagonism and division be the herald of co-operation and of the common life?

The whole fabric of democracy is based on belief in God. Everything is staked on the right judgment and moral principle of the people. Education alone does not give moral principle. A trained intellect has no necessary connection with right conduct. There is no other basis for moral conduct except religion. The distinction between right and wrong disappears, or becomes a mere convention, if we cease to recognize God and His law. But as to this, upon which the character of our people and the life of our country depend, our schools are compelled to keep silence. Children are influenced more by what we do than by what we say. And between our provision for them in regard to education and our provision for them in regard to religion they see a contrast which cannot fail to impress them. They see education carefully provided for by the State, and religion carefully excluded. With their companions, on six days in each week they enter the door of one schoolhouse; on the other day they go in separated groups, if they go at all, to differing and rival religious teachers. As to education they see visible unity; as to religion they see visible dissension and disunity. A member of the Board of Education of the city of New York was reported recently as saying, "We fully understand that a system of education from which God and religion are excluded provides only for a civilization which must crumble to pieces." And it is the divisions among Christians which are compelling us to maintain such a system.—Rev. Dr. W. T. Manning, D. D.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

THE OPEN PULPIT IN ST. JOHN'S, WASHINGTON.

Mr. Editor: Your editorial in the Southern Churchman on March 5 on "Some Experiences With the Open Pulpit" is illustrated in a very notable way in St. John's Church, Washington, D. C. This church has been known for a full century as "conservative" in its ecclesiastical and social churchmanship, and any change in its order of Lenten services deserves attention because it signifies the incoming of a new spirit in the church and a certain power in the new spirit.

This city is the very spot where such a spirit should manifest itself at this time. While "Christian unity" is in the air of the whole Protestant world, the necessities of war have made it a live question in Washington. A great number of the clergy of all the churches, either as chaplains in the army or navy or active in the work of the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A. and the many other associations for Christian work, and the many lay people who were associated with them have been brought into personal contact with each other in such ministries as our blessed Lord describes in the twenty-fifth chapter of the gospel according to St. Matthew.

By this co-operation these people have come to know each other as "Christian workers," regardless of church affiliations, and have found a bond of peace in their unity of spirit, and they value it and will not lose it again.

As the Rev. Dr. Roland Cotton Smith, the rector of St. John's Church, is unhappily absent on account of ill health, the Rev. Canon Douglas, D. D., of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York City, and lovingly remembered as former rector of the parish, who is acting rector, quite in the spirit of Dr. Smith, arranged a series of afternoon services during Lent, at which the speakers are bishops, clergymen and laymen of the Episcopal Church, and a bishop, clergymen and laymen of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and Baptist Churches, who represent the different politics of the Protestant churches.

The congregations have been large, and the effect all that could be desired. We have "got together" in Church as we "got together" outside of it while we were engaged in Christian work during the war.

A gratifying feature of the movement is the wide approval given by our Church authorities and eminent laymen. Bishop Tuttle, the Presiding Bishop; Bishop Gailor, president of the Council, and many other bishops, clergymen and laymen have sent their hearty approval of this practical outcome of the recommendations of the Pan-Anglican Council. It is hoped that this long step towards Christian unity will be noticed and followed by other churches till the unity of spirit results in a unity which will answer the prayer of our blessed Lord, "that they all may be one."

The special features of the unity services at St. John's Church, Washington, D. C., are of a character which distinguishes them from those which are held elsewhere. They disarm criticism on the part of our "advanced" brethren, and are not offensive to our Protestant friends, but meet them on common ground, and thus are a step forward which is permanent and need not be retraced. They are in a movement where all have equal place. They are not in the same category with the layman's services at Keith's Theatre, where clergymen and laymen of all names can take part because they are held where no ecclesiastical associations are intruded by reason of the place and surroundings where they are held; but St. John's is a well known "Episcopal Church." This is an element of importance. In the Lent services this year bishops, clergymen and laymen of our own Church and the other churches speak on the same footing, from the same pulpit in a series of devotional rubrical services.

It will be observed that these services emphasize the prophetic and not the priestly office. All speak as Christian prophets in an effort to advance the work of our blessed Lord, and it is acknowledged by those who are seeking Christian unity as the proper avenue of mutual approach. I recall a discussion, sixty years ago in the early days of my ministry, between a "High Church" clergyman, a "Puseyite" and the Rev. Edward Beecher, a Congregational minister, and a brother of Henry Ward Beecher, of Brooklyn, N. Y., on Christian unity and the most promising method of approaching it. Both agreed that the prophetic ministry of all Christians afforded the best and, indeed, so far as they could see, the only avenue of brotherly approach. As the prophets deal with the deep things of the religious life they would lay the foundation, and open the door for the later consideration of the priesthood. Now, after sixty years, I see this view taken and put into actuality in Old St. John's, by Canon Douglas, with the approval of our Church authorities, the glad consent of many of our eminent clergymen and laymen, and the ready co-operation of our brethren of other churches. The whole matter was specifically put forward in the preliminary (announcement) publication of the Lenten services, and the interest shown by the large attendance and the gratifying remarks of those who hear the same message from clergymen and laymen of all names show that the right Christian note has been struck. When Christian churches of whatever name, though indifferent of organization, are shown to have the same foundation and faith and deliver the same message to men, we find that we are of one spirit, which is a bond of unity and a ground from which to advance towards the desired goal.

GORGE WILLIAMSON SMITH.

Washington, D. C., March 21, 1921.

CORRECTION OF NEWSPAPER REPORT.

Mr. Editor: I wish you would give space to this brief statement, published to show that, in the matter referred to, I was not in error and had never made an apology.

Baker P. Lee.

Los Angeles, Cal.

March 16, 1921.

To the Los Angeles Times:

In a recent article published by the Times, and copied by the Associated Press, an erroneous impression has been created in the minds of many people as to the action of the Rev. Baker P. Lee.

The marriage of Mr. Du Pont and Miss Ball by Mr. Lee was legal, and from evidence submitted to him, he felt canonically justified in performing the ceremony. An explanation was courteously given by him to the Bishop, courteously received, the Bishop was satisfied and the matter satisfactorily closed.

We, therefore, request that the Times and the Associated Press will correct the erroneous impression above referred to that has been created.

(Signed) BAKER P. LEE,
FREDERICK C. VALENTINE,
Chancellor.

The Great Commission.

METHODS OF FAMINE RELIEF IN NORTH CHINA.

The following paragraphs are taken from personal letters of Carl Remer, of St. John's University, Shanghai, who, with other faculty members, has been doing relief work. The definite details of distribution may be of interest to those who wonder how relief can be administered in a land of few and poor means of transportation.

"The first work that is done in bringing relief is to have the villages investigated. This is done by the Chinese office staff They go to a village and are met by the head man. He takes them to see every family in the place. The families that need immediate assistance are put down as first class, noting how many members in each. The families that are able to hold out a little longer are put in the second class, and those still better off into the third class. Then there are, of course, some that do not go down at all, because they have enough grain to take them to the harvest.

"When this preliminary information is secured there is a good deal of office work to be done. The names must be entered in a book here at the office, wooden tags must be prepared to be given out to the people, and a catalogue of names and dates must be made.

"The grain is supposed to come at the rate of eight cart loads a day. Each cart carries about a ton of grain. . . .

"We took one village and did the investigating work ourselves. We went, during the afternoon, into the residence of every family in a village of 100 families, with the exception of four or five. There is no Chinese doctor in town, nor is there a school. There used to be a temple, but it has fallen down, and all that is left is three bells on a pile of rubbish. In this village we found forty-five families that needed help at once and about ten that needed no help at all. This village is much better off than the average. but the people are now (January 29) reaching the end of their resources. . . .

"The ration for relief work is about three-fourths of a catty—about one pound—per day per adult and half of that for a child. We give ten days' supply to those whom we feed, and they come in three times a month.

"The plan is to admit the people, village by village, and to line them up in two lines, one for each bin of grain. As a man approaches the bin his wooden ticket is looked at by a clerk, who picks up the card on which is recorded, for office purposes, the name, amount and date. The card is passed to a second clerk, who shouts the amount to the coolies at the bin. The man getting the grain puts his bag at the mouth of a tin funnel (made of Standard Oil tins) and the amount shouted out is poured in. . . . Our friend who has received his grain gives his bag a twist, throws it over his shoulder and makes out of another gate. The whole business is done in an orderly and decent fashion. We distributed 10,000 catties of grain to 500 persons in about an hour and twenty-five minutes."

In Stephen's Village, Alaska, each family last year made an offering of "one muskrat" toward the expenses of the mission, which, at the high price then prevailing, meant a generous gift. When the missionary—Mr. Thomas—was passing through and was unable to obtain necessary fish food for his dogs, each family contributed from their very scanty store one fish, "to help the minister's dogs get home."

Towns Have First English Services: At Cokato and Dassel, Minn., a new work has been begun upon the recommendation of the Rev. Philip Broburg, our associate dean of the Church's Scandinavian work. These missions are under temporary charge of one of our nearby clergy until a regular clergyman can be put in charge. The work is almost entirely among Scandinavians, but the services and teaching are entirely in English. This is the first time that services in the English language have ever been held in these towns.

Cheaper Silver: Exchange in the Orient has fallen to a point which will probably mean a saving of $200,000 in expenditures on behalf of the Church's mission in China. This also means the resumption of certain building enterprises there, delayed by the high rate of exchange.

THE GREATEST MIRACLE IN THE WORLD.

The greatest miracle in the world is the death of the Incarnate Son of God. If He be in very deed the Son of God, then His resurrection follows as a matter of course. God "loosed the pangs of death, because it was not possible that He should be holden of it." But that He should die; that is the mystery of mysteries; and we may boldly claim that it is impossible to explain the mystery of His death, except as it is explained in Holy Scripture. "The wages of sin is death." "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." But a conscience-stricken world is witness that in Jesus of Nazareth is no sin He is not a sinner; therefore death had no claim whatever on His stainless life. Yet He died, and that the death of the cross. He was treated as the lowest and vilest of sinners, while all the time His soul was as white as the very light of God. Who can venture to explain that death, except as it is explained in the Word of God? He is God manifest in the flesh. yet He actually died and was buried. The unflinching Scripture says not only that He died "the just for the unjust." but that God made Him to be sin for us. "The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all." Well may Hooker exclaim in the name of all believers: "Let it be counted folly, or frenzy, or whatsoever. It is our wisdom and our comfort; we care for no knowledge in the world but this; that man hath sinned and God hath suffered; that God hath made Himself the sin of men, and that men are made the righteousness of God."

Eternity will never reveal a greater thing than the death of Christ. "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself." If Christ had done everything else but die for us, He had left us in despair. We are saved not by the Sermon on the Mount, but by the awful death on Calvary's cross. Whatever else we remember or forget, our Lord would have us always remember and never forget the "supreme sacrifice," which alone takes away sin. Therefore He gave us the cup, saying, "Drink ye all of this, for this is My blood of the new covenant, which is shed for you and for many for the remission of sins: do this as oft as ye shall drink it in remembrance of Me."—Canadian Churchman.

Now let the heavens be joyful,
Let earth her song begin;
Let the round world keep triumph,
And all that is therein;
Invisible and visible,
Their notes let all things blend,
For Christ the Lord is risen,
Our joy that hath no end.

—John of Damascus (Eighth Century).

Church Intelligence

VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. W. Cabell Brown, D. D., Bishop

St. John's Church, Columbia, was filled to the doors on Easter morning with a congregation that had gathered from the surrounding country for many miles. The church was beautifully and tastefully decorated, and the choir had taken great pains with appropriate music, which was exceptionally well rendered. This congregation has had a busy year, raising no less than $2,-461. Its spirit is fine and it is looking forward to the coming year's activities with enthusiasm.

The congregational meeting of St. Thomas' Church, Richmond, held on Easter Monday night, was an unusually large and enthusiastic one. This church is progressing splendidly under the leadership of its rector, Rev. Elmer C. Pedrick. The reports of the various organizations of the church showed not only financial activity and prosperity, but also the performance of Christian service. The Woman's Guild is making a monthly visit to the City Home, carrying home-cooked food to the inmates, and the Junior Auxiliary is visiting the children in the orthopoedic ward of the Dooley Hospital. The Woman's Guild has decided to double its pledge to the parish house fund. The Lenten offering of the Sunday school, which has an enrollment of 160, was over $450. The election of vestrymen took place. A buffet supper, consisting of chicken salad, coffee, ice cream and cake, was served, and a splendid spirit of Christian love and fellowship prevailed.

St. Stephen's Church, Richmond, the Rev. James D. Gibson, rector, devoted its Easter offering to the School for Homeless Boys at Covington, Va., and more than $1,000 was given in this very worthy cause. This church has made the highest per capita pledge to the Nation-Wide Campaign in the country, and is over-paying its quota from month to month.

Epiphany Church, Richmond, is going forward rapidly in every branch of church work. The Rev. J. H. Gibboney has been having an unusual number of Lenten services, and the Easter offering this year was nearly $1,000, more than twice that of any previous year.

The mission, which has recently been established at Highland Springs, under the charge of the Rev. W. S. Shacklette, has been organized as the Church of the Messiah. The lots have been secured and the work has been started on the erection of the parish house.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor

The Meeting of the Norfolk Clericus.

Monday, March 21, the clericus heartily endorsed the holding of a service at Cape Henry, April 26, in commemoration of the first landing at that point, and voted to use every effort to secure a large attendance at that time.

They also decided to have a basket picnic on Thursday, June 23, for the members of the clericus and their families at Virginia Beach, with headquarters either at Bishop Tucker's cottage or at Rev. E. P. Miner's cottage, both of which have been offered for this purpose.

It was reported that the mothers in Suffolk have gotten together and come to a definite agreement to correct some of the worse features of modern dancing, as the result of a forceful sermon on this subject some time ago.

Very recently the Rev. Thomas Semmes, of Meade Memorial Church, South Richmond, conducted a most helpful mission at Trinity Church, South Boston, the Rev. D. H. Lewis, rector. The mission lasted for seven days, and both for the Bible readings and the night services the congregations steadily increased, which plainly showed a growing interest,, and an eager willingness to receive the truth so clearly and forcibly given by the missioner.

The Bishop will visit Trinity Church on the first Sunday in May, and it is hoped there will be a good confirmation class, largely as result of this mission.

ALBANY

Rt. Rev. R. H. Nelson, D. D., Bishop.

Religious Drama Presented in Albany.

A phase of the Easter observance that was greatly appreciated by a throng of people was the presentation Easter Sunday afternoon at Proctor's Harmanus Bleecker Hall by the Albany players of Mrs. Katrina Trask Peabody's religious drama, "Without the Walls," under the direction of the Albany Community Chorus. The hall was literally packed; the work of the players in Mrs. Peabody's drama was greatly appreciated and the community singing, led by Russell Carter, was entered into with the zest that Albany always gives to these choruses.

"Without the Walls" is a three-act drama of the city of Jerusalem, year 33 A. D. It relates the romance between Alceda, beautiful daughter of the Pharisee, Jahdiel, and Tiberius, a Roman centurion; the opposition of her father, who wishes her to wed Josephus, another Pharisee of great wealth, and the influence of the Christ over the pagan Roman and the daughter he would wed. It illustrates in vivid manner the Christ's compassion for sin and the humanity of His treatment of the erring woman.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay, D. D., Coadjutor.

Unique Bible Class.

The Rev. T. T. Walsh, rector of the Good Shepherd, York, S. C., has a unique Bible class. It comprises men of the congregation and several others from outside. The class was duly organized with president, secretary and treasurer and by-laws, but no dues. Meetings are held every Wednesday night at the homes of members, and smoking is allowed.

By way of foundation, Mr. Walsh first gave synopses of two books, viz., Patterson Smythe's "How God Inspired the Bible" and "The Bible in the Making." The first course is the Life of Christ. The rector assigns from three to five chapters to be read before the next meeting. And now comes another unique feature. The leader does not catechise the class, but instead allows himself to be the target for a bombardment of questions from the men. This proves that they have read their assignments and have found many interesting points. Some of the biggest questions in theology and life, that would require hours for an answer, are fired at him. There have been some very interesting discussions of the Supernatural, the Deity and Virgin Birth of Jesus, etc. The leader tries to confine all discussions to the several important questions suggested in the assignments, but they are so eager that it is difficult. The sessions are for one hour only, but many stay on after the rector has gone and argue among themselves. Men who have seldom read anything in the Bible confess that they stay up nights to read it. The attendance is generally 100 per cent., and they protest if there is a proposition to omit a meeting for something else.

Results: A marked interest among the men of the parish in all things religious. Other men who have been adrift in religion are enthusiastic with a desire for light and guidance. Men are now attending the church services who formerly were non-church goers. The rector has been studying harder than for twenty years past. He has to, for he is forced to be an encyclopaedia of religious knowledge. It would be well if every rector had such a class. It would help him to reach men and incidentally strengthen him and his parish.—Diocese.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Easter Services Largely Attended.

The Bishop of the Diocese preached the sermon at the 11 o'clock service at the Washington Cathedral, and at the carol service at 4 P. M. at St. John's on Easter Day. In most of the churches the sermons were preached by the rectors of the parishes, and very special Easter music was rendered by the church choirs. At many of the churches a children's carol service was held in the afternoon, and beautiful weather, typical of the Easter-tide, made possible a large attendance at all of the services of the day. A special service in sign language for the deaf was held at the Chapel of the Good Shepherd, and at Christ Church, Georgetown, Archdeacon Weber was the preacher at the morning and evening services, concluding with these the mission which he held there during Holy Week.

To Celebrate Anniversary: The service on Friday, April 1, at the Church of the Incarnation will be in celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the rectorship there of the Rev. William Taylor Snyder.

The Rev. Mr. Snyder came to Incarnation Parish as assistant rector in 1896, and a few months later became rector, upon the retirement of the Rev. I L. Townsend. He received his early education at the Episcopal High School at Alexandria, Va. He received his master's and bachelor's degree from Columbia Law School and practiced the profession of law in Washington until 1890, when he decided to enter the ministry. Mr. Snyder was curate of St. John's Parish and assistant at Ascension before going to the Church of the Incarnation. In addition to his duties as rector there, he is minor canon at the Cathedral and chaplain of the Episcopal Eye, Ear and Throat Hospital.

The Rev. Enoch Thompson, vicar of the Chapel of the Nativity, was presented with an automobile by the Laymen's Service Association of the chapel on Easter Sunday, immediately following the morning service. Since Mr. Thompson took charge of the work of the chapel seventeen years ago, he has built the congregation up to five hundred in number.

The staff of Epiphany Church has recently been increased by the addition of Mr. Henry R. Sanborn, formerly a major general in the Adjutant General's Department of the army. Mr. Sanborn is a student at the Virginia Theological Seminary. He will assist in the work of the church, especially among the young people. One of his fellow-students at the Seminary, Mr. Harold Weigel, will assist the Rev. A. J. Torrey, vicar of Epiphany Church, as community secretary. Mr. Weigel was formerly a lay missionary in China

M M. W.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Appeal for Law and Order.

Appealing to the negroes of Georgia to do their share to stamp out the crime wave sweeping the country, the Colored Evangelical Ministers' Union of Savannah has prepared a document addressed to the race urging adherence to law and order and a friendly attitude in their relations with their white neighbors. The ministers speak of the increasing number of friends the race has among influential white people, and urge that the negroes stand with these friends upon the side of law and order. The statement, which contains eleven paragraphs of excellent counsel, was drawn up at a meeting of the Evangelical Union of Savannah and was unanimously passed. It is addressed to the colored people of Georgia. The last paragraph calls attention to the increasing number of friends in the white race, as bishops, ministers, judges, lawyers, business men and the press, notably in sermons, addresses and lectures, and in courts of law, give evidence of their friendship.

Bishop Reese is chairman of the Inter-Racial Committee of Savannah, and a short while ago the Rev. J. Henry Brown, Archdeacon of the colored work of the Diocese, preached a strong sermon in Savannah, advocating the doctrine of friendship between the races.

E. D. J.

The Rev. H. A. Cresser, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Darien, has been provided with a Ford car, from diocesan funds, for mission work in McIntosh County.

NEWARK

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

Large confirmations have been the rule in most of the churches during Lent, 73 at St. Paul's, Paterson; 93 at Grace Church, Orange; 53 at Grace Church, town of Union; 30 at Holy Innocents', Hoboken, were confirmed by Bishop Stearly. and 48 at St. Luke's, Montclair, and 28 at Arlington, by Bishop Lines. The Lenten services were generally well attended, and on Easter day all the churches appear to have been filled to overflowing, with great numbers of communicants and very generous offerings.

The Rev. Dr. William B. Beach, of Scranton, Pa., has accepted the call to St. John's Church, Jersey City, and the Rev. Hugh D. Wilson has accepted the election as Canon Missioner for the oversight of the mission churches of the Diocese, beginning work immediately.

For the Chinese Sufferers: Holy Communion Church, South Orange, has undertaken to save as many lives of children in the Chinese famine as they have children in their church school, and began by making an offering on Good Friday of $1,600 for that purpose. The church school has a membership of two hundred scholars. Generally the Sunday schools and churches have made very generous offerings for this cause.

Diocese Receives Generous Gift: The bequest of the late Mr. Alfred G. Evans, of Madison, of his large house, with some fourteen acres of land and all the equipment of a large estate for a home for orphaned children, with means sufficient for its maintenance, is likely to be the largest gift that the Diocese has ever received.

ERIE.

The Resurrection, an Easter service adapted from the Scriptural Narrative of the Resurrection, and arranged by Rosamond Kimball, was produced by the pupils of St. John's Church school, Sharon, as an Easter mystery play.

The organ selections from the "Passion according to St. Matthew," by Johann Sebastian Bach, and Easter carols were sung by the choir.

MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. Chas. D. Williams, D. D., Bishop

The Church Club and Church Expansion.

Church expansion to a specialized degree featured the activity of the Church Club of the Diocese of Michigan in its work during the week of March 13-20. On the evening of March 13 more than fifty people gathered at a schoolhouse in Roseville, a community which has recently sprung up on the outskirts of Detroit. With the assistance of the Archdeacon, the Ven. C. L. Ramsay, services have been undertaken regularly, and within the next few months the Church Club will finance the buying of a site and assist in the establishment of a mission church from its reinforcement fund.

The following evening in the same archdeaconry and on the outskirts of Detroit in another direction, at Ferndale, the foundations for a new congregation were laid at a preliminary meeting. Ferndale is an organized community of several thousand people, and regular services are scheduled to begin the first Sunday evening after Easter in the large high school building, which has been tendered the church for its use. The Church Club will also sponsor and assist in the establishment of this work.

The third launching was the starting off of a new St. George's Parish. For half a century there has been a St. George's Church in Detroit, but during the past few years, due to removals, the encroaching of factories, etc., it was felt wise to move the parish. After a survey by the Archdeacon of Detroit, the Ven. Howard K. Bartow, a site was purchased by the Church Club, and on Tuesday evening, March 15, the first meeting of the new congregation was held in Grace Church Parish house. A new portable church building will be placed on the property purchased within the next few weeks.

Business Suspended for Good Friday Services.

More than twenty-five thousand places of business and over six hundred theatres closed for the three-hour period on Good Friday in Detroit. During the past three years the united Christian bodies of the city have agitated for a general shutting down of all activity during the hours of 12 to 3, and from six thousand places closed three years ago, the movement has spread to a large majority of the business establishments in the city.

Practically all of the churches of the city either held services or joined in union with other denominations. St. Paul's Cathedral was crowded to overflowing, even accommodating a large number in the chancel, where chairs had been placed. The dean of the Cathedral, the Very Rev. Warren L. Rogers, conducted the service.

Bishop Charles D. Williams conducted the service at Christ Church, and spoke to more than a thousand people during the three-hour period. At St. John's Church, where the Rev. John Howard Lever spoke, there were more than twenty-five hundred worshippers in the church at one time.

It is estimated that in all of the churches of the city, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, more than five hundred thousand people participated in the Good Friday Passion service.

I. C. J.

MARYLAND

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop.

Lent and Easter at St. Paul's, Baltimore.

At St. Paul's, Baltimore, on Easter there were 1,150 communicants, of which 500 were at the chapel. Lent mid-day services were more largely attended than ever. Among the mid-day preachers were the Rev. Dr. George Craig Stewart, Bishop Fiske, the Rev. B. I. Bell, the Rev. Dr. Van Allen, the Rev. Dr. Hugh Birckhead and the rector, the Rev. Dr. A. B. Kinsolving, who made the address on Maundy Thursday and at the three hours' service on Good Friday, when the church was crowded, with many standing.

NEW YORK.

Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D.,
Bishop-Elect.

Lent and Easter Observed as Never Before in New York.

Easter day this year closed the greatest Lenten season New York ever witnessed. This is not exaggeration. The weather was that of May rather than March, Easter day included. Never were so many people within the churches, and never so many churches observed, not Easter alone, not Holy Week alone, but the entire Lenten season. Great numbers attended the noonday services. At old Trinity the single message from the pulpit was the old one of Christ, the Saviour of men, and especially of society and nations at this time. In some former years attempts have been made by Trinity preachers to give special messages to financiers.

This Lent the Rev. Dr. Freeman, of Washington; Bishop Farthing, of Montreal, who preached throughout Holy Week, and all others gave a general spiritual message, emphasizing the ancient verities, and hammering home the truths each succeeding day with new and telling points. Attendance was not limited to pews, but extended to aisles, and on Good Friday even to sidewalks. St. Paul's Chapel enjoyed a like experience, many days the galleries being filled. Several musical days, with soloists and choruses, filled the ancient edifice to the limit.

St. Bartholomew's Church felt as never before the influx of new families into the great Park Avenue section at its southern end. The beautiful chapel was used and filled almost daily. The wisdom of the choice of site was vindicated, if vindication was needed. Great apartments, each large enough to house a fair-sized village, are nearing completion, both north and south of the site.

At the Cathedral on Easter morning there were four celebrations, four hundred receiving at the 8 o'clock one, and at all other services crowds surged in and through the edifice. Similar records were those of the Heavenly Rest, St. Thomas' and others. In the Bronx a like record was made. The Advocate, the Rev. George N. Deyo, rector, started by laymen twenty years ago, has now seven hundred families under its spiritual care. Hardly a family remains that was in at the beginning. A procession, and yet always more.

The feature of Easter in New York, apart from attendance and wonderful weather, was the great number of flowers. Frices were 25 per cent. lower than last year, and everybody afforded flowers. Lilies that used to be brought from Bermuda, and later were grown from Japanese bulbs, are now grown right around New York. They are larger and finer than any other, and more flowers are on each stalk.

For the first time, it is believed, every church of every name this year observed Lent and Easter. The great Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist, Reformed and Methodist Churches indulged in some cases in noon-day services, and all held week night services during Holy Week. Even Unitarians rented a theatre and filled it on all Sunday nights in Lent. The plans were wholly in the hands of laymen, who have a national program, with some ten thousand men to carry it through enrolled as members. The former Billy Sunday contingent hired the Town Hall and held Sunday night services. There are more independent plans in New York than ever before, hiring theatres, hotel parlors and halls, and gaining financial support, and yet the old line religious bodies more than hold their own.

Church Extension and Church Strengthening.

A Committee on Diocesan Mission Plans, named by the last convention of New York, is holding open meetings and conferring with leaders in all parts of the Diocese concerning the future of Church extension, of Church strengthening. Not long before the death of Bishop Burch, the Archdeacon, the Rev. Dr. W. H. Pott, resigned to become a Staten Island rector, so that for months the Diocese has been not only without a Bishop, but also without an Archdeacon. The chairman of the committee is the Rev. William G. Thompson, one of the most experienced men in the Diocese in missionary work, and with him is the Rev. Dr. George F. Nelson, for ten years Archdeacon of New York.

Just now the advice of leaders in the rural districts of Orange, Dutchess, Putnam and Westchester County is being obtained. Everybody is getting a hearing ,so important are the matters involved. The great fields wherein population is growing, and certain to grow, are Staten Island, Bronx Borough and lower Westchester County. In the Hudson River counties are important interests, but population is not extending. Tremendous needs exist, however, but the committee says it is determined to enlist if possible everybody who will help, and to co-operate with all other bodies in an endeavor to plant to stay, not simply for a sectarian advantage. So far recommendations have been in favor of two archdeacons for the Diocese, responsible for city and rural sections, but working together as a team; a business man to help the Bishop in all real estate and financial matters, taking the advice of business men and a generous utilization of volunteer laymen, not merely as lay readers, but also to help parishes when desired, that better methods may obtain.

Still another recommendation made, it is understood, is a plan to provide additional curates, sometimes serving it may be one parish for six months, and a second parish the balance of the year. An effort is to be made to help the Diocese to meet its quota of men for Holy Orders, and to utilize such men while in the seminary for practical work. Many institutions other than parochial may be linked up, so as to make the largest possible use of available clergy. The committee states that it will recommend to the convention in May a definite program, and the introduction of scientific management methods at all points.

The convention date is May 10, but it may be changed to accommodate the date of consecration of the new Bishop. It is expected within a short time to announce such consecration date. The other members of the Archdeaconry Committee are the Rev. M. W. Rice, of Wappingers Falls, and Messrs. Norman S. Walker, of Staten Island, and William C. Belknap, of Newburg.

C.

PITTSBURGH

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

In St. Stephen's Church, Wilkinsburg, on Palm Sunday morning, the rector, the Rev. William Porkess, presented a class of forty-five for confirmation, the largest class in the history of the parish. The Bishop of the Diocese, the Rt. Rev. Cortlandt Whitehead, LL. D., administered the rite before a crowded church.

Personal Notes

The Rev. James T. Kennedy has resigned as rector of St. Matthias' Church, Asheville, N. C., and is giving his whole time to his duties as Archdeacon of the colored work in the District of Asheville. His address is P. O. Box 111, Lincolnton, N. C.

The address of the Rev. John Gass, who has become associate rector at Trinity Church, Parkersburg, W. Va., is 835 Murdock Avenue, Parkersburg.

The address of the Rev. Edw. C. McAllister is now St. Luke's Rectory, Caribou, Me.

The Rev. H. C. Attwater has accepted the rectorship of St. John's Church, Wichita, Kan.

The Rev. John Caughey has been appointed to St. Paul's Church, Greenville, in the Diocese of Dallas, and may be addressed at 2307 North St. John Street, Greenville, Tex.

The Rev. Paul Statham Bandy, a prominent Presbyterian clergyman, has been received into the Church by Bishop Moreland, has asked to be admitted as a candidate for the priesthood, and has been licensed to serve at St. John's Church, Arcata, Cal.

The Rev. G. M. Brewin has resigned the rectorate of the Church of the Evangelists, Oswego, N. Y., and will become rector of St. Mary's Church, Keyport, N. J., on April 14.

Deaths.

The Rev. William M. Chapin, rector emeritus of St. John's Church, Barrington, R. I., and founder of St. Andrew's Industrial School, Barrington, died on March 8, after over forty years' connection with St. John's Parish. The funeral was from St. John's on the 11th instant, Bishop Perry, Bishop Touret and forty other clergymen, all vested, taking part in the service.

The Rev. Henry B. Martin, D. D., rector emeritus of Chester Parish, Diocese of Easton, died at Chesterton, Kent County, Md., on March 8, in his eighty-fourth year.

Take a grain of wheat into your hand. It is round and complete; hard and self-contained. It seems to be dead, but there lies within it the possibility of a wondrous and manifold life. The mystery of life sleeps within it. The beauty of summer lies hidden in its dark and narrow breast. But of it the paradox is true, that it is dead because it has not died. It must die in order to become alive. It must be cast away from the hand of the sower, fall into the ground, and be buried in darkness. Its outer form must be broken up and decay, that the dormant life within it may be awakened and manifested, and its beautiful and manifold life, being come out of the prison of its loneliness, may wave and rustle and shine in the sunlight. Unless it go through this process it remains a lonely and unproductive thing. Every seed is alone until it dies. It may be laid up with other seeds in the storehouse; but in the midst of multitudes it is alone. It has no living union with any, being cut off from the universal life; and the reason why it escapes from its loneliness through death is that thereby its individual life is placed in living contact with the all-pervading life of nature. When it is embedded in the soil it is no longer alone, but unites itself with the universal life; and thus the day of its death is the day of its birth to a higher life.—James Hastings.

A very little reflection will reveal the shallowness of the notion that the contented mind means a mind devoid of ambition. In truth the discontented mind is not the mind with a purpose, but a mind without one. The people who are restless and unhappy, and who eat their hearts out with vain regrets, are the people who have no object in life which calls forth their utmost energy and consecration. Those who are forever pressing on to higher attainments in life are the truly contented because they are at peace with themselves and with God. Such a man was Paul.—Bryan G. Collier.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

THREE CHRONIC DISEASES.

The writer takes no credit to himself for the following thoughts on Sunday school ailments, for he is merely writing down what he can remember of a most excellent address on this subject delivered by Mr. White, secretary of St. Thomas' (Richmond) Sunday school.

This Sunday school has found it very helpful to keep an accurate record by classes of its monthly attendance and offerings, and read the report of the whole school at its meeting on the first Sunday of each month. This plan encourages an active though friendly spirit of rivalry among the classes, which is bound to reach to the individuals to see who can hold the place of honor in the class roll.

It is interesting to note, too, that in this school that place of distinction is held by a class of boys, as it should be (though rarely is) in all Sunday schools, for the boys are naturally the most hardy and the least daunted by inclement weather and other hindrances. Once give the boys the true vision of a courageous Christ of an unequaled energy and vigor who loved to tramp over the hills and valleys of the Holy Land at the rate of thirty-five and forty miles per day, and we won't have so much trouble in holding their interest in the other incidents of the Saviour's life.

St. Thomas' Sunday school, however, is suffering, as are all organizations of a like character, from three chronic diseases, which are rainitis, indifferentalysis and lazengitis, and we shall consider briefly these ailments.

In order to find a cure for any disease it must first be correctly diagnosed, and in order to that one must recognize its symptoms.

The first indication of an attack of rainitis is a little shower about breakfast time on Sunday morning, accompanied by the remark from mother that she is afraid it will be too wet for the children to go to Sunday school. These symptoms will immediately become contagious and affect the whole family, unless the proper antidote is vigorously applied. The most effective remedy is a lively hunt for umbrellas, overshoes and raincoats, with the assertion from the oldest child, "I don't think it will rain long, and any way, I intend to go whether it rains or not, for I would go through as much rain as this to day school." This medicine, promptly administered, will convince mother that the rain on Sunday isn't any wetter than the ordinary week day rain, through which she would send the children to day school. Sometimes, too, this application will produce an effect on father, resulting in his getting out the automobile (if there is one) to take the children to Sunday school, and perhaps stay for the men's Bible class himself. However, that is expecting almost too much of one dose.

The way to be sure that there will always be a good supply of this remedy about every house is to have teachers who will inculcate in their pupils such a spirit of class enthusiasm that they will not want to miss a Sunday on account of the effect it will have on their class standing in the school.

Indifferentalysis is a malady which is more frequently found among parents than scholars.

Its symptoms are a careless attitude toward the Sunday school, and a general feeling that this part of the Church life is the least important of a general uninteresting feature of existence.

The first part of the prescription for this trouble, which is one of the most deep-seated and dangerous of all spiritual maladies, is a visit from the rector of the parish, a friendly, encouraging, and, if possible, inspiring visit. This should be followed up by a visit from the superintendent of the Sunday school, and lastly from the teachers of the Sunday school. Of course, such extended treatment as this must be administered in broken doses and cover a period of several weeks. It is curable, but is very obstinate, and unless taken in time will prove fatal in some families.

Lazengitis is a weakness that might be classed as a "children's disease," although it occasionally attacks grown people. The symptoms are a yawn about 8:45 A. M., accompanied with the remark, "I'm too sleepy to go to Sunday school."

The only remedy is a prompt reminder that those who are not on time will have to wait until after the closing prayer and will be marked tardy, and not be eligible for the cross and crown which goes as a reward for regular and prompt attendance.

If superintendents and teachers will be on the lookout for these three diseases and apply the proper remedies in good time at the very first indications of their appearance, our work with the children will take on new life, and this branch of Church activity will assume a more important place in the hearts and consciences of our people.

ADVENTURE IN SOCIAL SERVICE.

Some weeks ago we published an article on this page about a home for little girls in Jarratt, Va., in which we made some mistakes, due to lack of information.

This institution is strictly a Church establishment, the whole plan having originated with Episcopalians, and being carried through by them. It was opened in a vacant rectory and its principal support comes from Church sources.

The founding of this home is essentially a venture in social service, for it was started by a parish with three small churches, the combined communicant list of which is not more than one hundred and fifty persons.

Since its opening, a tract of fifty-seven acres, with a house of twelve rooms, has been deeded to trustees, for the purpose of carrying on this Christian work. About two or three thousand dollars will be needed to put this house in good repair. When this is done it will accommodate as many as twenty-five children, and will offer a wonderful opportunity for the Church, to render to humanity the kind of service that reaches up to the ideal established by the Saviour.

Miss Edith Gage, the superintendent, has given up a very much more lucrative position to take charge of this work, at an almost nominal salary.

The interest taken by the parish of Meherrin, and indeed the whole of Greensville County, in behalf of the children being cared for is beautiful to see, but it would seem well-nigh impossible that all that is necessary to be done can be accomplished by so small a parish.

Other work along this line is contemplated by the Diocese of Southern Virginia, and plans have been discussed for the establishment of a larger diocesan institution. It might be a little more expensive, but it would surely accomplish better results to have two or even three such homes of the size in which the family atmosphere would be maintained, rather than to have one big institution.

Few parishes have had the faith and ccurage to attempt anything so useful, practical and thoroughly Christian as the effort that is being made by this little group of earnest, faithful people. The treasurer is Mr. Walker Turner, of Emporia, Va. Any contribution will be gratefully welcomed.

Let each one obey what is deepest, highest, purest in him. That is the word, the revelation, the Adesh of God. He that allows the consideration of carnal comfort, even of carnal necessity, to stand in the way runs the risk of losing the highest self in him. The struggle for existence in a truly spiritual man points to absolute fidelity to the ideal, while hunger and fatigue stare him in the face. The whole question of worldliness and asceticism centres here. The bread that man eats is a small matter, and the sure accompaniment of what he holds as his highest pursuit. But he that sacrifices his ideal to his bread finds, when it is too late, that man does not live by bread alone.—P. C. Mozoomdar.

Family Department

APRIL.

1. Friday.
3. First Sunday after Easter.
10. Second Sunday after Easter.
17. Third Sunday. after Easter.
24. Fourth Sunday after Easter.
25. Monday. S. Mark.
30. Saturday.

Collect for First Sunday After Easter.

Almighty Father, Who hast given Thine only Son to die for our sins, and to rise again for our justification; Grant us so to put away the leaven of malice and wickedness that we may always serve Thee in pureness of living and truth; through the merits of the same, Thy Son Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Shining Christ.

He came and walked on the hillside after the night had gone,
But the radiance on His forehead was not the look of the dawn,
For the day had hardly broken, and the mists were still undrawn.

He stood in the old dim garden beside Jerusalem,
And it was not the light of the lilies that gleamed on His garment's hem,
For the dew and the cold and the shadow were heavy still on them .

This was the light around Him and the glory about His head:
"Because I live My beloved shall also live," He said.

Perhaps He stands in the dawning of this strange Eastertide,
When the graves of the world are many and its tears not wholly dried,
And names to Himself in the silence the dead who have newly died.

And but that our eyes are holden, surely our hearts would bow
At the whiteness of His presence there in the garden now,
The fair light on His garments and the beauty that binds His brow.

He shines with the hope of the ages that He brought from the dark of death:
"Because I live, so also My own shall live," He saith.

—Nancy Byrd Turner, in Youth's Companion.

For the Southern Churchman.

At Play for the Master.

W. H. Morse, M. D.

We had made every effort to get the children of our "Little Italy" to attend Sunday school, but all to no purpose. There were several families having children of the right age to attend, and—as we afterward found out—there were nearly fifty in all. Whether it was altogether true or not is more than I can say, but those of the colony maintained that the Irish Roman Catholics at St. Angela's Church made them feel that they were not welcome there, and in consequence they were not accustomed to go to mass. And as the Protestant churches were indifferent about reaching them, they were without any religious identification. We felt that if we could get the children we might reach the older ones, and it was therefore that the endeavor was made.

Our other children had made it, and so had the teachers and I, but not a solitary response was obtained. At first we could not get any answer to our appeals further than a shaking of the head; but after a while they came out with a blunt "No," or a "No, don't wanter!" Then it came to be a "Won't go!" and "Won't go to your old Sun' school!" with now and then a disagreeable laugh.

So from being our "burning question" as to ways and means, it came to be—and no joke about it—strongly Italicized. There is no question but what Marconi is right in his observations about his people, and that an Italian's "will not" is "shall not." We were loth to give up beaten, but there it was.

It was a mission Sunday school for the factory children, and distinctively undenominational, and under the auspices of the five churches—Methodist, Episcopal, Congregational, Baptist and Presbyterian—with teachers from all, and the pastors, or some substitute, visiting the mission in turn every Sunday. It had got to be customary for the young people to exhibit an interest in the work, and we had some most excellent and consecrated teachers. There came to be a waiting list, and frequently there were offers of aid.

Perhaps just a little to our surprise, among those who proffered their services was a young woman who was an Episcopalian, the daughter of a leading citizen, and but recently from Bryn Mawr. She was sincere in her proffer, but there was no vacancy in the teaching force. She heard us talk about our attempts to reach the Italian children, and I think, without speaking of her intention to any of us, went to the colony one Saturday afternoon to try her skill in Home Mission work. She went in her limousine, an attractive, well-dressed and earnest young woman. The children were out in the street, and no sooner had she stopped her car than she was surrounded. She at once pressed her invitation, and it was hardly out of her mouth when she had the answer, the superlative negative. She replied by telling about the school, and deftly urging reconsiderations; but to no use.

"But why will you not come?" she persisted.

There were several girls ready with the same answer.

" 'Cause girls is stuck up in there!" Then, growing bolder, and beginning to show impertinence, they went on: " 'Cause they are all dressed up, an' when they get growed, they—wear smart rigs, feders on hats, an' joolry, an' ride in shiny ortos, like you!"

A little embarrassed at first, she gained her composure, and endeavored to tell the girls that the Sunday school children were no different from them.

"Yes, they be, an' you get this from us!" was the reply. "Them can't jump rope like 's we do! It 'd spile them silks an plooms!"

The self-made Home missionary laughed.

"No such thing!" she said. "They do jump rope. I know they do."

"Did you when you wus er kid?" the girls asked with a provoking hoot.

"Of course," was the nonchalant reply.

"Bet yer never 'd jump hundred-an'-one like Angelica Troca!" the girls said.

Several of the girls had their jumping ropes. and this was very much like a dare. Without removing her gloves, the young woman took a rope from one of them and told them to "keep count." Her college gymnastics were in reserve, and she improved upon them. As I was not there to see the play, I am unable to describe it; but with the girls opening their mouths wider and wider at each throw of the rope, she jumped, and jumped, as they counted, until she made the notable "one hundred and one."

"There," she said as she returned the rope, "and I assure you that we have girls who do it, too!"

"What you know 'bout that!" the children said to each other, admiringly.

Then she pressed her invitation, and rather exhausted by her effort, rode away. The next day, Sunday, although her arms were somewhat stiff, she came to Sunday school, and not a little to her surprise nineteen Italian girls appeared on the scene—and at least a dozen brought their jumping ropes. She gathered them in a class, and inside the hour had their interest. The next Sunday others came, including boys, and soon there were registered forty-six. It was not long before the adults were interested, and now—fourteen years later—there is a chapel where on Sundays the rector of St. James' has an Italian mission, which grew from the rope-jumping episode. The young woman is the wife of one of the most influential churchmen in Elizabeth, N. J.

Father Forgets.

Listen, son, I am saying this to you, as you lie asleep, one little paw crumpled under your cheek and the blond curls stickily wet on your damp forehead. I have stolen into your room, alone. Just a few moments ago, as I sat reading my paper in the library, a hot, stifling wave of remorse swept over me. I could not resist it. Guiltily I came to your bedside.

These were the things I was thinking son: I had been cross to you. I scolded you as you were dressing for school because you gave your face merely a dab with a towel. I took you to task for not cleaning your shoes. I called out angrily when I found you had thrown some of your things on the floor.

At breakfast I found fault, too. You spilled things. You gulped down your food. You put your elbows on the table. You spread butter too thick on your bread. And as you started off to play and I made for my train, you turned and waved a little hand and called, "Good-by, papa!" and I frowned, and said in reply, "Hold your shoulders back!"

Then it began all over again in the late afternoon. As I came up by the hill road, I spied you, down on your knees, playing marbles. There were holes in your stockings. I humiliated you before your boy friends by making you march on ahead of me, back to the house. Stockings were expensive—and if you had to buy them you would be more careful! Imagine that, son, from a father! It was such stupid, silly logic.

But do you remember, later, when I was reading in the library, how you came in, softly, timidly, with a sort of hurt, hunted look in your eyes? When I glanced up over my paper, impatient at the interruption, you hesitated at the door

"What is it you want?" I snapped.

You said nothing, but you ran across, gathering all your child courage, in one tempestuous plunge, and threw your arms around my neck and kissed me, again and again, and your small arms tightened with an affection that God had set blooming in your heart and which even neglect could not wither. And then you were gone, pattering up the stairs.

Well, son, it was shortly afterwards that my paper slipped from my hands and a terrible, sickening fear came over me. Suddenly I saw myself as I really was, in all my horrid selfishness, and I felt sick at heart.

What had habit been doing to me? The habit of complaining, of finding fault, of reprimanding—all of these were my rewards to you for being a boy. It was not that I did not love you; it was that I expected so terribly much of youth. I was measuring you by the yard-stick of my own years.

And there was so much that was good, and fine, and true in your character. You did not deserve my treatment of you, son. The little heart of you was as big as the dawn itself, over wide hills. All this was shown by your spontaneous impulse to rush in and kiss me good-night. Nothing else matters tonight, son. I have come to your bedside in the darkness, and I have knelt here, choking with emotion, and so ashamed!

It is a feeble atonement. I know you would not understand these things if I told them to you during your waking hours. Yet I must say what I am saying. I must burn sacrificial fires alone, here in your own bedroom, and make free confession.

And I have prayed God to strengthen me in my new resolve. Tomorrow I will be a real daddy! I will chum with you and suffer when you suffer and laugh when you laugh. I will bite my tongue when impatient words come. I will keep saying, as if it were a ritual: "He is nothing but a boy—a little boy!"

I am afraid I have visualized you as a man. Yet as I see you now, son, crumpled and weary in your cot, I see that you are still a baby. Yesterday you were in your mother's arms, your head on her shoulder. I have asked too much, too much!

Dear boy! Dear little son! A penitent kneels at your infant shrine, here in the moonlight. I kiss the little fingers, and the damp forehead, and the yellow curls, and if it were not for waking you I would snatch you up and crush you to my breast.

Tears came and heartache and remorse, and, I think, a greater, deeper love, when you ran through the library door and wanted to kiss me!—People's Home Journal.

Importance of Hand Work.

There is not enough time given to constructive work, to the pleasure of "making things" either in the home or school.

In a suggestive book, "Home, School and Vacation," a mother writes, "A young child's capability and skill grow rapidly. It is a good plan after he is four years to manage so that he always can have something visible to show his father, for instance, at the end of the day, something made with his own hands."

This wise mother adds another reason besides the pleasure this creative work gives. She says, "If the mind after this age (four years) is let to play all day, it rapidly grows averse to ordered application and submission to authority."

Now to be practical, what can children make? I should like to show you the airplane made from a cigar box by a little colored boy of nine.

Airplanes are naturally interesting to children this year. It is always wise to allow them to follow the life interests of the adult world whenever they appeal to little people.

But you ask what can younger children make in the aircraft line? They can fold stiff paper into darts, and it is surprising to see how high little boys can hurl them. Then, too, they can make pin-wheels, and while these do not fly, they buzz through the air and afford much amusement. Let the little people make many pin-wheels, large and small, and of varied colors, using clothes-pins for handles if no older brother is at hand to whittle a stick. Encourage older and younger children to work together, for self-control and adaptability are gained through social intercourse. It is needless to say that almost all children like to blow soap bubbles.

Another source of interest to children is the well-known scrap-book. Little people love to cut out pictures. They may collect them in a box at first, or put all the animals in one envelope, the toys in another, and so on. When they can cut and arrange the pictures fairly well, help them to mount one sheet. After this practice, fold a large piece of paper and let them mount the four pages, then use a book.

To manage paper and scissors, make paste, select pictures, mount and press them with a blotting pad, are all activities which interest and instruct children.

Scrap-books illustrating Bible and other favorite stories, children's poems, the different countries and peoples of the world, and the various trades and occupations not only occupy, but educate, little children. Such work is a good pastime for rainy days or Sundays.—Selected.

For the Southern Churchman.

Faith.

Eva Carrington Talcott.

It is not faith so long as eye can see
One ray of light,
As long as in the skies there one star be
To cheer the sight.

It is not faith which ever asks to know
Or understand
The reason for the weary way we go
Or makes demand.

'Tis faith which fearless walks when duty calls
Through waters deep,
And though the raging tempest flesh appalls
Knows God will keep.

'Tis faith which treads the trackless prairies wide
On heavy sod,
With not a sign-post or a tree to guide—
Walks on with God.

'Tis faith which makes us happy in our lot
Where'er we be,
For though the eyes of flesh the light see not
The soul can see.

What Does It Mean?

"Don't talk to me!" The young man accompanied his laughing remark with a significant forward motion of his hand and forearm. "I had enough of that sort of thing when I was young. Fed up with it, in fact."

The older man looked him over—a long, scrutinizing stare. "Do you mind telling me, Sam, which one of your parents you mean to insult?" he said. "Father or mother, or both?"

Sam reddened. "Insult?" he asked. "Insult? What do you mean, Mr. Bush? Why, I wouldn't insult either of them for the world, and you know it. They're old-fashioned, of course, and a little straight-laced and behind the times, but they're right down good, both of 'em, and mother especially would cut off her right hand any day if it would save mine."

"Well, more shame to you, then!" Mr. Bush's voice was very stern now. "More shame to you, I say, Sam, for the insulting, disloyal way in which you have just spoken! Yes, I mean it; and there's no use in your getting angry and arguing with me about it. I've pretty nearly got to where I feel as a friend of mine says he does—that such a speech as that settles a man in his mind forever.

"When any fellow says as often as you do, 'I had enough of that when I was young,' what can he mean except a very decided and open criticism of the people under whose guidance he did those things with which he is now so 'fed up'—as you put it? And when those people are a loving father and mother, who, he amits, had his best welfare at heart, what is such criticism except disloyalty and insult?

"Oh, I know you didn't think of it that way, Sam; but I want you to think' next time; and I want you to think of something else, too. Do you often, if ever, hear any one say that he had enough when he was young of things that were really bad and harmful? When they use that phrase, isn't it usually about going to church or Sunday school, or keeping the pledge, or saying one's prayers, or doing something else that they consider—not bad—but too good nowadays?

"And, believe me, Sam, people had better be pretty careful about leaving off a good habit until they can replace it with a better one. There is no vacuum in the habit world any more than there is in nature. When they've done that—found the better habit, I mean—why, then they can make your little speech all they like, because—"

"Because," interrupted Sam, "they'll have sense enough to see what such a speech means—and won't risk it. Come on, Mr. Bush, if we're late to church, I shan't be able to send mother the text this afternoon."—Youth's Companion.

Charles Kingsley and His Pets.

In "Charles Kingsley, His Letters and Memories of His Life," edited by his wife, we read:

"But to speak of his home without mentioning his love of animals would be to leave the picture incomplete. His dog and his horse were his friends, and they knew it and understood his voice and eye. . . . His dog Dandy, a fine Scotch terrier, was his companion in all his parish walks, attended at the cottage lectures and school lessons, and was his and the children's friend for thirteen years. . . . He took great delight in cats; the stable had always its white cat, and the house its black or tabby, whose graceful movements he never tired of watching. . . . On the rectory lawn dwelt a family of natterjacks (running toads), who lived on from year to year in the same hole, which the scythe was never allowed to approach. He made friends with a pair of sand wasps, one of which he had saved from drowning. They lived in a crack of the window in his dressing-room, and every spring he would look out eagerly for them or their children as they came out of or returned to the same crack. The little fly-catcher, who built its nest every year under his bedroom window, was a constant joy to him."

For the Young Folks

Easter Gladness.

Hallelujah! Christ is risen!
Of His triumphs let us sing;
Hail Him as the Lord victorious,
As our mighty conquering King;
Lift in waves of exultation
Notes of praise this Easter morn,
That shall as the sweetest incense
Upward to the throne be borne.

Hallelujah! Easter gladness
Echoes round the earth and main;
He Who gave His life a ransom,
Conquers death and lives to reign;
Strike your harps, ye shining spirits,
Join with us in Easter lays,
Let there be one mighty chorus
To the mighty Conqueror's praise.

Hallelujah! Ours the blessing:
Since He died and rose again,
Now is our redemption perfect,
Life immortal we obtain.
So at last, when He appeareth,
Death shall clamp His chains in vain,
Tombs shall make their full surrender,
Saints shall their redemption claim.

Hallelujah! All ye ransomed,
Let your endless joy begin!
Now the gate of life immortal
Opens wide to let you in;
By and by shall angels sitting
At the tomb with open door,
Whisper to us, at our waking,
"Fear not; He has gone before."

For the Southern Churchman.

The Feathers of the Storm Bird.

An Allegory.

Eleanor E. Mitchell.

Centuries and centuries ago, when the world was quite young, the fairies were very friendly with the big earth people. One who would listen might hear at any time their silvery laugh at the wind's mourning in the trees of the forest, or its angry roar, as it swept over the wide fields. And when the fairies laughed, the mourning in the forest changed to gentle sighing, and the mad roaring over the fields turned into soft breezes that coaxed the tiniest buds into flowers. They laughed again and the big Storm Bird, whose wings were so huge that they hid the sun, stopped to listen. At the wondrous sound he forgot his ill temper and lifted his gloomy dark feathers, then the sun, seeing his opportunity, sailed right under the Storm Bird's wings, throwing his golden rays over all the earth, in little comforting beams, at first, like a baby's kiss, then warmer and brighter until all the earth people were as happy as possible. You see these wise little folk believed that the Spirit of Love and Happiness must always defeat the Spirit of Hate and Despair; that is why they laughed. Love, who was the mightiest of all the immortals, wasn't afraid of anything. He was always accompanied by Hope and Faith and Happiness, the fairy-who-feared-no-evil, with blue eyes radiant, followed in their trail. And the world was very beautiful indeed, the earth people and the fairies walked hand in hand in the domain of the Spirit of Light.

Now the Spirit of Light had commanded that all earth people and all immortals, too, should be governed by Love, and this is how it happened: In the very beginning, when the people did not know whose authority to recognize as supreme a beautiful bird with silver wings, came down from the Spirit of Light, and descended on the shoulder of Love, then this bird with silver wings sang a wonderful song of what Love would do for the earth men, and the people and the fairies bowed their heads and said: "We will follow Love, as the Spirit of Light has commanded us."

So for a long, long time the earth was fragrant with the breath of flowers, that sprang into life as the fairies walked over it; no storm cloud hid the sun's rays, for a beautiful mist rose from the valleys and kept the forests and fields fresh and green. Then one day a fairy who wanted to govern the earth fell into a rage, and to punish him the Spirit of Light changed him into a bird of black plumage and sent him away from the beautiful forest, but discontent and envy once born always increase rapidly, and so the small bird grew until he became the dreaded Storm Monster, whose huge wings hid the sun, until the silvery laugh of the fairy-who-feared-no-evil was heard. But alas! One day a dark shining feather from the wings of the Storm Bird fell upon the earth, and although the sun was bright and the wondrous laugh of the fairy had driven away the huge monster of gloom, this feather seemed to chill the warmth of the sun's rays, and looking very closely, one saw that the blossoms growing near where it lay had sickened and died—and the fairies and the earth people were dreadfully amazed and frightened. Then the fairy-who-feared-no-evil called Faith and Hope, and they very earnestly considered the matter, and Faith said: "Oh, my sister spirits, let us call Love; did not the Spirit of Light command that we ever obey His voice? Let us therefore invoke His council, and whatever He commands concerning the dark feather of the Storm Bird, that shall we perform."

So the fairies and the earth men called a great council, and Love spoke to them: "Hear all ye earth people and immortals, harken unto the voice of Love, whom the Spirit of Light hath sent. If you but touch the thing of darkness that hath fallen among you, then shalt thou cause greater gloom. In its beauty is the poison of discontent and disobedience, whose offspring is Death. Oh, my people! Look not upon the plumage of the Storm Bird; covet not its evil beauty! Have ye not a place of wondrous delight in which to dwell and follow Love? The mighty forests, the verdant valleys, the still waters and flowering woodlands, all are thine, and the companionship of the immortals: Harken unto the voice of Love, as the Spirit of Light hath commanded."

Now as Love talked with the fairies and earth people, the sun shone brighter and brighter, and the hearts of the earth men grew happier than ever before. "How beautiful Love is," they said. "We will obey His voice." But after many days the man-who-forgot-to-obey let his curiosity get the better of him, and walking near the yellowed earth where the feather of the Storm Bird lay, he leaned forward and looked at it, then finding it very much to be desired, he stooped and picked it up. And then a terrible thing happened! The Storm Bird unfurled his wings and a mighty wind swept o'er the earth: The great trees of the forest bowed themselves under it. The white flowers of innocence withered and died, as the feathers were hurled hither and thither, and the world grew very dark, for the spirit of disobedience was scattered abroad, and the Storm Bird waved his huge wings and screamed in exaltation.

The storm passed, but the gloom of fear and death hovered over everything, and the earth men, who no longer walked with the fairies, were very miserable indeed. Some became very sorry, and lamented the disobedience of their brother, who had caused such world sorrow.

Then after a time, when there seemed no hope for the earth people, the great Spirit of Light sent Faith and Hope again to the mortals, and Hope said: "Perhaps there will yet be found a way to rid the world of the Storm Bird of death." And Faith smiled, as she looked toward the tiny beam of sunlight which forced its way under the huge wings of the monster, and said: "There will."

And some of the people listened to Faith and Hope, and waited with patience and courage for the time when the darkness of the world would be destroyed, and Love should again rule the earth.

And still the Storm Bird of death scattered abroad his poisonous feathers, and the world grew to be very dark and very sad. But Faith and Hope waited, fearless, until the Spirit of Light should again shed His radiance o'er the earth.

Now when the great Spirit of Light saw the misery of the world, He became very sorry for the earth men. So much did He pity their unhappiness that He said unto Love: "Let us free the earth from the monster Bird of Darkness." And Love said: "Oh, Spirit of Wisdom and Light, I will go unto the earth men, and I will save them from the power of the Storm Bird of Death."

So Love walked with the mortals, and taught them to trust Him. "He who follows Me," said Love, "need not fear the power of gloom or death, for I will destroy the evil Storm Bird, that his poisonous feathers may no longer darken the earth."

And Love challenged the Storm Bird, and there was a mighty battle. Love and the monster Bird of Darkness fought for dominion over the earth men and the fairies: The world grew dark and chill, and the battle waged fiercely. Some were afraid that Love would be killed. But Faith smiled through her tears, for she was grieved that Love was wounded, and told the people that Love would conquer the Storm Bird. "Love cannot die," she said; "the great Spirit of Light will be with Him in His conflict with the evil Bird of Death."

So the people waited, some with fear and some with hope. And after a while the sun commenced to shine, faintly at first, then brighter and brighter, until all the world was bathed in the golden glow of its light. And in its radiance they beheld Love, victorious, standing with His foot upon the neck of the Storm Bird. No more would the dread shadow of his wings of darkness fill the hearts of the earth men with fear. And the people bowed their heads and said, "Great is Love, whom the Spirit of Light hath sent to destroy the monster, Death," and the fairies sang a marvelous song of beauty, which told the story of the victory of Light over Darkness.

Then Love called the people about Him and said: "My dear earth brothers, I have conquered the Storm Bird of Death, but there is also a task for each of you. Wherever the dark feathers of the Storm Bird are scattered over the earth, there must disobedience and sorrow and fear be found. our task is to destroy these dark feath- Your task is to destroy these dark feath- world." And they said: "We will rid the earth of the feathers of Death."

Then Love smiled upon them, and stretched His hands in blessing; and as they looked closely, they saw that His hands were scarred and torn by the talons of the Storm Bird.

Those who follow the Spirit of Love are still searching for the dark feathers which the Bird of Death scattered over the earth, and some think that the time is drawing near when there will not be one dark place in the world that will not know the victorious Spirit of Love. Others say that there are yet a great many of the poisonous feathers to be destroyed, and think it would be wise for the earth people who have become careless and slothful to search more earnestly: but Faith smiles, tenderly patient with earth folk, and waits confidently, and those who listen hear the silvery laugh of the fairy-who-fears-no-evil.

For since the earth is free from the power of the Storm Bird, Happiness is found everywhere.

Who Loves Gives.

When the first gray morning light crept over the silent Alp, Conrad, the goat-boy, led his flock to drink at a quiet pool in the bend of the rushing torrent, and then guided it to a level nook where the tender young grass was growing green. Far below from the valley, hidden by the veil of silvery mist, he could hear the mellow sound of the church bells.

"Down in the world they are keeping the great feast," he said; "singing the hymns, giving their offerings, and praising the risen Christ; and I am up here, alone, with no one to greet me with 'Christ is arisen!' and to whom I may answer 'Alleluia!' I may not join in the praises of the Church, and I have no offering; but still," he continued, as the sweet reminding bells rang on, "still I can say the prayers, here on the mountain, and sing the hymns." So he knelt reverently, then, standing, sang the same hymn of praise that the people in the valley church were singing.

As he sang he saw, coming down from the higher mountain slopes, a Stranger, who paused, smiling on him, and said, "Christ is arisen!"

"Alleluia!" Conrad responded, wondering who this was, and why he was so early on the Alp.

"Wilt thou point me out the way to yonder village, where the church bells are ringing?" asked the Stranger.

"Yes, gladly, sir," the boy replied; "but the way is long and steep, and if perchance thou art come from far, thou mayest need food." Then he drew from his leather bag his own breakfast of coarse black bread, which he laid on a rock for the Stranger, who ate of the bread thankfully, and drank the clear water which Conrad brought, talking as he ate.

"So, my little lad, thou art alone, keeping thy Easter feast?"

"Not really keeping the feast," replied Conrad, sadly; "for I may not praise God in His house with His people. And besides, I have no gifts for an offering. Would that I had!"

"Hast thou not learned that who truly wills in any place may worship God and give Him glory? And who truly wills to give God gifts in his heart gives them? And who truly wills to live the risen life, remembering God in all His ways and desiring to know and serve and honor Him, assuredly doeth this all? Believe me, my child, thy Easter prayers and gifts are both truly given and truly accepted."

Then, suddenly the Stranger was gone, and Conrad, looking and wondering, could see no trace of him upon all the high Alp. But a strange new beauty had come to the mountains; the sunshine which now flooded the slopes lay warm upon the young grass; in the glancing spray of the foaming stream trembled lovely little rainbows, and at Conrad's feet were unfolded the faintly blue, frail, fragrant waxen bells of the first hyacinth of the year. And upon the rock lay no longer fragments of coarse black bread, but shining white wheaten wafers which, when he tasted, the boy found to be wondrous sweet.

"What," Conrad asked himself, "hath wrought this wondrous change?"

"Christ hath arisen and passed this way," a Voice seemed to say in answer to his question; and, falling on his knees, he whispered, "Alleluia!"

"Thou hast not forgotten me and I will never forget thee," the wonderful Voice continued. "Prayers, praise and gifts are all accepted; and in other days it shall be given thee to offer these in other ways. But know henceforth that all true giving begins in the heart's true desire, and that all desires of all hearts are known to me."

Conrad still knelt, glad and wondering, gazing at the delicate beauty of the faint blue flower at his feet, the tiny jewel-like rainbows of the flashing water, and the verdant slopes rising up to the gleaming white snow-peaks that soared into the dazzling sapphire of the Easter sky; and from all he seemed to hear the joyful cry, "Christ is arisen!" "Alleluia. He is risen indeed!"—Alice Ranlett, in the Young Christian Soldier.

The South's Best Book Store

HUNTER & CO

105 E. Broad Street

Richmond, Va.

Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen

Prompt and Reliable Service

The Wing-Foot Electric Shoe Repair Shop

ALL KINDS OF GENERAL REPAIRING

Mail Orders a Specialty

Owned and Managed by T. A. BUNNELL

311 N. Second St. Phone Ran. 1286-W

Spring Styles

NOW READY

Have Your Old Hat Fixed Like New

Many customers use their old hats by having them made over for their children. We specialize on children's hats.

PARCEL POST DEPARTMENT AT YOUR SERVICE.

VERRA HAT WORKS

211 NORTH FIRST STREET

RANDOLPH 90

"The Store that Pleases"

FOR FURNITURE

Jones Bros. & Co.

Incorporated

1418-20 E. Main St., Richmond, Va

Jno. L. Williams & Sons

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565)

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds.

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson

Security Storage Company, Inc.

Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage

Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

NAVAJO SANITARIUM

"In the Land of Waterfalls"

2250 Feet Above Sea Level

Conducted by

Thomas J. Summey, M. D.

Brevard, N. C.

A private hospital for mild nervous and mental cases, chronic heart and kidney diseases and general debility.

On strictly ethical lines. Equipped to care for a limited number of patients. In town and mountains.

Strict attention given to dietetics.

R. Geissler, Inc.
56 West Eighth Street, New York
Memorials
FOR THE CHURCH
Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

The Richmond Mica Co.
Oldest Ground Mica Factory in the World
Manufacturers of
GROUND MICA OF UNSURPASSED PURITY AND LUSTRE
BY EXCLUSIVE PROCESS
Factory, 321-323 S. Ninth St.
Office, Cor. Eighth and Main Sts.
RICHMOND, VA.

Service
That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.
Service—in your church, in your home, in your business. That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.
Service, and a price commensurate with that service.
Sydnor & Hundley
FURNITURE
CARPETS DRAPERIES

R. L. Christian & Company
514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.
Leading Fancy Grocer
AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES
Special attention given to out-of-town orders.
Catalogue mailed on application.

NICK BULL'S MARKET,
Richmond's Leading Dealer in
FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME
312 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va
Phone Randolph 1680
WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

Swing Ye Gates of Morn.

Open swing the gates of morn, and the skies are all a-flame,
Golden rays the hills adorn and the Eastertide proclaim:
Empty see the garden tomb, and the sentries far had fled,
He is risen, He is risen, He is risen, as He said!

Open swing the gates of morn, while the dawn resplendent glows,
Ended is the shame and scorn, for the Lord from death arose;
Vain the guard, the royal seal, He Who suffered in our stead,
He is risen, He is risen, He is risen, as He said!

Open swing the gates of morn, and the light of life shall shine.
Cease from grief, O souls forlorn, and rejoice in love divine;
Haste, O haste to Galilee, for the King no more is dead,
He is risen, He is risen, He is risen, as He said!

—Selected.

Little Things.

Little things are often nearest;
Little words are always dearest;
Little seeds produce the trees;
Little drops of rain, the seas;
Little words of kindness often
Will a heart of anger soften.

—Our Little Folks.

Church Furnishings, Memorials, etc.

MOLLER PIPE ORGANS
Highest grade instruments. In use in three thousand churches. Every organ specially designed for the church and service in which it is to be used and fully guaranteed. Specifications and estimates on request. Correspondence solicited.
M. P. MÖLLER
Hagerstown, Maryland.

CHURCH VESTMENTS
Cassocks, Surplices, Stoles
EMBROIDERIES
Silks, Cloths, Fringes
CLERICAL SUITS
Rabats, Collars, Shirts
COX SONS & VINING
2 Madison Avenue New York

CHURCH FURNISHINGS
Gold, Silver and Brass
Church and Chancel Furniture
Write for Catalogue for Episcopal Churches
W. & E. SCHMIDT CO.
88 Third Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

WHEN WRITING OUR ADVERTISERS PLEASE MENTION THIS PUBLICATION

Margaret Slattery's Inspiring Books
No Woman in America Speaks or Writes with Greater Inspirational Force

The Highway to Leadership
Reveals the avenues to leadership in a fascinating manner. $1.50.

Jesus Christ is Born To-day
Three essay messages of opportunity and service. Paper, 35 cents.

Never Mind Me
Four essays which breathe a challenge to unselfish patriotism and higher citizenship. Paper, 35 cents.

The American Girl and Her Community
Probably no woman in America is better qualified to write a book of this nature than Miss Slattery. $1.35.

The Girl and Her Religion
A topic of unusual interest treated by an expert. $1.50.

The Girl in Her Teens
Pointed, pithy, practical. Packed with information of immense value to the parent and teacher of girls. $1.10.

A Guide for Teachers of Training Classes
Practical aid to the teacher of the training class by the best known authority on the subject. 50 cents net.

Just Over the Hill
No one has a warmer love for boys and girls or a keener insight into their needs than Miss Slattery. $1.50.

Living Teachers
"Her illustrations are pointed and potent, her language beautiful and artistic, and her spirit Christ-like."—The Lookout. 60 cents.

The Charm of the Impossible
"If I had the money I'd gladly place a copy in the hands of every pastor, every superintendent and every Sunday school teacher in North America."—Marion Lawrance. Art boards, 50 cents; Envelope Edi., 35 cents.

A Girl's Book of Prayer
Cannot fail to stimulate a girl's devotional spirit and deepen her religious life. Boards, 35 cents; Cloth, 60 cents.

The Seed, Soil an Sowe
Filled with stimulating, encouraging words to the teacher who wonders how to effectually reach particular boys and girls with the truth of the Bible. 60 cents.

The Teacher's Candlestick
"A poet-minded teacher's way of talking about the fundamentals of the art of teaching."—Sunday School Times. 60 cents.

Talks With the Training Class
"An unusually bright, suggestive, readable, helpful book." Boards, 60 cents net; Paper, 45 cents net.

He Took It Upon Himself
Men and women at work in any line of endeavor looking toward the uplift of their fellowmen will find in this book encouragement and new incentives." 75 cents.

At Your Dealers
THE PILGRIM PRESS
14 Beacon Street, BOSTON 19 W. Jackson Street, CHICAGO

CHURCH PEWS

PULPIT FURNITURE

SUNDAY SCHOOL CHAIRS, BLACKBOARDS, ETC.

Virginia School Supply Company

2010-12 West Marshall Street, Richmond, Va.

"If you want a bank with a heart, try the American National"

This is a bit of advice one of our customers gave to a friend who was coming to Richmond.

Our modesty would never lay claim to such a title, but as it was given us unsolicited, we ask you to put us to the test.

American National Bank

Richmond, Va.

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor

Richmond, Va.

DISTANCE

Makes no difference to Berry patrons—our Mail Order Department can serve you anywhere; delivery free.

Write for our new catalogue of MEN'S and BOY'S CLOTHING.

The South's "Old Home" store with new blood and best values!

O. N. Berry Co.
ESTABLISHED 1879

Main and 11th Sts., Richmond, Va.

Earn Extra Dollars in Your Spare Hours

You need no experience to be successful—You can learn as you earn. Let us tell you about our plan.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN is the oldest Episcopal Church Paper published in America. Every dollar received in subscriptions will be devoted to the improvement of the paper and the extension of its service in the work of the Church.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

Street.....

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, exceptin positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

FAMINE RELIEF.

For the convenience of our readers we publish the addresses of the treasurers of the various Relief Funds whose appeals for the starving, and especially for starving children, are so urgent and touching. The Southern Churchman will forward contributions to any of these, but to save time, postage and possibility of miscarriage, checks would better be sent directly to the treasurers as below:

Near East Relief (formerly "Armenian and Syrian Relief")—Cleaveland H. Dodge, No. 1 Madison Ave., New York City.

European Relief (Central and Eastern Europe)—Franklin K. Lane, 42 Broadway, New York City; or locally for Virginia, DeSoto Fitzgerald, 218 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.

Chinese Famine Relief—Remit through Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer, Presiding Bishop and Council, 281 Fourth Ave., New York City.

PIPE ORGANS

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID in building churches. rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

DON'T TRY ON YOUR NEW DRESSES over your old corset. Let us help you select and fit to you the corset that does greatest justice to your figure. The Corset Shop, 317 N. Fifth St. Mrs. A. J. Pyle, Prop. Phone Ran. 3397.

Doll Skirts Accordion Pleated Free. ASHBY B. PYLE, 315 N. 5th St. Hemstitching, Pinking and Button Covering.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER

Invites you to inspect her line of GAGE Tailored HATS. Also the ADVANCE Showing of Spring Hats in the most attractive shapes.
209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

STAR CLEANING CO.

Richmond, Va., Cleaning, Pressing, Dyeing and Repairing. Prices reasonable; workmanship the best. Special attention given parcel post orders.

NIAGARA METAL WEATHER STRIPS Saves 25 per cent. Fuel, Prevents Rattling Windows, keeps out Dust, Dirt and Storm.
CINCINNATI REWIRABLE METAL AND WOOD FRAME SCREENS.
L. F. HEROLD,
2 N. 11th St., Richmond, Va.
Phone Randolph 3550.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

RELIGIOUS.

THE BROTHERHOOD OF ST. BARNABAS offers to laymen seeking the Religious Life opportunity of trying out their vocation and of caring for the sick poor. Address Brother Superior, Gibsonia, Pa.

I take this method of thanking my many clients for their past patronage, and assure them I am still selling Spirella corsets, and can be reached at the Wallerstein, Apartment 202, or by phone, Randolph 3694-W. MISS MYRTLE McDONNELL.

HELP WANTED

YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCATION AND refinement wanted to enter the St. John's Hospital Training School for Nurses (Episcopal), Brooklyn, N. Y. Applicants required to have one year of high school or its equivalent. Course three years. A registered school of high standing. Nurses receive remuneration. Many social privileges. Home life pleasant. Graduates are now receiving $6.00 per day. Apply to St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED FOR 1921-22 AS MASTER IN the Grammer Department of a Church school, an unmarried man with teaching and playground experience. Apply St Albans School, Washington, D. C.

PRINCETON SENIOR WANTS SUMMER employment as tutor for boy about entering Freshman class, or in advanced English. Would be glad to travel as companion, or to manage small tourist party. Address "M.," care Southern Churchman.

WANTED—A REFINED, CAPABLE woman as mother's helper. Two small children in family. Write Mrs. W. Holmes Robertson, Gainesville, Va.

WANTED—A REFINED, MIDDLE-AGED lady as nursery governess to take entire charge of two small children. References required. Address E. I. B., 503 Chestnut Street, Wilmington, N. C.

REFINED, EDUCATED WOMAN DEsires engagement as housekeeper, house mother in school, care of gentleman's home and children, or any position where executive ability is desired. References. Address "L. S. L.," care Southern Churchman.

REFINED, EDUCATED WOMAN DEsires engagement as housekeeper, house mother in a school, care of gentleman's home and children, or any position where executive ability is desired. References Address L. S. L., care Southern Churchman.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

Murray: Entered into eternal life at her home, "Cedar Park," West River, Md., March 15, 1921, ALICE MURDOCK MURRAY, daughter of the late Dr. James H. and Fanny H. Murray.

Fetter: Entered into life eternal on Friday, March 18, 1921, at his home in Ashland, Ky., DR. SAMUEL PRITCHARD FETTER, son of Rev. Thomas and Mrs. Elizabeth Fetter. Dr Fetter was a vestryman of Calvary Church, Ashland, Ky. May he rest in peace

Plummer: Entered into life eternal, March 10, 1921, at her home on Lawrence Street, Petersburg, Va., REBECCA FENTON widow of the late William T. Plummer.

"Her children shall rise up and call her blessed."

Pegram: March 19, 1921, at the residence of her son-in-law, Charles W. Warren, Smithfield, Va., MRS ELAIR PEGRAM passed into eternal life. She leaves two daughters, Mrs. Thomas N. Jones and Mrs. Charles W. Warren; one grandson, Walker Pegram Warren. Burial at Lower Surry Church, Bacon's Castle.

ALICE MURDOCK MURRAY.

Having entered into life eternal at her home, "Cedar Park," West River, Md., ALICE MURDOCK MURRAY, daughter of the late Dr. James H. and Fanny H. Murray, was laid to rest in Quaker burying ground on Wednesday, March 16, 1921. Miss Murray was a devoted member of Christ Church and a most enthusiastic worker for missions. Her sympathies were wide reaching, and when once she felt the call to help that cause never lacked a friend. She labored often beyond her strength to bring others to an interest like her own. Bright and intelligent, of strong convictions, her simple faith in God her Saviour was beautiful. Like her sister, Margaret Cheston Murray, who preceded her a little over a year ago, she will be sadly missed by family, friends and church, for she had gifts unusual and all were dedicated to her Lord. R. A. M.

An Easter Song of Triumph.

Awake, O Earth, awake!
Today the Saviour rose!
Let songs of gladness break
The triumph of His foes.
Awake, awake! His praises sing!
With joy let heaven's arches ring.

They thought to crush His power—
To cover Him with shame;
He triumphed in that hour,
All glory to His name!
All glory to the Saviour give;
Through Him we evermore shall live.

The grave could not Tim hold!
His wraps were laid aside;
Away the stone was rolled;
He lived; the Crucified!
Ye sons of men, rejoice, rejoice!
Give praise to God with heart and voice.

God's well-beloved Son
Henceforth a crown shall wear;
A victory He won,
Which saves from dark despair.
The risen Christ, Whom We adore,
Shall reign supreme forevermore.
—John M. Morse.

God takes this dreadful thing we call death and makes of it an anaesthetic (for does not Paul speak of the death of the believer as a sleep?), and under its soothing ministry the change is wrought in the child of God which fits him for immortality.—Cut Gems.

Without His resurrection, the death of Christ would be of no avail, and His grave the grave of all our hopes. A gospel of a dead Saviour would be a miserable failure and delusion. The resurrection is the victory of righteousness and life over sin and death.—Selected.

Sacramental Wine

Absolutely Pure Grape Wine

Made expressly for use at the Communion Table

Established 1857

Phone, Write or Call
Tel. Cortlandt 3001

H.T. Dewey & Sons Co.

Address Either
138 Fulton Street, New York City
or Cellars, Egg Harbor, New Jersey

Decorated: Mrs. Burton French, war worker, told in Paris a story about a soldier.

"All disfigured soldiers," she said, "should have the spirit of a lad I saw in a hospital at Chateau Thierry. His face was a mass of bandages, and I said to him gently, 'You poor, poor boy.' 'Don't pity me, ma'am,' replied the soldier; 'pity my buddies over there who got hit where it ain't going to show.'

" 'Then,' I said, 'you don't mind being disfigured.'

" 'Disfigured!' scoffed the soldier; 'I ain't disfigured; I'm decorated.' "

This is the answer to those who wince at the "bloody" cross and shy at singing of the print of the nails in His hand; and the wounds of the thorns on His brow; to whom the cross in its bold literalism smacks of the shambles. The blood, the wounds, the agony on the face of Jesus, are not disfiguring; they are the royal decorations that the King of heaven bestows on the Prince of Glory after He has met the enemy and won the fight.—Dr. John F. Cowan.

There is a cowardice in this age which is not Christian. We shrink from the consequences of truth. We look around and cling dependently. We ask what men will think; what others will say—whether they will not stare in astonishment Perhaps they will; but he who is calculating that will accomplish nothing in this life. The Father—the Father which is with us and in us—what does He think? God's work cannot be done without a spirit of independence. A man has got some way in the Christian life when he has learned to say, humbly and yet majestically, "I dare to be alone."—F. W. Robertson.

A preacher recently, in his earnest sermon on giving, speaking of the importance of having a regular system, inadvertently remarked, "If you cannot afford to give a tenth, then give a fifth." It would be a good plan, too, for many who feel they cannot afford to give more to God. Double your giving. It will multiply by geometrical ratio your returns.—C. G. Trumbull.

Life is vanquisher of Death;
And the joy man lost of old
That he now recovereth,
Even Paradise to hold.
For the cherub keeping ward
By the promise of the Lord
Turns the many-flaming sword,
And the willing gates unfold.
—From the Latin.

JOHN M. DOYLE
MEMORIAL TABLETS
14 S. THIRD ST. PHILADELPHIA
CATALOGUE ON REQUEST

JUST READY

More "FIVE-MINUTE TALKS"

By Walter R. Bowie, D.D.

SUNNY WINDOWS

Author of "The Children's Year"

AND OTHER SERMONS

Here is another volume of Dr. Bowie's talks to youngsters, all attractively suited to the child mind. The subjects are arresting themes, calculated to almost invariably catch the attention of boy or girl—while the treatment thereof is simplicity itself.

As the Record of Christian Work said: "Dr. Bowie's talks are capital—straight to the hearts of children, clever, interesting, helpful."

Cloth, $1.25 net

For Sale by
Southern Churchman Co., Richmond, Va.

The Best of the New Things for Springtime

In the enthusiastic seeking of "lower prices" which seems to have become so general during recent months, there is danger, we think, of overstepping the bounds of true economy and mistaking the cheap and tawdry for the low-in-price.

This is one reason why you will find a visit to this store particularly helpful at this time, in fulfilling your plans for the new season.

No unworthy goods may find a place among the stocks, and we think you may safely rely upon our taste and good judgment in selection.

And while everything here is of the same high, dependable quality that has always been characteristic at MILLER & RHOADS, prices are now materially lower.

To-day the store is gaily decked out in its spring-time dress, splendidly ready to serve your every need, whether for articles of apparel and personal adornment or for the home.

Miller & Rhoads

"The Shopping Center" Richmond, Va.

LEARN MUSIC AT HOME

Don't Be a "Wall Flower"

Piano, Organ, Violin, Cornet, Guitar, Banjo, Mandolin, Harp, 'Cello, Trombone, Flute, Clarinet, Piccolo, Saxophone, Ukelele, Sight Singing, Harmony and Composition, Hawaiian Steel Guitar, Tenor Banjo, Drum and Traps.

No longer need the ability to play be shut out of your life. Just mail coupon or postal to-day for our new Free Book. Let us tell you how you can easily, quickly, thoroughly learn to play your favorite musical instrument by note in your own home, without a teacher by our New Improved Home Study Method. Different, easier than private teacher way—no tiresome, dry exercises—no inconvenience, no trick music, no "numbers," yet simple, wonderful, amazingly easy for a mere child.

SPECIAL OFFER

We want to have ONE PUPIL IN EACH LOCALITY AT ONCE to help advertise our wonderful, easy system of teaching music.

We therefore offer our marvelous lessons and charge only for postage and sheet music, Beginners or advanced pupils. Get all the proof, facts, letters from pupils. AMAZING OFFER and fascinating New Book just issued. ALL FREE! Write postal to-day. Instruments supplied when needed, cash or credit.

U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC
371 Brunswick Bldg., New York

U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC,
371 Brunswick Bldg., New York.

Please send me your free book, "Music Lessons in your own home," and particulars of special offer

Name_____
(Please print name)
Address_____
City_____State_____

Vapo Cresolene

(Established 1879)

Used for more than forty years. The benefit derived from it is unquestionable.

FOR more than a generation we have been receiving grateful testimony to the virtues of this thoroughly tested and proven treatment. It stops violent coughing, and difficult breathing, assuring restful sleep because the antiseptic vapor carries healing with every breath. Booklet 48 tells why the diseases for which Cresolene is recommended yield to this simple and dependable treatment.

Vapo-Cresolene is sold by druggists

VAPO-CRESOLENE CO., 62 Cortlandt Street, New York

The Emerson Shoe

HONEST ALL THROUGH

Black and Dark Tan Men's Vici Kid Shoes

THE CORRECTOR

And

EMERSON LASTS

A $10.00 Shoe, Extra Special

at $7.25

Send us your size

Woodall & Quarles

7 E. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

To abort a cold and prevent complications take

Calotabs

The purified and refined calomel tablets that are nauseless, safe and sure.

Medicinal virtues retained and improved. Sold only in sealed packages. Price 35c.

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffein contained in each:

Black tea—1 cupful (hot) (5 fl. oz.) ..... 1.54 gr.

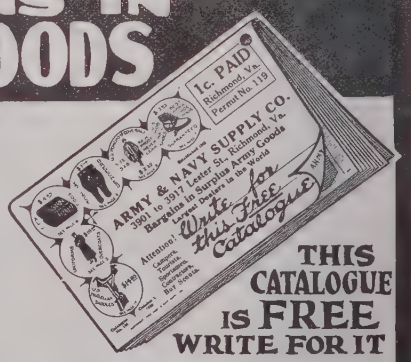
Green tea—1 glassful (cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice) ..... 2.02 gr.

Coca-Cola—1 drink, 8 fl. oz. (prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup) ..... .61 gr.

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

The Coca-Cola Co., Dept. J, Atlanta, Ga., U. S. A.



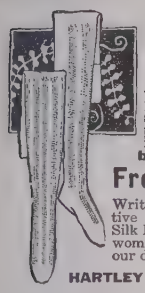
J1

BARGAINS IN U.S. ARMY GOODS

Riding Breeches, Shirts, (Khaki or Olive Drab), Boots, Shoes, Overalls, Slikers, Wool or Cotton Socks, Leather Leggings, Wagons, Saddles, etc.

For complete list and prices, write TO-DAY to DEPARTMENT P, Box 1835, Richmond, Va.

"If the Army used it, We have it"



THIS CATALOGUE IS FREE WRITE FOR IT

ARMY AND NAVY SUPPLY CO.

RICHMOND, VA.

WHEN WRITING OUR ADVERTISERS PLEASE MENTION THIS PUBLICATION

SILK HOSE
DIRECT TO YOU

Saves you 25c to 60c a pair. Our leader—Ladies' full-fashioned, highest grade pure silk stockings, five-thread linen spliced heel and toe: $2.60 a pair, three pairs $6.00. Strongest and best wearing hosiery on the market. Money back if not satisfied.

Free Samples showing colors and quality of silk.

Write for these today with new descriptive Price List of our full line of Silk, Silk Lisle, Fibre Silk and Cotton hosiery for women, misses, men and children—all at our direct-to-you money-saving prices.

HARTLEY HOSIERY CO., Louisville, Ky.

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health and, above all,

Provide yourself with Traveler's Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank
Richmond, Virginia

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS
FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG
S. T. Beveridge & Co.
Office: 1217 East Cary Street
Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd
Richmond, Va.

HICKORY HILL DAHLIA FARM
QUALITY DAHLIA
Box 227-C, Richmond, Va
Send for a Catalogue

HOT WATER HEAT
For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars
ARCOLA SYSTEM
R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.
9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

O. Luetke's Art Works
Church Furnishings
IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.
Est. 1886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

Clear Baby's Skin With Cuticura Soap and Talcum
Soap, Ointment, Talcum, 25c. everywhere. For samples address: Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. V, Malden, Mass.

Not Merely

a counting house, but a people's bank and a useful servant in this community.

We believe that it is the duty of any company which serves the public to be a builder of good will in its community, and that its success depends upon the efficiency of its service.

3% interest on savings and dormant accounts. Interest figured on daily balances.
Irrespective of its size, we invite your account.

Richmond Trust Company

Capital and Surplus, $1,200,000 — Main and 7th Streets

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company
Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President — E. B. Addison, Vice-President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary — J. C. Watson, Treasurer
J. M. Leake, General Agent — Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

(Just Published)

The Gospel of Life

By the Reverend
PHILLIPS STANDISH GILMAN
Author of "The Church and the Individual," etc.
With an Introduction by
THE BISHOP OF EAST CAROLINA

A pithy book for a busy age, with a vital, practical message of divine truth for the attainment of HEALTH, HAPPINESS and HOLINESS.

READ THE FOLLOWING OPINIONS

"I pray that it may bring a fuller appreciation of all that the blessed Christ may mean to those who are willing to accept His promises and follow Him all of the way."—Bishop Darst.

"It is splendid."—Rev. H. B. Wilson, Society of the Nazarene.

"Spiritual, practical and full of the Gospel of Christ."—Rev. Prof. S. A. Wallis, D. D, Virginia Theological Seminary.

"Particularly apt and inspiring. The appendix is of tremendous value."—Rev. F. M. Wetherill, St. John's, Philadelphia.

Price, 75 Cents, Postpaid

The Southern Churchman Co.,
Richmond, Va.

SOW

DIGGS & BEADLES'

TESTED

SEEDS

3 STORES RICHMOND, VA.

Ask for Our Catalogue

Young Men's Christian Association

Grace and Seventh Streets
Richmond, Va.

Information, Reading, Rest, Visitors Welcome

92 ROOMS FOR MEN 92

Hot and Cold Water
Shower Baths

Gymnasium, Swimming Pool, Bowling Alleys, Games, etc.
Gospel Meetings and Bible Study

For information, address
S. K. McKEE, Gen'l Sec'y
P. O. Drawer 1238

Many pens have attempted to write a Life of Christ since Canon Farrar wrote his famous volume. The difficulty with most of them is that they give so much attention to technical details they do not hold the interest of the general reader. For some time there has been need of a book that would make its appeal through its clearness and charm of treatment.

This need has now been filled by

PATERSON-SMYTH'S
NEW BOOK

A PEOPLE'S LIFE OF CHRIST

Told in a way that will be read again and again for the solid enjoyment it affords.

The Churchman says: "A book which the average man will read for the pleasure of reading it—a new and popular version for the day and generation."

ONLY $3.50 NET

THE SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO.
RICHMOND, VA.

Are You Burying Your Talents?

Have you stopped to think that, if you are keeping at home any considerable sum of money you are doing yourself a great injustice? Certainly you are, because you are depriving yourself of the interest your money should earn for you.

Let us write your name on our books.

Planters National Bank
Main and 12th Streets

Resources over $20,000,000.00

Unwise Handling of Money

There are still some people who either thoughtlessly or deliberately keep their money in secret places of their own, trying to protect it themselves instead of keeping it where money belongs, namely, in a strong bank.

The National State and City Bank—for over half a century a progressive Bank of the South—invites your accounts, small or large.

National State and City Bank
1111 E. Main Street, - - Richmond, Va.

Have You Made Your Will?

See G. Jeter Jones, Vice-President, about this now. All conferences confidential. Phone or write for appointment.

Merchants National Bank
11th and Main Streets, Richmond, Va.

"SAFEST FOR TRUSTS"

FOR QUICK SERVICE CALL RANDOLPH 1978-W
We Clean One Small Rug Free as a Trial

Electric Carpet Cleaning Co.

W. F. POAT
16 West Grace Street, Richmond, Va.

Carpets and Rugs Washed and Dried right on the floor!

Hamilton Beach method used exclusively—the nationally advertised way.

Called For and Delivered

Southern Churchman

DOMINUS FRUSTRA NISI 1835

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., APRIL 9, 1921. No. 15.

The Set of the Soul.

One ship goes east, another west,
By the selfsame, winds that blow;
'Tis the set of the sails, and not the gale,
That determines the way they go.
Like the winds of the sea are the ways of fate,
As we voyage along through life;
'Tis the set of the soul that decides the goal,
And not the calm or the strife.

—Rebecca R. Williams.

EDUCATIONAL

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

Established A. D. 1823.

The ninety-seventh session will open on Wednesday, September 15th, 1920.

Special Students Admitted

For catalogue or other information, address the dean or Secretary.

Theological Seminary
Alexandria, Va.

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to
REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean
Petersburg, Va.

The Virginian Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY.

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-third year of this School for Boys opens September 15, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university. Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to

REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D.,
Rector

Virginia, Chatham. Box 13.

The Chatham Episcopal Institute for Girls

Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Thorough preparation for all colleges. New buildings. Ten-acre campus. Athletics. Gymnasium. Terms moderate. Catalogue and views.

B. D. Tucker, D. D., President; Rev. C. O. Pruden, D. D., Rector; Miss Annie Marian Powell, A. B., Sweet Briar, A. M., Columbia, Prin.

SEWANEE MILITARY ACADEMY

In an ideal spot, heart of the Cumberland Mountains, 2,000 feet elevation. College preparatory; also builds for citizenship. Student body are boys of character who are developed into manly men of purpose. 40-acre campus, with 8,000-acre added domain. Vigorous outdoor life; all athletics. R. O. T. C. Episcopal. Owned and controlled by 22 Southern Dioceses of the Episcopal Church. Early registration advisable. Catalog.

COL. DuVAL G. CRAVENS, Supt.
Box 664, Sewanee, Tenn.

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each.

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

They are slaves who dare not be
In the right with two or three.
—Lowell.

It is a good thing to say what you think, and be truthful, but never forget to think what you say, and be thoughtful.

If we seek Christ earnestly and follow God's revelation, we shall find Him.

"We are most of us very lonely in this world; you who have any who love you, cling to them and thank God."

Be sure that God
Ne'er dooms to waste the strength He deigns to impart.
—Robert Browning.

Ambition becomes aspiration when it is attuned to a heavenly key.—Dr. A. T. Pierson.

After four years of study in one of our great State universities, a Japanese student returned to his country to become a Shinto priest. He said that while in this country he had never come in touch with "that which they call Christianity."

Does it seem an idle thing,
A pleasant word to speak?
The face you wear, the thought you bring,
A heart may heal or break.
—Whittier.

There is no sort of wrong deed of which a man can bear the punishment alone: you can't isolate yourself and say that the evil which is in you shall not spread. Men's lives are as thoroughly blended with each other as the air they breathe; evil spreads as necessarily as disease. Every sin causes suffering to others besides those who commit it.—George Eliot.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,

REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

St. Christopher's School

(Formerly the Chamberlayne School)

A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND VA.

Tenth session begins September 22, 1920 Tuition in boarding department limited to twenty-two boys—$700.

For catalogue, address

Rev. C. G. Chamberlayne, Ph. D., Headmaster

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.

A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. College preparatory. Boarding department 503 W. Franklin Street. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health; out-door life.

MISS ROSALIE H. NOLAND, Principal

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLES TOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

St. Paul's Girls' School

BALTIMORE

A church school where the usual Grammar and High School grades are taught; also classes in Domestic Science. Spacious building; grounds for athletics and outdoor life. Moderate tuition. A few scholarships. Address

MISS MARION MITCHELSON
2411 N. Charles St., Baltimore, Md.

The Divinity School of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Philadelphia.

Founded by Bishop Alonzo Potter in 1862.

Special students admitted. Privilege of attending course of special study at the University of Pennsylvania.

For information address the Rev. George G. Bartlett, S. T. D., Dean, 5000 Woodland Avenue.

UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA.

SUMMER QUARTER

First term, June 20 to July 30; second term, Aug. 2 to Sept. 3. Faculty, over 100; courses, over 300; attendance last year, 1856. Courses for teachers and college students. College credit. Degrees conferred on men and women. Most beautiful campus in America. Cost very reasonable. For catalogue and full information, write to

CHAS. G. MAPHIS, Dean, University, Va.

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., APRIL 9, 1921. No. 15.

THE CHURCH SCHOOLS FOR NEGROES

The article in this issue of the Southern Churchman written by Dr. Patton points the road toward the solution of one of the great human problems of our time. Few questions are more complex and difficult than that of the relationship between two such different races as the whites and the blacks. It is a problem which affects particularly the South, inasmuch as the greater part of the negroes are concentrated there, but it affects also in increasing measure other parts of the nation to which economic currents have carried the negro, and where their presence has already bred serious difficulties—as witness, for example, the race riots in Chicago. We look back through the years and see what fateful consequences have followed when immediate profit and advantage made men blind, as it so often does, to the long certainty of retribution which the violati n of human ideals is bound to cause. The population of the North and South alike in the original colonies of the Atlantic seaboard were guilty of the slave-trade—one part because they brought them, another part because they bought them. And now here they are in our midst, this black population, separate by so great a gulf, in their origin, their history, and all their sub-conscious impulses from the white race among whom their destiny, through no choice of their own, is cast. The fact confronts us. What shall be done in relation to it?

We are clear, in the first place, as to what ought not to be done. We can be sure that neglect furnishes no answer to the problem. We cannot hide our heads in the sand, or elaborate on our difficulties and make perplexities an excuse for doing nothing. The best thought of Christian people must be turned toward this necessity of race adjustment, for there is no more acute test than this of the power of our Christian ideals to cope with the obdurate facts of life.

We can be equally sure, in the second place, that the spirit of bitterness offers no solution. There are leaders among both races who deliberately try to inflame race antagonism, and preach the mob hatred which would advance its own interests at the expense of that of others. Christian people know that not in this atmosphere can any human difficulty findt its right adjustment.

What we do need is the training of leaders among both races who will view the whole matter of our common civilization with sympathy and wisdom, and will develop among the two races such co-operation as will make for the integrity and the right development of each. So far as the help of the stronger race to the weaker one is concerned, there can be no better gift than the encouragement of institutions where leaders for the negro race will be trained. The great institutions at Hampton and Tuskegee are known all over the nation as exemplars of this training and leadership. But even our own Church people often know little of the noble part that has been played, and is being played, by the negro schools of our own Church. They have fought against the difficulties of inadequate support. They have shown what the courageous devotion of a few leaders can do to build up institutions of service with few to help. They are recognized and honored by educators in the United States who view them impartially for their absolute worth. It is good to know that the Nation-Wide Campaign has already been of help to them; but what they have received is still inadequate. The Church must stand behind them more and more, and the first requisite for this is a wider knowledge of their great value, and the realization that through such training as these schools offer, the Church can make her worthy contribution to the right settlement of one of the most vital human problems of America.

TENDENCIES IN RACE RELATIONSHIPS

Readers of the newspapers may sometimes get a false impression of the influences now working in the South with relation to the race problem. Some weeks ago the Literary Digest printed an illustrated article on the growth in the South of the Ku Klux Klan. Through that article, and by other similar reports, many people have doubtless believed not only that this organizaztion is in existence, and is growing, but that it represents the mind of the South toward the Negro.

Since the Ku Klux Klan is a secret order, nobody outside its membership can speak with complete authority as to all its aims and methods. It claims to have very exalted purposes It is in favor of what it calls 100 per cent. Americanism, and the deliverance of the nation from dominance by any alien group. Probably it would oppose the wretched Pro-Irish propaganda which has injected into so much American political life the hyphenated loyalty to Sinn Fein. Doubtless it would oppose also those political aspects of organized Roman Catholicism of which we spoke in the last issue. It may have, therefore, some aims with which many outside the organization would thoroughly agree; but the damaging and conclusive fact about it is that it has chosen to take the name, and parade again the insignia, of an organization which, whatever may have been the needful part it played in abnormal days, can mean nothing in American life today except the suggestion of race-hatred and bitterness and violence.

In so far as the Ku Klux Klan represents thus hace antagonism, in so far as the name and insignia which it has chosen inevitably suggest this, the thoughtful leaders of the South have set their faces against it. The Governor of North Carolina has expressed his determination as far as he can to keep it out of the State. A few days ago the attempt to organize a local group of the clan in Lynchburg, Va., was denounced in an open statement signed by United States Senator Carter Glass, a native of Lynchburg, by the Mayor of Lynchburg and other leading citizens of the place. An editorial in one of the newspapers of Roanoke, the neighboring city to Lynchburg, quoted their statement and backed up completely their attitude toward the Ku Klux Klan.

In a number of Southern cities there have been formed inter-racial Conference Committees, made up of leaders from both the white and colored races. It is the business of these committees to consider all matters likely to breed difficulty between the races, or exhibiting any unfairness and injustice. In such groups for conference, matters that might develop into causes of bitterness can be adjusted in friendly wisdom. It is the Christian way of meeting the whole race problem, and such methods as these, and not the name and associations of the Ku Klux Klan, represent the controlling spirit of the present South.

THE CHURCH AND YOUNG PEOPLE

In these columns two weeks ago, under the head of "Wanted—Christians Who Think," we expressed what seemed to us the need of a more general use by Christians of brains in their religion. In the Church there is too much taking-things-for-granted, and a comfortable warming ourselves by the fire of the idea that everything is well enough as it is. We need in our Church affairs the same sort of alertness that men show in their business—the criticism of the old by new possibilities of efficiency, the development of better methods through the stimulation of fresh ideas.

As a reply to this editorial, we have received a letter from a correspondent who has been thinking to excellent effect on one of the most conspicuous weaknesses of our Church. This weakness is our lack of organized work for young people. We do not adequately use the young people; we have not adequately called out into expression their latent capacities for leadership; they are not put to work winning other young lives; and, as a result, they lose interest, and the Church loses them.

Says this correspondent in the letter which it was not the writer's desire to have printed, but from which we have asked permission to quote:

"Not long ago I heard a young woman, an Episcopalian, say, 'I don't like to go to my church at night. Nobody is ever there but a lot of old women.' Now she was not blaming the old women for being there, but lamenting the fact that no young people were present.

Recently I was visiting friends in * * * *. * * * Sunday night they proposed to go to the First Presbyterian Church. 'But why not go to ours?' I asked. 'Madeline and Katherine will be at the Presbyterian Church; they go to the Christian Endeavor Society,' was the reply. We went, the church was well filled, fully two-thirds being young people, those who had attended the Christian Endeavor. And thus began my thinking, my studying, my planning.

I found that in all the leading denominations, except the Episcopal, young people's meetings were held before the regular night services. Then I found a few exceptions, but all of the Episcopal churches having such meetings were borrowing their material from other denominational societies. That is very good, but why not have an Episcopal society?

One hears on all sides today the call of training for leadership, and yet in many ways this very leadership is denied the young people of the Church. How many young men would enter the ministry if they only knew that they possessed the latent powers of influence, leadership and executive ability? How many young women would enter into the work of the Church whole-heartedly if they were only sure of themselves? Let the Church give them the chance to offer themselves by proving to them that they are capable.

The following plan would, I believe, help to develop that leadership.

Suppose twenty people joined the society. Let them be divided into four groups of five each, one of which would lead each night. The subjects for study are Bible Study, Church History, Missions and Social Service. The groups would rotate, but the subjects would come in order.

The Bible and Church History studies could be prepared at an organized headquarters, and so need no further comment. Missions and Social Service, however, could be presented in a novel way.

Let each person joining the society be given the name of a missionary, to whom he would write a personal letter, telling of the organization and asking what their particular spiritual needs are and how we can help them most through prayer. One of these letters would furnish material enough for one meeting. How, then, could five people lead one meeting? There could be: (1) Appropriate Bible readings; (2) prayer for missions; (3) letter from a missionary; (4) special prayer for them; (5) study of qualifications for that field. In case the same field was studied often, health conditions, climatic conditions, customs and general missionary work could be substituted. The closing prayer would be for laborers for the harvest.

The Social Service study would be equally as interesting. The group who would lead on that could accompany some worker, for example, as the City Missionary, on some of his numerous rounds, and, under his supervision, even help in his work. The account of this and the needs of the work and workers with prayer would be program enough for a meeting.

Of course, all of this means work, hard work, but that is what we want."

We think that the need of the Church to awake to this matter of the right enlistment of her young people could hardly be more vividly and convincingly stated than in this letter. We believe also that the writer's suggestion as to the way to remedy the difficulty is wise, and it is worth he careful consideration of all who have to do with the life of our congregations.

Book Notices

The Religious Consciousness: A Psychological Study. By James Bissett French, Ph. D., Professor of Philosophy in Williams College. Macmillan Company, New York. 1921. Pp. 497. $2.50.

The psychology of religion as a distinct subject of investigation is a comparatively new branch of that science, and one who has not kept pace with its modern advance is surprised at the many books that have been written upon this one topic and the evidence of painstaking study that has been devoted to it. In the opening chapters of the work before us the reader may gain a general view of what the new science proposes and the methods pursued, and these chapters, though more abstruse and didactic than those that follow, should be carefully studied that both the scope and the limitations of the field may be well understood. It is not the philosophy or the science of religion in itself that is being studied; not its sources nor its values, nor, except indirectly, its powers; but merely the receptive and responsive human faculties which engage and are engaged by it so far as these yield their operations to critical investigation. It would be a vast mistake, therefore, but one into which a careless reader could easily fall, to suppose that the whole field of what is popularly understood by "religion" is covered or is to be estimated by the results obtained. It is as though one would seek to learn all about wireless telegraphy by a critical examination and analysis of the receiver which the operator clamps about his ears. The receiver is a very important part of the apparatus, but beyond there is the apparatus for sending, and the sound-waves and the mysterious force which produces and governs them, and yet further beyond is the intelligence which dictates the message and the will which uses the forces at command to transmit it.

The author is careful therefore to define religion as a thing purely subjective, the responsive attitude to an accepted objective, having little or nothing to do with the "content" accepted or recognized or with the spiritual powers which may be behind and above to which response is made or denied. The human media alone are under discussion. With this limitation clearly in mind this work will repay the careful study of the preacher and teacher of religion. The approach to the defenses of the City of Man-soul are the very field of his operations, and he should know them as well as he can. The religion of childhood and adolescence, the psychology of conversion, of faith, prayer and worship, of revivals, and of mysticism in its various phases, are all discussed here from the empirical standpoint solely; with which the more devout reader gets a little impatient at times, but which is worthy of the fullest understanding. The author is a deep student of his subject and has given us a valuable work which we are glad to recommend.

Music in Worship, and The Spirit of Chivalry. By the Rev. James S. Stone, D. D., Rector of St. James' Church, Chicago. Daughaday & Co., Chicago. Pp. 116. $1.25.

Two sermons delivered on the occasions of the dedication of a new organ and a Knights Templar anniversary service, but containing appeals far beyond the local circumstances which gave them birth. Charmingly written, they are rich in historical allusions and poetic suggestions and are not without their practical message. The latter sermon is based largely on the life of St. Bernard of Clairvaux.

The Scofield Reference New Testament and Psalms. With a New System of Connected Topical References to All the Greater Themes of Scripture, With Annotations, Revised Marginal References, Summaries, Definitions, Chronology and Index. To Which Are Added Helps at Hard Places, Explanations of Seeming Discrepancies, and a New System of Paragraphs. Edited by Rev. C. I. Scofield, D. D. Oxford University Press, 35 West Thirty-second Street, New York. Prices, from $1.50 to $7, according to paper and binding.

The smaller volume is practically the same as the New Testament and Psalms in Scofield's Reference Bible, which is widely known. The plan is an excellent one and will prove helpful to those who wish to study the Scriptures topically. The King James version is used, with occasional emendations of the text. The book is remarkable for the amount of explanation and annotation which are given in so small a space and the readiness with which cross references may be followed when once the system has been gained. The editor yields nothing to modern criticism or interpretation, and his strong Calvinistic bias is evident throughout. His interpretation of The Apocalypse, for instance, is one which we had supposed to have been universally abandoned.

Booklets and Pamphlets.

The Work of Prayer. By (the Rev.) James O. S. Huntington, O. H. C., Holy Cross Press. West Park, N. Y. 50 cents. An attractive little book, devotional in spirit and useful in suggestions.

"Show Us the Father." By Diana Ponsonby. Longmans, Green & Co., New York. 30 cents. A Bible study of the life and teachings of Christ and their meaning as the revelation of God in the daily life.

What a Churchman Ought to Know. By Rev. Frank E. Wilson. Morehouse Publishing Co., Milwaukee. 15 cents. A hand-book primarily for persons preparing for confirmation, with the emphasis laid almost exclusively upon the Church.

The Social Task of the Church, As Set Forth by the Lambeth Conference of 1920, and How to Reach the Foreign Born. Published by the respective Departments of the Presiding Bishop and Council. 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

The Morehouse Company have published in pamphlet form, under the title of Prayer Book Revision Papers, the material recommended by the Revision Commission under titles of Prayers and Collects, Offices of Instruction, Various Short Offices and the Burial of a Child.

A Statement From the Naticn-Wide Campaign Department

The Nation-Wide Campaign Department desires to let the Church know what it knows concerning the pledges for 1921 in the annual canvass of last November. No announcement has been made heretofore for the reason that it was hoped that a fairly complete report covering all of the Dioceses might be available. Up to the present time, however, reports have been received from only thirty-five Dioceses, and these reports are so fragmentary as to give no sure indication of what the total receipts in any Diocese for 1921 may be. Kansas, South Dakota, Vermont, Washington, Erie, North Carolina, Marquette, South Carolina, Virginia, Kentucky, Lexington, Florida, and Georgia—or a little over one-third of the reports received—have filed practically complete returns. Of these the Diocese of Virginia alone has the honor of having recorded more than 100 per cent. of the total quota. Without doubt, Maryland, West Virginia and East Carolina (from which no detailed reports have come) will likewise again be found in the 100 per cent. column when the year ends. In addition to these notes of encouragement, it should not be forgotten that about ten Dioceses, among them the strong Dioceses—Massachusetts, Michigan and Western New York —did not come in on the basis of increased contributions until Easter, 1920, and will, therefore, have the advantage of largely increased offerings during the present year.

By way of comment, and as showing that there have been good gains in many quarters, the congregations in Connecticut which have reported show a 29 per cent. advance over their pledges of a year ago; Vermont pledges an increase of nearly 50 per cent. as compared with her gifts last year; the Diocese of New York feels confident of a gain of 10 per cent.; New Jersey reports that thirty-seven congregations have subscribed 40 per cent. of their quotas this year as compared with 25 per cent. last year; Florida shows an advance of approximately 50 per cent. over last year's pledges; Southern Florida likewise has gone forward a bit; Southern Ohio shows a bulk increase of $5,000; Los Angeles marks perhaps the most notable advance in the Church, the report being that sixty-five of the eighty-five congregations have made an increase of 52 per cent. over their pledges for last year; Utah has moved forward substantially and expects to reach 75 per cent. of her quota.

There are some Dioceses in which the pledges for this year do not compare so favorably with the amounts paid last year. These, however, are more than outweighed by the advances noted above. The advances have come in the stronger centers where, for the most part, the campaign did not achieve as much comparatively as it did in other parts of the Church. In other words, the line is being moved up and consolidated.

When one considers the business depression which has swept the country and then realizes that the Church has moved forward in some measure at least, in its financial expression, there is much in the situation to give encouragement and confidence for the future.

"No Poet's Dream"

The life of Christ is full of surprises. Although today we recognize that life as an ideal life, yet it will be, we think, almost universally admitted that that ideal was not made by man. It is simply an impossibility that, at any time in the world's history, either past or present, human imagination should have given birth to such an ideal. What man would have dreamed of a crucified Christ? Was it possible for the wildest imagination ever to have conceived such a strange and foolish thing as a redemption by suffering and death? And after the darkness of Calvary, did the man ever live who could have invented the resurrection story? And yet, now that we have it, how natural and how real it all seems! Truly, if men imagined this story, they must have been strangely gifted beyond any others known to us.

How marvelous the dramatic intensity of light and shade in this story of Calvary and the resurrection! How startling the contrasts, and yet how effective! Was there ever a darker scene than Calvary presents? Horror is piled on horror; Gethsemane, with its awful darkness, its sweat of blood, its wrestling Saviour, and its sleeping disciples; the betrayal of Judas; the bitter humiliation of the trial scene, with its buffeting and its scourging; the weak-willed governor's judgment, and the weary journey to Calvary; and then the last moments of the crucified Christ, with their vivid details of human suffering and human weakness, culminating in the final scene, when the pale face grows paler still, and with one last cry of agony, the oppressed heart breaks, and the tragedy ends, while overhead the skies are shrouded in inky blackness and the very earth trembles at the weight of the cross! How dark and dreary it seems!

What a world of contrast is the Easter dawn! Pilate's seal and Roman guard and rocky tomb have failed to hold the Man who died in agony only a few hours before. Christ has risen from the dead. Such a triumph surely was never known before, and its brightness is all the more welcome as forming a fitting and poetic sequel to the sorrows of Calvary. Here are united weakness and strength as never before. No poet ever dared to paint so mild and helpless a hero; no poet ever dreamed of painting so great a conqueror, so grand a triumph; and when we realize that this is no mere dramatic picture, painted by a master-hand to thrill a curious crowd, but that it is a message for every sin-burdened son of man; that this story of long ago has a reality that somehow touches every human life, not lightly, but as nothing else on earth could ever touch it; when we understand that this tragedy of Calvary means the salvation of men from sin, and the resurrection triumph means victory over death for every follower of Christ; when we see these things, when their grandeur fully grips us, then we cease to wonder that the sons of men are glad to hail the Easter dawn, and glad to hear the well-won phrase, "Christ is risen." There is no virtue in a dead Christ, and there is no defeat to the living Christ. The Church is wiser than it understands when it emphasizes the Easter joy, "Christ is risen indeed."—Episcopal Recorder.

THE CHURCH'S RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE NEGRO

The Rev. Robert W. Patton, D. D.

This subject of the Christian training of Negro teachers and leaders of their race is dark with menace to America or bright with promise of happy solution according as the Church neglects or accepts its responsibilities.

Let me state briefly the aim of the American Church Institute for Negroes. It is an Institute incorporated under the laws of the State of Virginia, and is the official organ of the Presiding Bishop and Council. It has authority to receive and administer endowments and bequests to be held as trust funds for Negro education under the spiritual supervision of the Episcopal Church, and to receive and disburse all money given for the maintenance of the Negro schools in the Southern States recognized by the Institute. In addition to the Bishop Payne Divinity School at Petersburg, Va., the Institute now recognizes and contributes to the support of nine Industrial High Schools for Negroes in as many Southern Dioceses. Of these nine schools, the three largest are St. Paul's, Lawrenceville, Va., St. Augustine's, Raleigh, N. C., and the Fort Valley High and Industrial, Fort Valley, Ga. In these three schools, admirably and economically managed, fifteen hundred Negro boys and girls are receiving systematic training in Christian citizenship and instruction in numerous useful trades and industries. That these schools are efficiently doing the work committed to them is abundantly proved by the fact that the Negro young men and women who have had these advantages not only generally become wise and respected leaders of their people, but are sought in far larger numbers than we can supply by the white public school superintendents in every State in the South.

I have never heard a Southern white man living in the environment of any of the schools of this character who did not speak of them with enthusiasm. Crime, disorder, discontent, give place through their influence to morality, order, hope and peaceful progress.

That class of white people who still doubt the expediency of Negro education should seriously reflect that the education of the Negro is no longer a debatable question. Every Southern State is committed to it, and larger and larger sums are annually granted from the State treasuries for the purpose. The sole question for practical consideration is, What sort of teachers shall we give the Negro? This is only another way of saying, Shall we educate him in the right way or in the wrong way?

Next to the influence of the home, a child's character is determined by the influences in the school. What influence the school exercises over his life is chiefly determined by the personality of his teachers.

Nearly all the money appropriated by the Southern States for Negro education goes for the establishment and maintenance of primary schools, chiefly covering the grades from the first to the fifth. It is manifest that a competent teacher should be better educated than those he teaches. It follows, therefore, if Church schools can produce in sufficient numbers Negro teachers better educated in mind and character than those who receive merely the beginning of an education in the primary public schools, the Church can, through its teachers, determine the future character of the Negro race in America.

This is in no sense a visionary hope, as is evidenced by the fact that even now nearly one-fourth of the Negro teachers in our Southern public schools have been trained in our own Church, or in such schools as Hampton and Tuskegee. This leaves approximately 75 per cent. of the Negro teachers in the public schools in the South deficient, either in adequate standards of education or of character or of both. The Commissioner of Education, Dr. P. P. Claxton, himself a Southern man, says that practically the only source of supply of Negro teachers of sufficient training in mind and character are the industrial high schools of the churches, and at the present time we are turning out only 23 per cent. out of every 100 needed.

This is a plain challenge to the churches. We must practically multiply our present efforts 400 per cent. if we wish to guarantee intelligent Christian leadership to our Negro people. Never before in the history of any race have the churches had such a challenge and opportunity. The challenge is from the National Bureau of Education at Washington. The opportunity is God-given.

Will the Episcopal Church take the lead? Its own official corporation, the American Church Institute for Negroes, stands ready to execute a carefully thought out and already successfully working plan. Has the Episcopal Church the will and the self-sacrifice necessary to play its part in the capturing for God and country the spiritual leadership of a race of 12,000,000 people in America? It can if it will.

The American Church Institute for Negroes worked for years towards its goal with little encouragement, and often with opposition. Until recently its schools were holding their own with great difficulty. Two years ago, on account of increasing costs and diminishing income, it was evident that accumulating deficits would compel, in a short time, the closing of several of its most important schools, including St. Paul's, Lawrenceville, Va., and the Bishop Payne Divinity School.

The Nation-Wide Campaign not only averted this necessity, but enabled us to take so forward a step that the Episcopal Church now ranks among the leaders of those communions which have begun to answer the challenge from Washington and embrace God's opportunity. The Nation-Wide Campaign has about doubled our resources of a few years ago for supporting this work. Before the Nation-Wide Campaign the appropriations for St. Paul's, Lawrenceville, and for Bishop Payne Divinity School combined, were about $28,000. The appropriations for the present year will be nearly $55,000. This increase in appropriations will enable St. Paul's to close the current school year with little or no deficit for this session. Were it not for accumulated deficits in previous years, St. Paul's would be in exceptionally good financial condition. We thank God and take courage. We are now maintaining nearly twice the number of schools of this class as formerly, with nearly twice the number of enrolled pupils, or about 3,000 in all.

But our share of the responsibility, according to Washington, if we would guarantee intelligent Christian leadership of the race, is an enrollment of about 12,000 boys and girls in our industrial high schools. Up to the present time about 25 per cent. of the Dioceses of the Episcopal Church have met, or a very high percentage of the quota in the Nation-Wide Campaign. Should the whole Church meet 100 per cent. of the financial goal set, the institute would be entitled to its just proportion of the whole, and could at once inaugurate such a development of its policy that in a few years it could aid every Southern Diocese in maintaining a school of this class.

It must be borne in mind that while the increase in our present income from all sources nearly enables us to maintain those schools on their present budget of current expenses, the budgets in every case are cut to the minimum, and little is allowed for badly needed dormitories and other pressing improvements. Meantime, also hundreds are annually turned away because there is no room for them.

Our total estimated income for this year is $220,000. Our total estimated needs for expansion during the next three years, including necessary buildings, for the schools we now have are approximately $300,000 annually. Should we take up the challenge from the Bureau of Education at Washington, as the Methodists, Presbyterians and Baptists have begun to do, our annual expenditure in a very few years should approximate at least double this sum. This goal is easily within the means of the Episcopal Church. We have the dollars. All we need is a heart consecrated to Christ Jesus. Suppose the Episcopal Church and the other communions fail through neglect, prejudice or for any other reason, to embrace this divinely given opportunity to provide intelligent Christian leadership for the Negro race in America, whose will be the responsibility before God and the next generation, if an untaught but naturally loving race becomes the plastic tool of ambitious leaders unrestrained by conscience and inflamed with racial passion?

What saved the South during and immediately after the Civil War from the unspeakable horrors which might have been its lot? Was it primarily fear or was it, as we of the South know full well it truly was, because the heart of the black man was bound to the heart of the white man, by the only ties which are stronger than self-interest or racial prejudice. The old Southern Negro was not, as a rule, educated in the learning of the schools. The other wrongs of slavery are defenseless, but the romance of Christian love between the weak and the strong wrought in the days before 1861, cast its protection over Southern homes and illuminated those dark days which followed with glory, the glory of an enslaved people whose faithful love will ever remain an immortal romance of our history.

Precarious and in many ways unhappy has been the lot of many of the children and grandchildren of those old Negroes. It was not fair to send them forth without preparation to meet the competition with a far stronger race. But in spite of every handicap, many of the race have made creditable progress, not a few are distinguished for thrift, honesty and high Christian character, while a smaller number are men and women of distinction, whose lives are dedicated to noble ends.

This undeniable progress in the teeth of great odds has stimulated the hope and ambition of the race as a whole.

Is any one so un-Christian and un-American as to regret or to be willing to suppress unfairly the awakening of the soul of the black man? If there be any such, his regret may be beyond his control, but it is well to remind him that the aspirations of the human heart cannot be suppressed without disaster. You cannot indict or imprison the reach of the human soul after a better world for itself and its kind.

No thinking man can doubt that the future adjustment of the relations of the Negro and the white man in America will tax the wisdom, forbearance and Christian statesmanship of the best of both races. One thing, however, is certain, that adjustment cannot be made in the future merely by the decision of the white man without regard to the rights, the feelings and the interests of the Negro.

A question sometimes asked is why the Institute does not make appropriations to purely parochial schools or to the evangelistic work among Negroes. The answer is that the Institute was organized for the purpose of encouraging Church schools to train teachers and leaders of the race. Primary parochial schools are frequently important adjuncts to the Church's evangelistic work among Negroes. When necessary to establish them they should be supported out of parochial and diocesan funds supplemented by appropriations from the Department of Missions of the Presiding Bishop and Council, but should not seek their support through appeals to the Church at large for special contributions. The appeal for special contributions should, we believe, be limited to those schools whose influence is of greater national significance. The aim of the American Church Institute for Negroes is to encourage Church schools of the latter class.

In order that the Episcopal Church may play its full part in rearing intelligent Christian leaders and teachers to guide and shepherd our Negro people, I urge loyal support and co-operation with the American Church Institute for Negroes. The splendid work it has already accomplished is its own commendation.

Democracy is a building not made with hands. The tears, the hopes, the aspiration, and the love of humanity have created it. Its super-structure is woven together with the elements of good will and justice. The destiny and happiness of the whole human race are in it. Its foundation rests upon the character of the man at the bottom. The Negro is at the bottom of our American democracy. The super-structure cannot endure unless we help him train his children to bear their part in God's place for the whole.

Religion and Education

We are, I believe, rapidly placing our education upon a dangerous basis, because truth is not commercialized knowledge. The love of knowledge for its own sake was the glory of Ancient Greece. When this thought inspired her life she flourished with a beauty and glory which has influenced the thought and art of men for all time. When, however, Athens lost the love of knowledge for its own sake and looked upon knowledge as a means of increasing her material power, she fell. The true glory of Germany was the love of knowledge for its own sake. When Germany lost this idea and used her knowledge merely as a means for increasing her material wealth and power, she fell.

The ideals upon which our American democracy are based are dependent upon the love of knowledge for its own sake—the eager search for truth. Every nation travels the same road. If we commercialize our knowledge, if we look upon it simply as a means of increasing our earning power, we are traveling in the wrong direction and disaster is at the end of the road.

There is nothing more important, then, than that our leadership should be inspired by the right spirit, and the only basis for the highest type of leadership is the spirit of service. There are two philosophies of success, two theories for happiness for individuals and for nations, and each is opposed to the other. The one teaches that success is measured by the powman, the happy man, is the King, whose will, through force of material power, is able to control and rule the minds and lives of his subjects. By the same theory the type of the successful and happy nation is the "world power" that, through the use of material force, can impose its civilization upon a weaker nation. There is no greater instance of the power of education than the fact that in one generation the German people, from primary school to university, were solidly and thoroughly imbued with this philosophy of success; that leadership, individual and national, is to be found in the exercise of the power to rule.

The astounding might, however, of a united and triumphant America, displayed during the war, was not based upon this idea of leadership. It was inspired by the idea of service. In our industrial and commercial life there was but one thought, not how each could profit most, but how each could best serve the interests of all; so a great historic demonstration was made that the only true basis for a healthy and sound democracy in the spirit of service. Every one knows that since the war we have drifted away from the ideal. A wave of materialism and extravagance has swept over our social and industrial life, induced by a craze for high profits and high wages, while a craving for excitement and a wild search for pleasure has permeated every part of our social atmosphere. Now, as profits shrink and wages are threatened, we find that underneath the social surface of America is a threatening under-current of social discontent, class hatred if not sedition. The only thing that will save our national life is leadership, based, not upon the desire for increased earning power, but upon the earnest search for truth and the spirit of service.

Is there anything more important, then, than the kind of education the future leaders of America are receiving? The dangers that threaten this country do not come from the ignorant; they come from the educated, whose education rests upon a false basis. The real danger for Europe is not the Bolshevik with a bomb whose intelligence rating is D, but the Chief Commissary of the people, whose intelligence rating is A. The greatest danger to America today is false leadership and her greatest need is the leadership that is inspired by the two things that have made the greatness of America, the unselfish desire for truth and the spirit of service.

There is nothing more obvious than that these two principles are wrapped up with what is called religion. They have never flourished outside of a religious atmosphere and they never can. The spirit of devotion to truth is inseparable from the idea that truth is Divine and the love of service is only truly realized through the conviction of the brotherhood of man and the Fatherhood of God. Service as the type of leadership is the distinctive note of the life and teaching of Christ. "The kings of the Gentiles," He said, "dominate over you, but he that would be greatest among you, let him be your servant."

If the real basis of education is the search for truth and the spirit of service it is, then, inseparable from religion, and particularly is this true in higher education, because our higher education produces the leaders of the future. Without any hesitation I should say that the most dangerous situation in our civilization today is the divorce of religion from education.—Rev. Murray Bartlett, President Hobart College.

"CONVENIENT" IN THE BIBLE.

J. L. Hall.

The word "convenient," so common in every-day English, had a different shade of meaning in King James' day. In Proverbs 30:8 Agur prays: "Give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me." Here the word means proper, suitable." In Ephesians 5:4 we are told to avoid certain sins, "which are not convenient," i. e., not befitting, as the Revised Version renders it. On the other hand, in St. Mark 6:21 we read, "And when a convenient day was come that Herod on his birthday made a supper to his lords, etc.," we have the word used in its more modern meaning, and it is retained in the Revised Version of 1881.

THY WORD.

E. R. R.

Oh Thou, Who once a child upon earth
Didst open baby eyes that longed to see
No heaven fairer than the face o'er Thee,
Whose seraph-feted ears heard from Thy birth
No lyric sweetness like Thy mother's song!
O Thou, Whose upward-climbing potent soul
Would fain have drawn all men unto Thy goal
And countless millions drew of weak and strong!
Oh sanctify Thy word! That it may be
The heaven-leading ladder of Thy love,
Untrammeled by our petty cant and lore,
But sure forever and forever free,
Our refuge from the world to heaven above,
Thy Word our Way to Thee forevermore.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

THE JEWISH SABBATH AND THE LORD'S DAY.

Mr. Editor: The Sabbath day and the Lord's day are entirely distinct institutions, the former belonging to the Jewish Church and the latter to the Christian Church. When the Christian Church was established by the apostles, the first day of the week, called the Lord's day, became the great day of the week; chosen by them because on that day the Lord triumphed over sin and death. The Lord's day is apostolic and divine. It is not a purely ecclesiastical institution, as held by some. The Church did not make it a festival after the departing of the apostles, as the other festivals were made. So the Church has not the power to abrogate it or change its purpose.

How should it be observed? In the first place, as the great day of worship, as it has been observed in the best days of Christianity. Of course, it is proper that we should worship God on the other days of the week as opportunity presents itself. But on the Lord's day we should give more time to worship than on any other day. Not that we should spend all the day, or even most of the day, in the attitude of worship. Our compound nature is such that we could not do this and attain the best results. We have bodies that become weary, and then the mind cannot do its best work, the spirit cannot wing its highest flight. Therefore, it is a day of rest as well as a day of worship. Men absolutely need this certain amount of rest on the Lord's day, especially the majority, who labor hard six days for a livelihood. Let them neglect thus to refresh themselves for their work, and that work will not be satisfactorily done, and the worship they render God will be of a very poor quality. Not that the Lord's day, as a day of rest, should be observed with that strictness with which the Sabbath day was observed by the Jews. The scribes and Pharisees, we know, had abused this day, making requirements of the people which God did not demand. Our Lord reprimanded them for their additions, declaring that the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath, and setting them an example of performing on this day works of mercy and necessity. The Lord's day cannot be observed even with that strictness with which the Sabbath day was originally intended by God to be observed. The Jewish Church was established for a particular people. The Christian Church was established for every tribe and nation throughout the world, and for all time, even down to the great consummation. The day of rest suitable for the one would not be suitable for the other. For the Christian Church a day of rest was needed that was somewhat elastic in its nature. It cannot be observed by every nation and in every place with exactly the same rules, if it would be the means of securing the highest blessings. Nor can its observance be exactly alike in every period of the history of the world. It would be very unwise to endeavor to make the people of this twentieth century keep it with the same strictness it was kept three hundred years ago.

Extreme views regarding the Lord's day as a day of rest have been held. The Puritans have gone to one extreme. They called the Lord's day the Sabbath day, and required it to be observed as the Sabbath day was observed in the Jewish Church. With all their excellencies they erred in this. But there is another view that deserves a severer condemnation than that of the Puritans. It is that the Lord's day is no more binding on us than any other Church festival. The consequence of this teaching has been the secularization of this day. It has become as a result a day of worldliness and amusements, leading often to sin and immorality. In the days of the apostles and for five centuries following it was observed by Christians in a more excellent way than either of these. It was to those Christians, as it should be to us, the great day of glad and joyous worship, and because of this it was to them also the great day of rest in the best sense of that word, not as an end in itself, but as a means to a noble and an unspeakably important end, the worshipping of God with the best activities of that compound nature which they received from the hand of their Creator.

(Rev.) WM. L. BRADDOCK.

20 East Madison Street, Baltimore.

THE WOE OF CHINA.

Mr. Editor: The following clipping is from "China's Millions," published by the China Inland Mission, which has done such a wonderful work for Christ in the interior of that land.

"An earthquake of unusual severity occurred December 16 in the provinces of Shansi, Shensi, Kansu and Szechwan, resulting in great loss of life over that immense district. Mission property has suffered considerably, but we are glad to report that so far as we know all the lives of our missionaries have been preserved.

"It is already three months since the fact of famine stared the people in the face, since its pinch began to be felt. Many a barrel of meal has reached its last "handful," and yet many are without the wherewithal to replenish. The days are becoming colder—yet where shall the fuel and the wadded garments come from to make a North China winter bearable?"

The famine, resulting from failure of crops for several years, now aggravated and intensified by the earthquake, has saddened our hearts. These are now more than ever "the poor" of our world. The blessed Saviour said, "Sell that which thou hast and give to the poor." Surely this is a time when such advice should be heeded. Not only income, but capital should be given to these poor, and so lent to the Lord.

JOHN McGILL.

Cumberland, Md., March 26, 1921.

The Great Commission.

TO SELL VALUABLE WATCH FOR CHINA RELIEF FUND.

The widow of a commodore of the United States Navy desires to offer for sale a valuable watch, the gift to her husband from the Compania Maritima of the Philippine islands during the time of the Spanish-American War. The proceeds of the sale are to be given to the China Famine Relief Fund.

Commodore B. (then lieutenant in the United States Navy) was captain of the Port of Manila at the time of the battle with the Spanish fleet in Manila Bay. It was due to his executive ability and orderly treatment of affairs of the port that the regular inter-island boats were soon released for traffic. The large steamship company above mentioned felt the value of his services to such an extent that they presented him with this beautiful timepiece. The style of the watch is somewhat different from that usual today, and its value would be more in its intrinsic worth and also in the circumstances surrounding its bestowal on an officer of the United States Navy. There is a watch fob with a diamond of about half a carat, which would be included with the watch It has been estimated by leading jewelers that the watch is worth from five to six hundred dollars, but it would be sold for three hundred. It should have associations of value for persons whose lives have been connected with the Philippine Islands, perhaps especially with the United States Army and Navy during that early period of American occupation.

Correspondence should be directed to the undersigned, to whom the matter has been entrusted because he is a member of the Co-operating Committee of the China Famine Relief. The full proceeds will be used for missionary and relief work.

The Rev. A. B. Parson,

Assistant Foreign Secretary.

281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

Southern Committee for China Famine Fund.

Episcopalians throughout the South, as well as members of all other denominations, have been asked to aid in this humanitarian project. It is a matter that is engaging the attention of Christians throughout the United States, and in all sections of the country committees are being organized to secure financial co-operation for the work of relief.

The Southern Committee for the China Famine Fund has been organized, with headquarters at 502 Candler Building, Atlanta, and local committees are being formed throughout the Southern States. Contributions may be made to the local committees, forwarded to the Southern Committee in Atlanta, or sent direct to Vernon Monroe, Bible House, New York City, treasurer of the American Committee for the China Famine Fund.

Church Intelligence

Building Fund News Notes.

At the March meeting of the American Church Fund Commission the Rt. Rev. Wilson R. Stearly, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor of Newark, was unanimously elected president of the Board of Trustees to succeed the late Bishop Burch in that office.

At this meeting loans amounting to $51,000 and gifts to $3,900 were reported as having been approved since January 20, 1921.

The increase of the Permanent Fund was the chief interest considered by the trustees, and plans were outlined for bringing to the attention of Church people the necessity of contributions, whether through legacies or direct gifts, to its general funds, if the Commission is to keep pace with the large demands that are being made upon it for assistance.

As evidencing the appreciation of those who have been helped with gifts for buildings, two offerings received since January 1 are noteworthy. A station in Alaska sent an offering of twenty-five dollars, having done the same thing last year. Only ten parishes in the entire Church made a larger offering in 1920 for this purpose. It is as easy to estimate the sacrifice involved in such an offering as the grateful appreciation shown. Another offering came from a Seminary chapel in Japan, its Founders' Day offering, and the custom has been fixed as an integral part of their program for that day. Such gifts as these offer encouragement to the Commission that when its needs are more widely known regions nearer than Alaska and Japan will respond as generously.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Parting Gift to a Missionary.

The following note was handed to the late rector, with a purse of gold, on the eve of his departure for China:

To the Rev. Robert A. Goodwin:

Please accept this little golden gift from members of your congregation, who wish to symbolize the affection and appreciation they feel for you. In leaving us you may carry with you the consciousness that your Christian influence has been felt and that you have been the minister of the Master, through Whom the spiritual life of your congregation has been enriched. May God keep, protect and prosper you as you go forth in His service.

Work of the Richmond Branch, Leper Mission.

On March 11 Geeorge Hodges, together with ten lepers from Penikese Island, off the Massachusetts coast, and one from Norfolk, was taken to Carville, La., where the United States Leprosarium is being built on model plans, and all the lepers will be cared for. He wept on leaving Richmond and his kind friends there, but he will no longer lead such a lonely life. Dr. O. E. Denny, who had charge of 5,500 lepers in the Philippines, is an expert in treatment of the disease, and has been there since last fall. The Richmond Branch has done all it could for George Hodges during the five years of his stay. It was agreed at the last meeting of the branch to send him a little money from time to time to let him know he is not forgotten. Five dollars has been forwarded for this purpose, and $11.50 was given by two little boys in the First Presbyterian church, who wished to save their pennies to help him. The Richmond Branch has given $1,729.88 in the past year, and $1,400 was collected from the "Pete Banks," under Mrs. Harrison, in the last eighteen months.

Evelyn P. Meriwether,
Pres. and Treas. Richmond Branch, Leper Mission.
2346 W. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

A Community Service.

On the afternoon of Good Friday a community service was held in St. Stephen's Church, Culpeper, for the seventh year.

After a brief service of worship, addresses were given on members of the group around the Cross at the Crucifixion:

"The People Beholding," by the Rev. Mr. Finch, Methodist.

"The Mother Mourning," by the Rev. Dr. Lee, Episcopal.

"The Rulers Reviling," by the Rev. Mr. Hooper, Presbyterian.

"Unanswered and Answered Prayers," by the Rev. Mr. Burton, Methodist.

"The Centurion Confessing," by the Rev. Dr. Winfrey, Baptist.

"The Lord Lifted Up," address by the rector, the Rev. Dr. Hammond.

The service has become an annual expression in Culpeper of Christian unity, through the co-operation in it of the worshippers of various names.

New Rectory for Church of the Epiphany: Due to the large increase in enrollment and attendance of the Sunday school of the Church of the Epiphany, Barton Heights, Richmond, the Rev. J. H. Gibboney, rector, the vestry has decided to use the present rectory for Sunday school and other parochial purposes, and to build or buy a new rectory immediately. Epiphany Church is planning a new church and parish house in a new location in Barton Heights. Neither the present church building nor the parish hall are adequate to the present needs of the church.

Charlottesville: Under the leadership of the rector, the Rev. W. R. Mason, Chirst Church has made great advances, particularly in the Lenten offerings. In 1918 the congregation was content with raising $38. The following year it was suggested they make $125 their goal, but they did better than that by $42. Last year $492 was pledged toward the Nation-Wide Campaign, to be raised during Lent and Advent. During Lent $267 was raised, but they fell short of the $492 by $50. This Lent, by the close of Easter Day, $316 had been realized. Before 1918 the average Sunday collection was $3; this last year it has been about $5.

The church was beautifully decorated for Easter Day, and was packed to the door with an appreciative congregation. A good musical program was rendered by the choir, and a splendid sermon was preached by the rector.

The service of dedication for Emmanuel Parish Hall, Boyce, Clarke County, will be conducted by the Bishop of the Diocese on Wednesday, April 15, at 3 P. M. The ceremonies incident to the formal opening of the parish hall will last until Friday. The clergy of the Diocese are specially invited to the service of dedication, and are requested to bring their vestments. Please notify Mr. M. T. Dunlap, Boyce, who will arrange to entertain all who can come.

The Valley Convocation will meet in Harrisonburg, Va., April 19, 20 and 21. The last day of the Convocation will be given over to the Woman's Auxiliary of the Valley Branch.

SOUTHERN OHIO.

Rt. Rev. Boyd Vincent, D. D., Bishop.

Many Attend Lenten and Easter Services.

The Lenten noon-day services in Cincinnati at the Lyric Theatre, under the auspices of the churches in Cincinnati and vicinity, showed a total attendance of 16,326, an average of four hundred and ninety-four, for the thirty-three services held. The smallest attendance was two hundred and seventy-eight on a rainy and inclement day. The largest, 1,250. The total for the year 1920 was 14,632, so this year's figures show a decided improvement.

Easter Day in the Cincinnati churches was noted for perfect weather in the morning, with the result that the services were very well attended, and the offerings larger than for some years past.

In the afternoon a storm descended on the city, with a wind which unroofed fifteen houses, but did no serious damage to any church property. This was accompanied by torrential rains, which kept up all evening, materially reducing attendance at evening services.

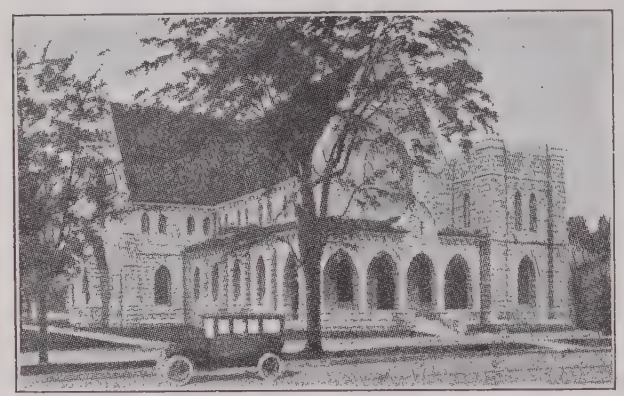
The Cincinnati City Mission held Easter services at the jail, the Home for the Friendless, the Girls' Opportunity Farm, Clovernook Home for the Blind, the General Hospital, the Cincinnati Tuberculosis Hospital, the Rockhill Sanatorium for Tuberculosis, where many ex-soldiers are taking the cure, the Widows' and Old Men's Home, the Home for Incurables, and the City and County Infirmaries.

Successful Mission in Marietta.

Archdeacon Reade held a mission in St. Luke's Church, Marietta, the Rev. Maurice Clarke, rector, during Passion Week. Perhaps it was a coincidence and not a breach of Christian comity, that during the same period three other churches had a week of special services. In spite of all counter attractions, the total attendance for nine services was an even thousand, and forty persons signed resolution cards. The choir which provided the music never numbered less than fourteen voices, and the rector had made careful and intensive preparation for the mission.

Service for Masons.

On a recent Sunday evening at St. Paul's Cathedral, Archdeacon Dodshon preached on the "Three Degrees" of the Christian Religion—Baptism, Confirmation and Holy Communion—to an audience of Masons, who filled the edifice and seemed intensely interested in a presentation of Church teachings illustrated by the ritual of their own order.



C. J. R.

NORTH CAROLINA

Rt. Rev. Jos. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop.

Consecration of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Raleigh.

The Church of the Good Shepherd, situated at one of the most desirable locations in the city of Raleigh, was consecrated by Bishop Cheshire on Easter morning. Those assisting in the service were the Rev. I. McK. Pittenger, D. D., rector-emeritus of the parish; the Rev. C. A. Ashby, B. L., the rector; the Rev. Messrs. Julian E. Ingle and N. C. Duncan, of Raleigh, and the Rev. E. A. Osborne, of Charlotte. The sermon was preached by Dr. Pittinger. The church, which was beautifully decorated, was taxed to its capacity by the crowd which attended, chairs having to be brought in to accommodate the gathering.

Church of the Good Shepherd, Raleigh.

The edifice is one of the handsomest churches in the State. The design is gothic, built in the form of a cross with clere, made of granite and finished in marble, having a seating capacity of about six hundred. The church has many costly memorials. The altar, put in as a memorial to her husband by Mrs. Harriet McGee Reed, is of Italian marble, and the sanctuary is also paved with this marble. The building was built during the rectorship of Dr. Pittenger, who personally supervised its erection from plans furnished by Robert W. Gibson, of New York, the well-known church architect. The corner-stone of the present building, which was laid on Sunday, October 29, 1899, was brought by Dr. Pittenger from Jerusalem, and is a lovely piece of marble, of every conceivable tint. Dr. Pittenger also brought back with him a part of a large olive tree that grew within half a mile of the Old Sepulchre, and which was made into the Litany desk. The church was first used on Sunday, May 17, 1914. There are four hundred and twenty-seven communicants of the parish; its property is valued at more than $140,000, and its revenues last year ran over $21,000. The Easter gift, made to wipe out the total indebtedness of the parish, will run over $12,500, one of the largest Easter collections ever made by a Raleigh church. Thanks for this large showing is due to the generosity of the present congregation, who made the consecration of the church an ambition for this Easter.

The Church of the Good Shepherd was initiated in December, 1873, when several members of Christ Church withdrew to establish a free church in Raleigh. The congregation was organized February 26, 1874. Services were held in Tucker Hall until Easter Day, March 28, 1875, when it moved into the wooden building erected for it upon the present site of the new church. This building was afterwards moved back upon the property, remodeled and is used as a parish house. Its rectors have been the Rev. Edward R. Rich, D. D., February, 1874, to July, 1885; the Rt. Rev. Robert Strange, D. D., afterwards Bishop of East Carolina, November, 1885, to December, 1887; the Rev. William Meade Clark, D. D., December, 1887, to November, 1890; the Rev. I. McK. Pittenger, D. D., December, 1890, to September, 1916. The present rector came March 1, 1917.

St. Paul's, Winston-Salem: The music provided Easter at St. Paul's Church, Winston-Salem, was unsurpassed in that city, and strongly evidenced the faithful efforts of the choir and the conscientious endeavor of the rector, the Rev. Phillips S. Gilman, himself an accomplished musician, who for the past year has acted as choirmaster. Through his direction the music at St. Paul's has been conspicuously augmented and improved.

The seating capacity of the church was well taxed, with the largest congregation in many years, and the communions for the day were proportionately increased.

Interior, Church of the Good Shepherd.

The Easter services came as a fitting climax to the carefully arranged program of Lenten and Holy Week services. On Ash Wednesday and the two nights preceding Bishop Cheshire delivered four scholarly and instructive lectures on "The Creeds of Christendom," and also confirmed a large class. On the five Wednesday nights following, the rector presented a most interesting interpretive reading and discussion of the Book of Job.

On Friday afternoons he gave a series of plain, practical talks on "Prayer Book Ritual." On Good Friday night a "community" service, special music and a short sermon by the rector on "The Man of God" was held, in addition to the other services of the day.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishop of Ochrida Visits Washington.

The Rt. Rev. Nikolai Velimirovitch, Bishop of Ochrida, Macedonia, was a visitor in the Diocese during Easter week, and addressed a large audience at the Mason House, which was formerly used as Red Cross headquarters. On Sunday, April 3, he was the preacher at the 11 o'clock service at the Washington Cathedral, and at Epiphany Church at the 8 o'clock service. Other visitors in the Diocese on the Sunday after Easter were the Rt. Rev. Henry St. George Tucker, Bishop of Kyoto, Japan, who preached in St. Mark's Church at the morning service, and the Rev. Guy H. Madara, an Episcopal missionary from Alaska, who was the preacher at the 11 o'clock service at the Church of the Ascension, and at St. Agnes' Church in the evening.

Meeting of Woman's Auxiliary.

The regular monthly meeting of the Diocesan Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary was held on Tuesday afternoon, April 5, at Christ Church, Georgetown. After the regular business session and an inspiring and helpful address by the special speaker of the occasion, the Rev. G. H. Madara, of Alaska, the meeting adjourned to the rectory, where a pleasant social hour was enjoyed.

The Rt. Rev. Alfred Harding and his daughter, Miss Charlotte Harding, were visitors during Easter week in Providence, R. I., where they were the guests of the Rt. Rev. James DeWolf Perry, Bishop of Rhode Island.

Through the will of Miss Victorine Koones, which has been filed for probate, the Episcopal Home for Children and Ascension Church are named as beneficiaries to receive $500 each. Miss Koones was a member of Ascension Parish, and for many years an officer of the Board of Lady Managers of the Episcopal Home for Children.

For the Cathedral: A strong plea for the completion of the Washington Cathedral was made by Mrs. Henry P. Loomis, of New York, in an address before a large gathering of Episcopalians at the home of Mrs. John Hays Hammond on Friday afternoon, April 1. The address was made under the auspices of the Washington Cathedral Committee. The meeting was opened who explained how the building could be completed in five years if funds were available.

The Rev. Dr. James E. Freeman, rector of Epiphany Parish, will address the combined State Conventions of the Y. M. C. A. at Cumberland, Md., on April 15, and the Baltimore Clericus on April 11. Dr. Freeman has been greatly in demand ever since his arrival here, not only within Church circles, but by various civic bodies in Washington, and churches and organizations outside the city.

M. M. W.

Services at Keith's Theatre.

A few days prior to Holy Week, 1920, Mr. Roland Rollins, manager of B. F. Keith's Theatre, in this city, offered the use of this theatre for Holy Week services to the Laymen's Service Association of the Diocese. This offer was promptly accepted, and with a few days' preparation three splendid services were held. Some time prior to the Lenten season of this year the same generous offer was made to use the theatre during the entire season. The offer was promptly accepted by the L. S. A., who, in order to extend its usefulness and to encourage the idea of Church unity, invited the newly organized "Washington Federation of Churches" to co-operate. Twenty-seven services were held (daily, except Saturdays, Sundays and holidays). There was an average attendance daily of seven hundred and thirty, a large proportion being men. The services began promptly at 12:30 P. M., with the singing of a hymn, followed by a prayer by a different clergyman each day. This was followed by another hymn, and then the speaker of the day. The service was closed promptly at 1 P. M. by a hymn and the benediction. No offering was solicited at these meetings, the expenses being borne entirely by the Laymen's Association. The interest demonstrated in these splendid meetings was most noteworthy.

The messages delivered by busy laymen, in all walks of life and of all creeds, were most inspiring.

It was deemed most appropriate that the speakers during Holy Week should be clergymen.

The most cordial support was given to the splendid mid-day services held at Epiphany Church, only a block away, and also to St. John's unity services.

As laymen of the Diocese of Washington, we feel that our effort, individually and as an organization, has proven that we are ready and anxious to serve. Our Easter was so much happier this year than ever before.

L. W. G.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robt. C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

The Virginia Episcopal School; Recruiting for the Ministry.

The hope of the founders of the Virginia Episcopal School at Lynchburg, that it should make a liberal contribution to the Christian character of our young manhood, and also become in a measure a recruiting ground for the sacred ministry is apparently being realized.

While no undue influence has been brought to bear upon the boys, a recent suggestion that every boy who might be willing to confer with Bishop Jett on the subject of the ministry brought to Dr. Pendleton the names of twenty-six boys.

The Bishop has invited the whole group to spend the day with him in Roanoke for a conference. A number of local boys will join this group. It will be a fine tribute to the atmosphere of the school if a number of these boys should definitely decide to give themselves to the ministry. Five of the first year boys have already offered themselves.

Change in Date of Council.

Owing to a combination of serious conflicts, the Bishop has decided to change the time for the meeting of the Council from May 31 to May 18-20. The meeting will be held in Wytheville. Among the speakers will be the Rev. William H. Milton, D. D., and the Rev. W. Cosby Bell, D. D.

The Rev. Francis H. Craighill, now engaged in missionary work in the counties surrounding Wytheville, has been called to Rocky Mount, N. C. His work in the Diocese has been of a high order, and his loss, should he go, would be severely felt.

Trinity and Emmanuel Churches, Staunton, are making excellent progress. At the Bishop's recent visitation twenty-seven were confirmed at Trinity and twenty-one at Emmanuel.

The church at Bristol, a handsome stone structure, will be completed in the near future. The Rev. Mr. Hale, the minister in charge, is supported by an enthusiastic people. At the Easter service Bishop Jett preached and celebrated the Holy Communion. He will return to the parish for confirmation at the opening of the new church in May.

The Sunday schools of St. Paul's, Lynchburg, and Christ Church, Roanoke, had a friendly contest in collecting their Easter offering for the Home at Covington. St. Paul's was the successful competitor, its offering amounting to $1,367, and that of Christ Church $1,138.

A special offering was asked by the rector of St. John's Church, Roanoke, toward the price of a new parish house property. The offering amounted to over $9,500.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Consecration of the Chapel of the Mediator.

The beautiful new Chapel of the Mediator, at Fifty-first and Spruce Streets, Philadelphia, was consecrated on Wednesday, March 30. The occasion was a memorable one, not only because of the large number of leading Churchmen who attended, but because the chapel is a memorial to the late George C. Thomas, who was for many years the most conspicuous and generous benefactor of the Episcopal Church in this section.

Nearly one hundred clergymen, among them leading bishops and rectors from various parts of the country, who were personal friends and associates of the dead benefactor, were present. The procession was led by Bishop Garland, who was followed by Bishop Nathaniel S. Thomas, of Wyoming; Bishop Robert Carter Jett, of the Diocese of Southwest Virginia; the Rev. George H. Toop, rector of the Church of the Holy Apostles, Philadelphia; the Rev. Phillips E. Osgood, vicar of the new church; the Rev. Samuel H. Wood, vicar of the Chapel of the Holy Communion; the Rev. John A. Logan, vicar of the Chapel of St. Simon the Cyrene, and the Rev. Charles P. Bispham, assistant rector of the Church of the Holy Apostles.

The sermon was preached by Bishop Thomas, who spoke beautifully of Mr. Thomas, the founder of the Holy Apostles' Parish, and gave briefly the history that led up to the building of this chapel

Sunday morning the Rev. P. E. Osgood preached a consecration sermon.

The entire parish of the Holy Apostles participated in the evening service. There was a massed chorus of 160 voices from the choirs of the Mother Church, Chapel of St. Simon the Cyrenian, Chapel of the Holy Communion and the Chapel of the Mediator. The Rev. Dr. George Herbert Toop, rector of the parish, preached.

Bishop Thomas F. Gailor, President of the Executive Council of the Church, will be the principal speaker at the men's dinner Thursday evening, April 7. Alexander Black, novelist; Judge Wells and the Rev. Dr. James E. Freeman, of Washington, D. C., will also speak.

The women of the parish will give a luncheon on Friday afternoon.

The Chapel of the Mediator is one of three churches conducted by the Church of the Holy Apostles. The other two are the Memorial Chapel of the Holy Communion, which is a memorial to a son of Mr. Thomas, and St. Simon the Cyrenean. The new building is the work of Walter H. Thomas, a Philadelphia architect, and a nephew of Mr. Thomas. It conforms as nearly as possible to the late perpendicular gothic style, and is a magnificent building.

Consecration of St. Martin's, Oak Lane.

St. Martin's Church, Oak Lane, was consecrated by Bishop Rhinelander Sunday morning, April 3. A bronze tablet in memory of the Rev. Walter Jordan, rector of the parish for twenty-nine years, was unveiled by Thomas M. Bains, who has been warden of the church for many years.

The Rev. Dr. Llewellyn N. Caley was instituted by Bishop Rhinelander, who also dedicated four silver alms basins, given at Easter by members of the parish

Plans are being prepared to enlarge the church and to make addition to the parish house.

Dr. Grammer Leaves for France.

The Rev. Dr. Carl E. Grammer, rector of St. Stephen's Church, bade his parishioners good-bye Sunday, March 20, before leaving for a six months' vacation in Southern France to recuperate from a physical breakdown, as a result of overwork.

The congregation presented him with $1,737, a traveling bag, steamer rug, a trunkful of various things and a satchel filled with books.

Dr. Grammer sailed on the Patria from New York March 28. Mrs. Grammer and her two daughters are awaiting him at Marseilles.

The Rev. Frederick B. Keable, associate rector of St. Stephen's, will conduct the services in Dr. Grammer's absence.

The annual service of the Cathedral League of the Diocese was held Monday, April 4, at the Pro-Cathedral. The Cathedral League is an organization of women, each of whom contributes a small sum annually toward the erection of an Episcopal cathedral in this Diocese. The Rev. George William Dougies, of Washington, D. C., preached.

R. R. W.

LOUISIANA

Rt. Rev. Davis Sessums, D. D., Bishop.

"Christian Unity" Service.

A "Christian unity" service was held in St. Matthew's Church, Houma, on Friday night, March 18. Addresses were made by the Rev. F. J. McCoy, Methodist, and the Rev. J. N. Blackburn, Presbyterian. The speakers took for their theme "The Church and the World Task," dwelling respectively on the challenge of the home field and of the foreign field, and urged closer co-operation among Christian people.

Some time previously the choir of St. Matthew's Church took part, wearing their vestments, in a series of evangelistic services held in the Houma Presbyterian Church. At the Friday night Lenten services in St. Matthew's, the Rev. F. J. McCoy, Methodist, sang regularly in St. Matthew's choir, wearing the regular choir vestments.

St. Mark's, Shreveport, Reopened.

On Easter Sunday the congregation of St. Mark's Church, Shreveport, the Rev. J. M. Owens, rector, worshipped again, for the first time in fifteen months, in their restored church, the original one being so damaged by fire December 11, 1919, as to make the rebuilding of all but the tower and outer walls necessary.

For some time services have been held in the basement of the restored building, which in the future will be used by the Sunday school only, all church services being held in the church proper, which, if anything, has a more deeply religious and ecclesiastical atmosphere than old St. Mark's had, and the original building had frequently been declared to be the truest example of ecclesiastical architecture in the South.

While some of the handsome memorials were destroyed, many have been restored, and to these have been added several beautiful memorials and gifts, and among the memorials yet to be given will be windows to replace those damaged from the fire.

The history of St. Mark's dates from 1839, when Bishop Polk, then Missionary Bishop to the Indians and the few white settlers populating this territory, and later the first Episcopal Bishop of Louisiana, visited the trading post of Shreveport and preached to a motley congregation of Indians, traders, trappers and settlers.

The parish of St. Mark's was organized in 1851 and the first church was built by Rev. Mr. Russell, rector of the parish in 1861.

EAST CAROLINA

Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop.

Holy Week Services Largely Attended.

Holy Week services in the Diocese of East Carolina were never better attended than this year, according to reports received. The Maunday Thursday Communion, the Three-Hour Service on Good Friday, and all of the Easter services were attended by people who seemed to think them of more than usual significance. At Grace Church, Plymouth, the rector was assisted in the Good Friday service by the ministers of the Baptist, Methodist and Christian Churches. They made addresses from the Seven Last Words.

Mission at Windsor.

A mission of unusual helpfulness was held in St. Thomas', Windsor, during Lent, conducted by the Rev. L. B. Franck, of Richmond, Va. The rector of the church, the Rev. Robert Lee Lewis, writes: "A great revival has swept the town of Windsor and the entire community. The results of Mr. Frank's mission have been wonderful. During the mission one of our young ladies, a highly educated and refined woman, offered to give all of her time to the Church in the cause of Christian education. At the conclusion of the mission the people pledged themselves to pay every cent of their Nation-Wide Campaign obligation. The general depression caused by financial conditions has given way to spiritual enthusiasm. Nothing like the co-operation given this mission by the people of the other churches has ever been seen in Windsor. The congregations became so large that toward the last the services were held in the Baptist Church, which has a large seating capacity.

New Chapel and Parish House Opened.

A beautiful new chapel and parish house, recently completed and opened for the first time on Palm Sunday, has taken the place of the old St. Philip's Chapel, Campbellton, a suburb of Fayetteville. This new plant, which was made possible by the generosity of the congregation of St. John's, Fayetteville, and by an appropriation from the Diocese, will give fine and adequate service to a mill community. The parish house is nicely fitted up for social service. This plant is under the direction of the Rev. Archer Boogher, rector of St. John's.

Bishop Darst Presented With Handsome Watch.

East Carolinians appreciate the fine courtesy shown Bishop Darst by the Church people of Lynchburg, Va., during the recent mission conducted by him. At the conclusion of the mission the Bishop was presented with a very handsome "Hamilton" watch, as a token of appreciation. The presentation speech was made by Hon. Fred Harper, Mayor of Lynchburg.

East Carolina Clergymen Popular With Rotarians: The Rev. R. E. Gribbin, rector of St. John's, Wilmington; Rev. Stephen Gardner, rector of St. Peter's, Washington; Rev. Frank D. Dean, city missionary of Wilmington, and others are members of the Rotary Club. Special services for Rotarians have recently been held by Mr. Gribbin in Wilmington and Mr. Gardner in Washington.

News that the Rev. F. J. H. Coffin, rector of St. Mary's, Kinston, has declined the call extended him by the vestry of a Rocky Mount church, has been received in this Diocese with great pleasure. Mr. Coffin is one of the diocesan leaders.

T. P., Jr.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Easter Day in Savannah was one of perfect sunshine and spring loveliness. All of the churches had beautiful services and large communions at both the early celebrations and at the midday services. At Christ Church, the Rev. John D. Wing, D. D., rector, in addition to the regular offering, a check for $1,500 was placed in the alms basin, the gift of the Parish Aid Society, representing the first fruits in money of the Colonial lunch room, which has been in operation six months. The Easter offering at St. John's Church, the Rev. William T. Dakin, rector, amounted to $1,000. Both of these parishes had interesting children's festivals. Christ Church school had a simple pageant, the Easter salutation of the early Christians being used throughout the service. The offering amounted to $313. St. John's Church school's festival took the form of an Easter play which was given at night before a crowded congregation.

Mr. Robert Tatum, who is a student of the theological department of the University of the South, visited St. Paul's Parish, Augusta, on Palm Sunday, and at the evening service he gave an account of the work in Alaska. Mr. Tatum, who is known as "Georgia's Scholarship Man," spent three years as a lay missionary in Alaska, and was one of the party headed by the late Archdeacon Stuck when he made the famous ascent of Mt. Denali. After completing his studies at Sewanee, Mr. Tatum will go back to Alaska as an ordained priest of the Church. Mr. Tatum spoke the next afternoon before the two sections of the Woman's Auxiliary at their annual United Thank Offering meeting. $134 was the combined collection.

St. Michael and All Angels' Church, Savannah, the Rev. J. D. Miller, rector, has recently organized a Young People's Society known as the "Service and Social Club." The Bishop met with the members on March 9, and his talk has given impetus to the club.

E. D. J.

EASTON

Rt. Rev. G. W. Davenport, D.D., Bishop.

Memorial Banner Presented.

The Rev. Sidney H. Dixon held his first Easter service as rector of Trinity Parish, Elkton, on Sunday, preaching a fine sermon to a congregation that filled the church. A handsome memorial banner was put in position and consecrated at the morning service. It was presented by the Woman's Auxiliary of Trinity Parish, in memory of Miss Ellen Barroll, who was president of the Auxiliary at the time of her death. Miss Barroll was a devoted Churchwoman, and for more than fifty years had entire charge of the altar; was organist for years; a conscientious teacher in the Sunday school and correspondent of the Church Periodical Club.

She was a great-granddaughter of the Rev. William Barroll, who was consecrated by the Bishop of London for Maryland. Shortly after coming to America he was made rector of St. Stephen's Parish, Earleville, Cecil County, Md.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay, D. D., Coadjutor.

Funds Needed for Work Among Negroes.

The Rev. E. L. Baskervill, Archdeacon for the Work Among the Negroes for the Diocese of South Carolina, will visit New York City and vicinity from April 13 to 28, to solicit funds to enable him to close the educational and missionary work among the negroes of the Diocese of South Carolina for the year without a large deficit. The work is in dire need of funds, and while the negroes are doing their best to help, the Archdeacon feels that without the aid of friends he will be unable to carry on this great work, which means so much, not only to the Diocese, but to the whole South. While in New York, Archdeacon Baskervill may be addressed at the Church Missions House, 281 Fourth Avenue, and appointments for speaking may be made through Mrs. John Farr, 14 West Tenth Street, New York.

(Continued on page 21)

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

GOING FORWARD.

We note that at a Conference on the Church and Industry held in Chicago, under the auspices of the Chicago Church Federation and of the Federal Council of Churches, a resolution was adopted setting forth a statement of policy, which is another indication of the way that religious opinion is taking form. This conference affirmed its belief in the statement of the social ideals of the churches, which has been put forth by the Federal Council and concurred in by other religious organizations

In the resolution adopted in Chicago the Conference said further that "We believe that the principles of political government, as vindicated in the light of history, should be codified and applied to industrial government, and that they should be further defined and developed in the light of increasing experience."

This means that the persons attending the Chicago Conference and representing churches of that city put themselves on record as favoring industrial democracy.

The Conference further said: "We believe that when the pulpit and press speak on industrial questions, they should do so only upon a basis of accurate and impartial information." This is an exceedingly wise warning to a number of headlong reformers, who are apt to give forth exaggerated statements in their churches, which cannot be substantiated and consequently injure the influence for good, of those who might otherwise be helpful in progressive movements.

The general drift of modern conditions is toward the co-operative, rather than the competitive system, and the backing of the churches will give an impetus to this move.

THE RESURRECTION MINISTRY.

One of the beauties of our Christian year and its observance is that it affords us definite periods in which to study the distinct phases of the life and teaching of our Saviour.

His ministry covered so many sides of human experience that we are certain to miss some of its most important features, unless we use the means provided by the Church for keeping in touch with "the Light of the World."

We all recognize the importance of the forty days before Easter, but sometimes the forty days from Easter to Ascension have been somewhat overlooked. This season should have a special prominence under the present world conditions, as was recognized by the Bishops of Lambeth Conference.

In their Encyclical Letter they say: "Religion has promises which we have not fully claimed, not only in the life which now is, but also of the life which is to come. Our fellowship with one another, not less than our fellowship with God, triumphs over death. We who belong to the Church's lesser fellowship in this world are not separated from, but are one with those who belong to the Church's higher fellowship in the other world. That is, in part, what we mean by the Communion or Fellowship with Saints. The distance between our temporary and our permanent home, between earth and heaven, is not great.

Christ and his apostles made this clear, and the Christian experience of centuries has confirmed it. Belief in this reality and the nearness of the other world has been deepened by the war. The bereaved heart of mankind, with earnest, if not always wise endeavor, is straining to bridge the space that lies between.

It is for the commissioned teacher of the Church so to present the Communion of Saints, as to make it a satisfying force in the life of mourners. Whatever new triumphs of faith remain to be achieved, and whatever new voices of comfort are waiting for utterance, the bond of love rightly understood, will continue to be strong enough to carry the bereaved through the days of mourning and the discipline of separation till the day breaks and the shadows flee.

Here, as in all fellowship, there are silences and limitations which cannot be wholly done away while earth lasts. But through them and beyond them fellowship abides."

This is the season for us to consider the advice here given, and so emphasize the nearness of the risen Lord, and of those who have followed in His footsteps, as to make it a prominent part in our Christian faith.

In his "People's Life of Christ," Dr. Patterson-Smyth brings out this thought beautifully in the chapter, which he entitles, "A Lost Chapter in the Life of Christ."

He emphasizes the Bible's teachings concerning the continued activity of Christ and His followers, through death into the other life, and also shows how prominent a place this belief had in the early Church, quoting from Justin Martyr, Irenaeus of Lyons, St. Clement of Alexandria, and Tertulian of Northern Africa, and many others.

The Saviour's own words and appearances, as recorded in the gospels, afford us unlimited occasions for meditation and solace of the most comforting kind, and now is the time in which to seek and use this strengthening power.

HOSPITAL DAY.

The National Hospital Day Committee is sending out literature urging that May 12 be recognized as a special day on which the needs, efficiency and importance of hospitals be given particular attention.

Such days should appeal to all Church people, for the visiting of the sick was made by our Saviour, one of the requisites for inheritance in that "kingdom prepared from the foundation of the world." Such a day would be an appropriate time to stress the importance of organizing Church committees, for the regular and systematic visiting of hospitals. There are always a number of strangers in such institutions who will appreciate a friendly visit, and if such work is organized and properly apportioned to the various members of a church, it will be astonishing how many visits can be made and how much pleasure can be given without burdening unduly any individual.

With the number of churches that there are today, there is no excuse for neglecting any one in a hospital and allowing them to become lonely and depressed. The only thing that is necessary is to systematize the effort of Christian people. In large cities where there are many hospitals and many churches, co-operation and a division of labor, to avoid the duplication of effort, will easily provide enough visitors out of our churches for all the hospitals; and in the smaller towns, where there are only one or two hospitals, the churches could take the visiting by weeks and so provide for a daily caller, that would not require any one person to go oftener than once a month. All that is necessary is a proper system.

Let us make National Hospital Day, May 12, the date on which to put in operation an effective plan for the carrying out of this plan of the Master's work.

True Worship.

Plato said: The purpose of education is to give to the body and to the soul all the beauty and all the perfection of which they are capable. So, too, with our religious life: we must not only believe; but what we believe we must show forth in our lives—using our physical selves for the service of the Master; visiting, teaching, helping in several of the many ways at hand to show an appreciation of what the Master did for us. Attending a service of worship is frequently selfish gratification—we go where we enjoy it. True worship is that we show forth (often at some inconvenience) to help the coming of Christ's kingdom among men.

Family Department

APRIL.

1. Friday.
3. First Sunday after Easter.
10. Second Sunday after Easter.
17. Third Sunday after Easter.
24. Fourth Sunday after Easter.
25. Monday. S. Mark.
30. Saturday.

Collect for Second Sunday After Easter.

Almighty God, Who hast given Thine only Son to be unto us both a sacrifice for sin and also an example of godly life, give us grace that we may always most thankfully receive that His inestimable benefit, and also daily endeavor ourselves to follow the blessed steps of His most holy life; through the same Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

For the Southern Churchman.

Requiem.

S. B. K.

Hyacinths and daffodils
Fringing the grass
Round the white crosses
As we pass.

Red-buds and willow trees
Painting the sky
Where the thin cloud veils
Float on high.

Song-birds twittering
In their delight—
Drooping black figures
Draped like night.

While men lower
Into red clay,
Fragile, pale beauty
At close of day.

But, hearken, Christian,
And do not weep,
Those we are leaving
Are robed in sleep.

See the earth waken,
Spring after spring!
The dead will arise,
For Christ is King.

For the Southern Churchman.

The Sky Parlor.

J. B. L.

A clear, cold day in February found me knocking at the door of a large colonial mansion in "Tidewater" Virginia. The great building, with its basement, cellar and attic, rose five stories in height, and the great arched unshuttered windows let in a flood of cold glittering sunlight. After repeated knocks at the door a servant appeared with the announcement that the master and mistress of the mansion were away. She politely asked me in, however, saying the children were at home, up in the sky parlor.

As they were especial pets of mine, I accepted the invitation and was conducted up several wide stairways, adorned with mahogany carvings of fruit and flowers in high relief. On and up through halls and passages, I finally arrived, somewhat breathless, at a door opening on a south hall on the third floor. A knock on the door was answered by a sweet treble voice, and I entered a room which would have delighted any child. There was a blazing log fire in the huge fireplace, and hanging there on a crane was the shell of a large king-crab (or horseshoe crab), one of the curiosities of "Tidewater." This shell, I was told, was the bell upon which the children rapped to summon worshippers to their church services. Shells of all sorts and descriptions were ranged on the sides of the hearth.

In a deep recess made by the chimney, the little folk had made a church, or rather chancel, as nearly as possible like that of the parish church they attended with their parents. The altar, the pulpit and reading desk were duly represented by goods boxes turned down on one end, and behind the altar, in large black letters, was the inscription, "We praise Thee, O God." On one side was a toy piano, placed upon a box, another box serving for the stool for the little organist. A long brown shade was utilized to cut off the vestry room. The nine-year-old clergyman was arrayed in a long white garment; a black ribbon served for a stole. He was officiating at the reading desk when I entered, reading from an open Bible, beside which lay a Prayer Book and Hymnal. Nellie, the little sister, presided at the organ, while a number of dolls, some of them in a bad state of health, composed the congregation, and a better behaved one I never saw. Of course, my advent put an end to the services, and feeling sure the dolls' behavior would put mine to the blush, I did not insist too much that it should be continued.

The children met me with an old-time Virginia welcome, and at once proceeded to make my visit agreeable. After many assurances that I was thoroughly warm after my long drive, I was conducted by them to their library, a former dressing-room, filling the other deep recess of the chimney.

Here he had his telephone, which consisted of a paper box, nailed to the wall. A large spool represented the transmitter and another spool, with a string attached, served as the receiver. Nellie took up the receiver, and calling up an imaginary friend named Janie, had quite a conversation with her. The gravity and earnestness of her side of the conversation well-nigh upset my manners. Fielding then showed me his books and regretted that his last and newest was downstairs. He regretted very much that his papa and mamma were not at home to enjoy my visit. Nellie tried to tell me the contents of the book, and Fielding would correct her, saying, "Sister, you made a mistake," and between them the story was told, and the book offered me to take home to read.

Little Nellie now came forward and asked if my little daughters, Janie and Eliza, could come to see her on March 13th. "It will be my birthday," she said. "Please let them come and spend the night, and I will let my dolls sleep with them." I readily promised they should, and just here my pleasant visit had to end, for I was nearly ten miles from home, it was almost sundown, and the weather quite cold.

During the long drive in the crisp, cold air in the dusky light my mind was filled with the charm of the natural child life of the brother and sister. I had often seen them and rather pitied their isolated life, for Rosewell was quite a distance from their little friends and they rarely saw them. But in their sky parlor, surrounded by treasures new and old, and peopled with imaginary friends, they were the happiest of happy children.

Risen With Christ.

In the midst of life's vicissitudes and manifold tribulations, Christians have a right to all the comfort and strength which the prospect of a joyful resurrection at the last day can impart. This right they must not be denied. Of the consolation that springs from the deserted tomb in the garden they will not be deprived. It is not in the power of the most vivid imagination to exaggerate the ecstasies of that hour when they shall be caught up to forever participate in the glory of their risen Redeemer. Nothing is so eminently fitted to kindle in men's souls a good hope of a blessed immortality as the complete victory which Christ achieved over the last enemy that shall be destroyed. Since Christ is risen, we may depart from the sepulchre even with rejoicing, as the Marys did from the empty tomb.

Now, into the deepest sorrows and darkest hours of human experience, the brightest rays of joy may enter through the belief that the loved one whom we reluctantly surrender to the embrace of relentless death, we at the same time commit to the unutterable rapture of an endless life. If for one thing above another God should be praised, it is for the privilege, in trouble, in sore bereavement, of looking in hopeful trustfulness unto Christ and His triumph, and of distilling great consolation out of the blessed vision. Meantime, this vision should not be allowed to diminish the consolation of present resurrection with Christ, nor to make us insensible to the obligations it imposes. The apostle spake not to dead but to living men, not of future glorious possibilities but of present realities, when he said: "If ye be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above." Already is the believer risen with Christ.—Selected.

For the Southern Churchman.

The Upward Look.

Hunter Davidson.

Is your Faith a little stronger
For the battle fought today,
With the things and stings that met you
On the hard and dusty way?

Is your Hope a little brighter,
Though you faced discouragement
When the clouds hung heavy o'er you
And you felt the weak intent?

Is your Love a little sweeter
For the sacrifice you made
When you gave yourself in kindness,
Did your duty unafraid?

Is your Life a little better
That you held in high esteem,
Daring service for the Master
And denied the selfish dream?

Conserved, Though Unwritten.

Though no act of our life may find record with the pen, every act makes its private registry somewhere on the world's moral life. . . . In some way all is conserved. Around St. Paul's tomb, in the church of his name in Rome, burn lamps day and night, year by year, century by century. A reverent care keeps them always trimmed and burning. A finer care than this keeps imperishable the works of men. The toil of the thinker, of the inventor, of the man working all unknown for human good is kept burning in other lamps than those trimmed by his own hand. He who sings a noble song gives a force and beauty to the world that must live on, ever reduplicating itself in new echoes like Alpine chimes. He who invents anything quickens the inventive faculties in others. His life may be all unwritten, but he has originated new trains of thought, started new powers into life. All he did, though unwritten, the world still contains. If not a leaf of the ancient time missed its place in the coal deposits, nothing men say or think or do can fail of attaining some form of permanency.—Rev. H. H. Clark, D. D.

The Resurrection From the Dead.

At the moment when Christ died, nothing could have seemed more abjectly weak, more pitifully hopeless, more absolutely doomed to scorn and extinction and despair, than the Church which He had founded. It numbered but a handful of weak followers. They were poor, they were ignorant, they were helpless. They could not claim a single synagogue or a single sword. So feeble were they and insignificant that it would have looked like foolish partiality to prophesy for them the limited existence of a Galilean sect. How was it that these dull and ignorant men triumphed over the deadly fascinations of sensual mythologies, conquered kings and their armies, and overcame the world? There is one, and only one, possible answer—the resurrection from the dead. All this vast revolution was due to the power of Christ's resurrection.—Canon Farrar.

To Make the Mother Happy.

To manifest an interest in whatever concerns her. To seek her comfort and pleasure before your own. Not to forget, that though she may be old and wrinkled, she still loves pretty things. Make her simple, but appropriate and tasteful, gifts often. Remember, she is still a girl at heart, as far as little delicate attentions are concerned. Give her your full confidence, and never do anything of which you think she will disapprove. Study her tastes and habits, likes and dislikes, and cater to them in an unobtrusive way. Bear patiently with her peculiarities and infirmities, which, after all, may be the result of a life of care and toil. Defer to her opinions and treat them with respect, even if they do seem antiquated to the up-to-dateness of your college education. Do your best to keep her youthful in appearance, as well as in spirit, by taking pains with the little details of her toilet. Introduce your friends to her and enlist her sympathies in youthful projects, hopes and plans, so that she may relive again her own youth. Talk with her about your work, your studies, your friends, your amusements, the books you read, the friends you visit; remember that anything that concerns you is of interest to her. Never allow her to feel that she is superannuated or has lost her importance as the central factor of the home. Remember, her life is monotonous as compared to yours. Do all you can to brighten it.

Home Religion.

"I plead with parents to strive to bring back the old, lost ideals of home, when home was in every deed and centre of the social life, and the brightest, happiest hour of the day was the fireside evening hour with the family circle. In after life it will be the recollection of just such a home that will steady the craft of life. Only such a home awakens the wholesome emotion of the heart and stirs the deepest feelings of the soul. I plead with the youth of both sexes to pay good heed to the First Commandment with promise, that so the moral order of the home and its discipline may be maintained, and the old-time reverence for father and mother and home, chivalry as between the various members of the family may be restored."—Bishop of Toronto.

How Death Speaks.

How doth death speak of our beloved,
When it hath laid them low,
When it hath set its hallowing touch
On speechless lip and brow?

It clothes their every gift and grace
With radiance from the holiest place,
With light as from an angel's face:
Recalling with resistless force,
And tracing to their hidden source
Deeds scarcely noticed in their course.

This little loving, fond device,
That daily act of sacrifice,
Of which too late we learn the price!
Opening our weeping eyes to trace
Simple, unnoticed kindnesses,
Forgotten notes of tenderness,
Which evermore to us must be
Sacred as hymns in infancy,
Learned listening at a mother's knee.

How doth death speak to us of our beloved,
When it hath laid them low,
When it hath set its hallowing touch
On speechless lip and brow?

It sweeps their faults with heavy hand
As sweeps the sea the trampled sand,
Till scarce the faintest print is scanned,
It shows how such a vexing deed
Was but a generous nature's weed,
Or some choice virtue gone to seed.

How that small fretting fretfulness
Was but love's over-anxiousness,
Which had not been had love been less,
This failing at which we repined—
But the dim shade of day declined,
Which should have made us doubly blind.

Thus doth death speak of our beloved,
When it hath laid them low;
Then let love antedate the work of death,
And do this now!

It takes each failing on our part
And brands it in upon the heart
With caustic power and cruel art.
The small neglect that may have pained,
A giant stature will have gained
When it can never be explained.

The little service which had proved
How tenderly we watched and loved,
And those mute lips to glad smiles moved;
The little gift from out our store,
Which might have cheered some cheerless hour,
When they with earth's poor needs were poor,
But never will be needed more!

It shows our faults like fires at night,
It sweeps their failings out of sight,
It clothes their good in heavenly light.

Oh! Christ, our light!
Foredate the work of death,
And do this now!
Thou Who art love, thus hallow our beloved,
Not death, but Thou!

—Selected.

The Bugles Blow.

They tell us that at the birth of Christ there seemed to be throughout the great Roman empire an air of expectancy as if upon all peoples there fell the bright shadow of His coming by prophets long foretold.

Now once again that expectant air seems to brood over an humbled world. Restless, anxious, questioning, like the surge of the sea the peoples of the earth are moving, and we feel the swell of mighty unknown forces shaking our once familiar world. Old landmarks, old sign-posts to safety, are going down and change comes up on every freshening breeze.

A changing, shaken, crumbling world; and the eyes of all men turning wistfully to the one unshaken, sure foundation that remains—"Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, today and forever!"

Through the wide pagan world the barriers fall, the gates swing back, the nations stir and shake themselves from the long bondage of the ages.

"Watchman, what of the night?" "The morning cometh; also the night." The morning, Christian, if we wake: the night, if we but slumber on.

From the heavens the cloud of witnesses looks down. So many new faces, so many young faces of those who lately fought their fight and ran their race, added to that cloud that compasses us about. Looking down as if they said, "Only one more charge—but they sleep."

God's hour strikes across the world. His bugles blow, "Advance."

By any flame of love for Him Who first loved us, Christian, awake!

By all the dead in wandering sea-tossed graves; by all the dead of shot and shell, bayonet and poison gas; by all the dead on forced marches and hurried flight—dead baby hands upturned to God; by all the dead of pestilence and famine, of violence and anarchy; by all the evil that lifts its shameless head; by all the doubts and shadowing fears with which men face the future, His bugles call, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and pray!"

Then let your prayers possess the air. Let there be no day nor hour but that earth's ascending prayers shall stir the lamps that burn before the throneo f God.

No room in any house, no street in any town; no garden, no field, no stretch of wood, no silver winding stream; no store or office building, factory or college hall, but shall say at set of sun, "From us there sped today winged arrows to God's great battle drawing on."

Then into the high place unseen of men where now the battle rages shall come your prayers all armed in light, and the cloud of witnesses, looking down, shall say, "At last they pray on earth. They pray Thy kingdom come, O Christ."

O you, wherever now you are, there is none of you so poor but you can give this rarer thing than gold—your humble, contrite prayers.

And you but consecrate yourself to fight in that great army, silent, secret, invisible, that musters in around the world, your eyes shall see!

The fashion of this world passes away, but you shall stand in your lot at the end of the days. Your heart shall rejoice and your joy no man taketh from you. For in that hour you shall sing:

"I see the powers of darkness put to flight;
I see the morning break."

—Mildred Welch.

(Leaflet, Presbyterian Department Mission Service.)

The cross provides pardon for the past, power for the present, and peace for the future.—W. H. G. Thomas.

For the Young Folks

Let Now My Life Be Precious in Their Sight.

God, make my life a little light
Within the world to glow;
A little flame that burneth bright
Wherever I may go.

God, make my life a little flower
That giveth joy to all;
Content to bloom in native bower,
Although the place be small.

God, make my life a little song
That comforteth the sad;
That helpeth others to be strong
And makes the hearer glad.

God, make my life a little staff,
Whereon the weak may rest;
That so what health and strength I have
May serve my neighbor best.

God, make my life a little hymn
Of tenderness and praise;
Of faith—that never waxeth dim
In all His wondrous ways.

—Matilda B. Edwards.

The Hospital Party.

Children, Jesus noticed that when people gave parties they only asked those who had invited them. A man would say, "That man invited me to dinner, so I must have him dine with me."

Or perhaps some lady would think: "If I invite those people to my home, they will ask me when they next give a party. They are wealthy and have a beautiful house, so I'd like to go there."

Jesus felt sorry that the people did thus, so one day He said: "When you give a dinner, do not ask just your relatives and friends nor your rich neighbors; for, if you do, they will ask you again and thus you will receive your reward. But invite, instead, the poor, the lame and the blind, and you shall be blessed, for, as they cannot reward you, God will do so."

I want to tell you a story of a little girl who gave a party which I am sure pleased Jesus. Her name was Elizabeth, but she was called Betty by all her friends. She had two little sisters, Marjorie and Eleanor, and they all lived in a large, beautiful home a little way out from a city.

The little girls had many animals; Shetland ponies which took them on the finest rides, pretty little white rabbits and some Maltese ones also, of a lovely gray color. They had dogs and kitties, too, and Eleanor had a dear little lamb which loved to follow her.

At the time of my story Betty was soon to have a birthday, as she was almost six years old, and her mamma had promised her a party. She always loved to go to parties, and she was so glad she herself could now have one. She talked about it with her sisters and they planned to invite all the children who had asked them to their parties.

One Sunday papa asked his little girls if they would like to go with him in the afternoon to see the children in the hospital. He had telephoned, and found it would be quite safe to take them. They always loved to go with papa anywhere and were delighted at the idea of making this visit.

They took a little ride in the cars, a short walk, and then they came to the hospital, such a large, fine building. The matron, who was a sweet, lovely woman, came in to see them, and after a few moments took them up to the ward, or rooms, where the children were. Some of them lay in little beds and looked so thin and white that Betty and her sisters felt very sorry for them.

Then the matron took them into the room where the children stayed when they were getting better. It had many windows, so it was flooded with sunshine. There were pretty pictures on the walls, and it looked so pleasant the little girls felt it wouldn't be very hard to stay there. But when they saw the poor little ones they knew that even the bright room couldn't make them quite happy. They lay on soft lounges, or rested in chairs in which they could lie down or sit up. Many of them had to keep very still, as their backs or legs had been hurt; others could walk a little on crutches, but all of them had some trouble which kept them from running about.

One dear little fellow, Vivian, the children especially loved. He had soft, dark hair and large brown eyes and such a sweet smile. He had trouble with his back and for weeks and weeks had had to lie still, while he often suffered great pain. Betty asked how old he was, and found that his birthday came just when hers did, and that he, too, would be six.

After the children visited together for a while papa told them all a story and then he had to take his little ones home. Vivian and the other children asked them to come again, and papa said he would certainly bring them.

Betty was very quiet as she went home, for she was thinking about the poor little invalids. She knew it must be very hard for them to lie still and suffer so much pain, and even to stay in that bright, pretty room wasn't so nice as to be able to run out of doors and have a happy time with other children. Again and again she thought of poor little Vivian, with his beautiful eyes and sweet face, who was just as old as she, but wasn't to have any party when his birthday came.

When they reached home the little girls ran to tell mamma of their visit, and she was so interested in hearing of the little invalids. Betty said, "O, mamma, I do wish I could do something for those poor little children."

That night, when she knelt to pray, she asked God to bless the poor little sick children, and she added, "Show me, dear Jesus, something I can do to make them happy."

When she awoke the next morning such a nice plan came into her mind. She thought she'd ask mamma if she might have a party for Vivian instead of for herself. Then she remembered all her own little friends whom she was going to invite, and for a moment she felt she must have her own party. But as she thought of all the little invalids who had to keep so still and couldn't run about nor play, she decided she would rather make them happy.

She couldn't wait to get dressed, so she ran into mamma's room and crept into her bed while she talked about her plan. Mamma and papa both thought it would be very nice to have the party for the little sufferers, so after breakfast mamma took Betty and drove to the hospital to talk to the matron about it. She, too, was much pleased and told mamma just what the children could have to eat.

When the day came, children, I wish you might have looked into that pretty sitting-room at the hospital. A little table stood in the middle of the room and on it were pretty dishes, lovely flowers and many nice things to eat. In the center was a simple cake, covered with white frosting, and on this, in tiny pink candles, were two names, Betty and Vivian, for mamma said the party should be for both. Six little pink candles were around the edge of the cake, and before it was brought in the shades were pulled down and the candles lit. The eyes of the little invalids shone as bright as the candles, for they had never seen so pretty a cake. It was such fun, too, to blow out the lights, one by one.

Would you like to know what they had for the party? There were dainty sandwiches, cut into diamonds and triangles, little wafers tied with pink ribbon, and animal crackers which made the children laugh. It seemed so funny to eat elephants and camels and queer little monkeys. There was pretty pink jelly, too, and milk tea served in cunning little pink cups.

Last of all, they had such a beautiful surprise. There was a little animal or bird for each child, and what do you suppose it was made of? Ice cream! Just think how wide the children's eyes opened! Even Betty, Eleanor and Marjorie didn't know of this, for mamma had kept it a secret from them, too. Every child had something different; a bird, a chicken, a rabbit, a lamb, a dog or a kitty. Besides the birthday cake, they had little cakes made like hearts and stars. At each place were little Chinese napkins, showing such funny faces and bonbons, which opened with a snap. Inside was a tissue paper bonnet or cap, which every little child wore.

Of course, only the little children who were well enough to sit up or to be wheeled into the pretty sitting-room could come to the party, but Betty and mamma took something to all the little sufferers in the ward before the party began; jelly or fruit or whatever the nurses said would not hurt them. Betty had flowers, too, for every one; lovely sweet peas, or fragrant carnations that kept fresh so long, or dear little pansies whose bright faces always bring pleasant thoughts. It made Betty so happy to see how the thin, pale faces of the poor little sufferers would light up with pleasure as she gave them the flowers. At the party every one had such a good time and Vivian said, "I just wish I could be six years old every day!"

When Betty at last went home she said, "O mamma, 'twas the best and happiest party I ever had, and I am so glad I gave it at the hospital."—King's Builders.

My Backward Shadow.

The lessons I must do each day,
I do not greatly mind;
But every time I start to school
My shadow lags behind!

And while I say my nine times nines,
And learn to read and write,
My shadow grows quite thin and pale,
Or slips clear out of sight!

But when the clock hands point to four,
I say, "Good-night, Miss Hackett,"
As soon as I can strap my books
And snatch my tennis racquet.

And though I speed up pretty fast,
All ready for a lark;
My shadow runs ahead of me,
And beats me to the park!

—Emir F. Ammerman.

For the Southern Churchman.

Mlle. and Ting Ling Toy.

Eugenie du Maurier.

Mlle. is a very tiny little person, so far as avoirdupois goes. But she possesses a heart big as a mountain, so full of tenderness, sympathy and love is it for little children, the downcast, the poor and suffering ones. Mlle. has charge of the "baby" class in Sunday school at the Y. M. C. A. So enthused is she with her work among these little ones, and so entranced are they with her, that the children seldom want to go home. Frequently they will not go until she takes them.

Mlle. has been doing some so-called social service work with the mothers in the Chinese colony. She has a Mothers' Club for them. She goes to their homes and is welcomed quite as much as she would be in the homes of her American friends. In fact, they are friends in the best sense of the word. Mlle. has gained the confidence of the Chinese to the extent that they tell her all their troubles and go to her for advice upon any and every subject. She has been teaching these little mothers the beauty of personal and home hygiene. The Chinese are not poor in this world's goods. But many of them live as they do because they know no other way of living in America. Americans do not bother to show them a better way of living. They do not know what home luxuries are. Hitherto they have had but few of what Mlle. considers even the barest necessities. She has taught them the beauty of having single iron bedsteads for the children; the comfort of cleanliness; the necessity of caring for the teeth, hands and hair; and the reason for individual towels, wash-cloths, tooth-brushes and individual drinking cups.

Colds are very prevalent in the Chinese colony, for the very big reason that the Chinese do not like the cold weather. And hitherto they have not known the value of fresh air and good, wholesome sunshine as preventatives against many ills.

This past winter, however, things have changed mightily among the little mothers of the Chinese colony with Mlle. at the helm to advise and help. They have learned that sunshine and fresh air are the very best medicines for themselves, and their babies added to the necessary amount of care and precaution in the matter of hygiene and proper food. Several of the little mothers have actually discovered, too, that air and sunshine can and do ward off many a cold and other ill.

One day Ting Ling Toy, the pet of the Y. M. C. A. Sunday school, the pride of all Chinatown, became ill. The distressed mother sent speedily for Mlle. to come, advise and help, as it had become Mlle.'s custom to do. Upon her arrival Mlle. soon discovered that Ting Ling Toy had measles. She proceeded to bathe the little one, put him into a clean night robe, arranged his little iron bed with clean linen; then she gave him several cups of warm water to drink. (Ting Ling Toy has an antipathy for cold water, both for bathing and for drinking.) Then the little one being comfortable for the time being, Mlle. sent for a physician she knew, having beforehand isolated the other children from that part of the house. She hung a sheet before the door of Ting Ling Toy's room to serve as a disinfectant shield for all the members of the family.

When the doctor came he examined the chart Mlle. had made as to temperature, pulse and respiration, commended Mlle. upon her activities, recommended a hot lemonade drink to cause the child's rash to break out naturally and quickly as possible, and said Ting Ling Toy was to be kept in bed, and under no consideration be allowed in a draft, though there was to be a continual change of air throughout the room. Under no circumstances, he told the other children, were they to be allowed to enter Ting Ling Toy's room. Then, assuring Mlle. that Ting Ling would have but a light case of the malady, he left a prescription to be filled, and consigned Mlle. to the exercise of her own native wit and love for the child.

Then came for Mlle. and her pet Chinese baby a most delightful isolation of close companionship. Mlle. prepared the malted milk, brothers, cereals, toast, eggs and cocoa daily; proceeded in the way she mapped out for herself, taking temperature, pulse, respiration; bathing, naps, providing recreation periods, and she felt "quite as if she were a real nurse, and not only friend and Sunday school teacher," as she told the doctor when she met him on one of her rambles while off duty.

The hardest thing for the other children was that they were forbidden to pass that wet sheet while their dear Mlle. and Ting Ling Toy "were having measles and fun together" in Ting Ling Toy's room. They knew Mlle. was telling Ting Ling the story of when Jesus was a little boy living in Nazareth; they knew, too, that she was showing Ting Ling Toy how to make little sailing boats while she was telling the story, because Jesus often went out in fishing boats; and they knew Mlle. was making Ting Ling Toy some lovely windmills while she told him the story of the little boy who was afraid of the wind; and they heard her, too, telling the story of the naughty little boy who wished the wind would go away and never come back again—and the wind did go; and the little boy could have no clean blouse to wear to go to school in because when his mother hung it on the line to dry there was no wind to make it dry; and there were several other dreadful things happened to the little boy, who pretty soon began to want to wind to come back—he could not play with his new airplane because there was no wind to blow it up in the air. So the little boy called to the wind to come back and stay anywhere it wanted, and he would try to like it as well as he liked the sun and all the other things God made for people's happiness.

But when the other children heard Mlle. singing the hymns and little kindergarten songs she had taught them all at Sunday school, they simply could not help it—they just had to join in from the other side of the disinfected curtain. And several times when Mlle. played little waltzes on Ting Ling Toy's tiny violin they danced up and down the hall.

One day Mlle. told the other children that Ting Ling Toy had a most beautiful red rose garden all over his chubby little body. And they wished they could have rose gardens, too, so that they might listen to all those lovely stories and play the games.

One evening Ting Ling Toy's great black eyes looked like deep pools in great masses of red roses. That was the only time his temperature went up to fever point. And that was because Ting Ling Toy had gotten out of bed and run to the window to see if his beloved Mlle. was coming down the street. He had remembered to put on his wee slippers. But he had entirely forgotten to throw his little wrapper over his shoulders. And he was "so shivery." And he was shivery when Mlle. returned to him. He promised, as she tucked him under the covers, that he would never do so again lest Mlle. go away and not "play with his measles" any more.

One bright beautiful afternoon there was great rejoicing at the Y. M. C. A. Sunday school. Ting Ling Toy was "all well again" and had come back to them. The other children did not get measles. But they all wished they had, because they wanted Mlle. to take care of them and tell them stories, and sing and play for them, and show them how to make paper houses, furniture, picture frames, etc., and all sorts of little things, and play the finger plays and games with them.

"Oh," said Ting Ling Toy, with a toss of his little black head, "I will show you how to do those things; because, you see, the doctor and Mlle. and I made a fire of those we made in my rose garden time so that the other children would not get all prickly with roses from them. Now, you see I have not those things any more."

Mlle. thinks she would like to take care of all the Chinese babies when they have measles. And the other children have made her promise to take care of them all when they get sick. Mlle. thinks that Chinese babies are very easy to nurse, because they are so sweet and patient, and she loves them so much. It is a great comfort to Mlle. that she will always find nursing to do in the Chinese colony, although Chinee children generally have a very exasperating way of being uncommonly free from all unnecessary illnesses.

The South's Best Book Store

HUNTER & CO

105 E. Broad Street
Richmond, Va.

Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen
Prompt and Reliable Service

The Wing-Foot Electric Shoe Repair Shop
ALL KINDS OF GENERAL REPAIRING
Mail Orders a Specialty
Owned and Managed by T. A. BUNNELL
311 N. Second St. Phone Ran. 1286-W

Spring Styles
NOW READY
Have Your Old Hat Fixed Like New
Many customers use their old hats by having them made over for their children. We specialize on children's hats.
PARCEL POST DEPARTMENT AT YOUR SERVICE.
VERRA HAT WORKS
211 NORTH FIRST STREET
RANDOLPH 90

"The Store that Pleases"
FOR FURNITURE
Jones Bros. & Co.
Incorporated
1418-20 E. Main St., Richmond, Va

HOW DOCTORS TREAT COLDS AND THE FLU

First Step in Treatment Is a Brisk Purgative With Calotabs, the Purified and Refined Calomel Tablets that are Nausealess, Safe and Sure.

Doctors have found by experience that no medicine for colds and influenza can be depended upon for full effectiveness until the liver is made thoroughly active. That is why the first step in the treatment is the new, nausealess colomel tablets called Calotabs, which are free from the sickening and weakening effects of the old style calomel. Doctors also point out the fact that an active liver may go a long way towards preventing influenza and is one of the most important factors in enabling the patient to successfully withstand an attack and ward off pneumonia.

One Calotab on the tongue at bed time with a swallow of water—that's all. No salts, no nausea nor the slightest interference with your eating, pleasure or work. Next morning your cold has vanished, your liver is active, your system is purified, and you are feeling fine, with a hearty appetite for breakfast. Druggists sell Calotabs only in original sealed packages, price thirty-five cents. Your money will be cheerfully refunded if you do not find them delightful.—(Adv.)

Service

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE
CARPETS DRAPERIES

R. L. Christian & Company

514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.

Leading Fancy Grocer

AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.

Catalogue mailed on application.

For the Southern Churchman.

Bunny Rabbit's First Easter.

(Katherine Langley, Aged 14.)

Bunny Rabbit was born in December, when the snow covered the ground, so he had not as yet seen or known what Easter was. One night Mother Rabbit called Bunny Rabbit and said to him, "Tomorrow is Easter, and always on Easter we make the children happy. This vear I have picked out a poor little girl for us to make happy. Her name is Edna, and she will have no Easter eggs if we do not help her. She cannot even go to the free festival and roll eggs, as she has to stay at home and help her mother work. Don't you think it would be nice to make her happy this year?" "Oh! yes, I love to make people happy, especially when they are sweet and nice." "Oh! but we must also try to make sour people sweet, so we are also going to make Dame Stone, a sour and crabby person, happy."

Little Edna on Easter morning was just getting out of a hard bed up in the attic. She was thinking, "Oh! why did we have to be poor? Instead of having a lovely Easter day, I have to stay and drudge. Oh dear, of course I love to help mother, but, but—Well, I mustn't dwell on my hardships this lovely morning. Good morning, mother," she called down the stairs, where her mother was already up getting a very scanty breakfast. When Edna opened the door, after she had dressed, she could hardly believe her eyes, for there, was it? No, it couldn't be—but it was! A little brown basket with a blue egg, a yellow egg, and oh! there was a green one, and a red one, and there was a purple one. All sorts of colors. Oh! how happy Edna was. She called to her mother, "Oh, mother dear, look what's here!" Bunny Rabbit, sitting in a corner, was highly pleased at his success. But his mother had said to help make sour people happy, too; so off he hopped to see if Dame Stone was happy. When he got there Edna was already there showing Dame Stone the beautiful basket she had gotten. Dame Stone was happy, for once in her dreary life! Edna and her mother and Dame Stone were all happy. Who had made them happy? Why, Bunny Rabbit, of course, and he was very, very happy himself that night.

The Two Angels—A Legend.

Two beautiful angels started out from heaven one morning to gather the prayers of men. As they neared the earth they were impressed by the great beauty of all about them. There were great orchards laden with fruit, fields golden with yellow grain, green pastures and peace and plenty everywher.

"Let us divide our work today," said one of the angels. "See, my bag is much larger than yours. I shall gather the prayers only of praise and thanksgiving. You, with your smaller bag, may gather the complaints and the requests."

"Very well," responded the other, "and when I am through perhaps I shall have time to help you."

So they separated and each went about her work. At sunset they met again.

"Oh," exclaimed the one with the small bag. "Such a day as I have had. This small bag did not begin to hold the requests and complaints. I have had to make three trips. Who would think men could think of so much to want?"

"And I," said the other sadly, "found this bag far too big. I have sought all day long where people seemed to have all that heart could desire, and, see, I have only this one little 'thank you.'"

"Only one," sighed the other. "If we only could make the world understand." When they appeared before the King each gave her offering in sorrowful silence.

"Be comforted," said the King, tenderly, "one of My loved ones has given Me thanks," and the King received the one "thank you."—Selected.

Parts of Speech.

Three little words we often see
Are articles a, an and the.

A noun the name of anything,
As school or garden, hoop or swing.

Adjectives tell the kind of noun,
As great, small, pretty, white or brown.

Instead of nouns and pronouns stand;
His head, her hat, your arm, my hand

Verbs tell of something being done,
As read, write, spell, sing, jump or run

How things are done the adverbs tell,
As slowly, quickly, ill or well.

They also tell us where and when,
As here and there, and now and then

A preposition stands before
A noun, as in or through a door.

Conjunctions join the words together,
As rain and sunshine, wind or weather

Conjunctions sentences unite,
As kittens scratch and puppies bite.

An interjection shows surprise,
As oh! how pretty! Ah, how wise!
—Selected.

Jno. L. Williams & Sons

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565)
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds.

NICK BULL'S MARKET,

Richmond's Leading Dealer in

FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME

112 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.

Phone Randolph 1680

WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

The Evangelical Education Society
Of the Protestant Episcopal Church

Office: The Church House, Twelfth and Walnut Streets, Philadelphia

AIDS STUDENTS FOR THE MINISTRY AND DISTRIBUTES EVANGELICAL LITERATURE

President: WILLIAM S. HARVEY, ESQ.

Active Vice-President: The Rt. Rev. THOMAS J. GARLAND, D. D.

General Counsel	Treasurer	General Secretary
HAROLD GOODWIN, Esq.	ALFRED LEE, Esq.	Rev. S. LORD GILBERSON, M. A

FORM OF BEQUEST

I give and bequeath to "THE EVANGELICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY OF THE PROTESTANT EPIS COPAL CHURCH," incorporated by the legislature of Pennsylvania, the first Monday in November, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine, ———— dollars, or ———— real estate, to be used for the general purpose of the Society.

"If you want a bank with a heart, try the American National"

This is a bit of advice one of our customers gave to a friend who was coming to Richmond.

Our modesty would never lay claim to such a title, but as it was given us unsolicited, we ask you to put us to the test.

American National Bank
Richmond, Va.

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor
Richmond, Va.

DISTANCE

Makes no difference to Berry patrons—our Mail Order Department can serve you anywhere; delivery free.

Write for our new catalogue of MEN'S and BOY'S CLOTHING.

The South's "Old Home" store with new blood and best values!

O. N. Berry Co.
ESTABLISHED 1879
Main and 11th Sts., Richmond, Va.

Earn Extra Dollars in Your Spare Hours

You need no experience to be successful—You can learn as you earn. Let us tell you about our plan.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN is the oldest Episcopal Church Paper published in America. Every dollar received in subscriptions will be devoted to the improvement of the paper and the extension of its service in the work of the Church.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

Street.....

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, except in positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

FAMINE RELIEF.

For the convenience of our readers we publish the addresses of the treasurers of the various Relief Funds whose appeals for the starving, and especially for starving children are so urgent and touching. The Southern Churchman will forward contributions to any of these, but to save time, postage and possibility of miscarriage, checks would better be sent directly to the treasurers as below:

Near East Relief (formerly "Armenian and Syrian Relief")—Cleaveland H. Dodge, No. 1 Madison Ave., New York City.

European Relief (Central and Eastern Europe)—Franklin K. Lane, 42 Broadway, New York City; or locally for Virginia, DeSoto Fitzgerald, 218 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.

Chinese Famine Relief—Remit through Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer, Presiding Bishop and Council, 281 Fourth Ave., New York City.

Acknowledgements.

Mrs. B.	$ 5.00
Mrs. J. W. Noell	15.00
Trinity Church, Bedford, Va.	12.00

PIPE ORGANS

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID in building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

DON'T TRY ON YOUR NEW DRESSES over your old corset. Let us help you select and fit to you the corset that does greatest justice to your figure. The Corset Shop, 317 N. Fifth St. Mrs. A. J. Pyle, Prop. Phone Ran. 3397.

Doll Skirts Accordion Pleated Free. ASHBY B. PYLE, 315 N. 5th St. Hemstitching, Pinking and Button Covering.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER
Invites you to inspect her line of GAGE Tailored HATS. Also the ADVANCE Showing of Spring Hats in the most attractive shapes.
209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

NIAGARA METAL WEATHER STRIPS Saves 25 per cent. Fuel, Prevents Rattling Windows, keeps out Dust, Dirt and Storm.
CINCINNATI REWIRABLE METAL AND WOOD FRAME SCREENS.
L. F. HEROLD,
2 N. 11th St., Richmond, Va.
Phone Randolph 3550.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

CATHEDRAL STUDIO, ENGLISH Church embroideries and materials. Stoles with crosses, $7; plain, $5.50; handsome gift stoles, $12 up; burse and veil, $15, $20. Surplices and exquisite altar linens. L. V. Mackrille, 2604 Thirty-sixth St., N. W., Washington, D. C. Tel. Chev. 1915.

A GENTLEMAN DESIRES WHOLESOME country board and pleasant room with open fire, in well-bred Virginia family. Piedmont or mountains. Kindly send terms, location, etc., to "B. R.," care of Southern Churchman

HELP WANTED

YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCATION AND refinement wanted to enter the St. John's Hospital Training School for Nurses (Episcopal), Brooklyn, N. Y. Applicants required to have one year of high school or its equivalent. Course three years. A registered school of high standing. Nurses receive remuneration. Many social privileges. Home life pleasant. Graduates are now receiving $6.00 per day. Apply to St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED FOR 1921-22 AS MASTER IN the Grammer Department of a Church school, an unmarried man with teaching and playground experience. Apply St Albans School, Washington, D. C.

WANTED—A REFINED, CAPABLE woman as mother's helper. Two small children in family. Write Mrs. W. Holmes Robertson, Gainesville, Va.

WANTED—A REFINED, CAPABLE woman as mother's helper. Two small children in family. Write Mrs. W. Holmes Robertson, Gainesville, Va.

SETTLED WOMAN AS WORKING housekeeper in family of two. Nice home; no children. Salary. Address "A. B.," care of Southern Churchman.

POSITION AS TRAVELING COMPANION to a lady, by a lady of pleasing personality. For information address Rev. R. R. Phelps, 165 Pine Street, Berkley (Norfolk), Va.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO LEPER MISSION.

November 15, 1920, to April 1, 1921.

Mrs. Langborne Williams (support of child)	$ 20.00
Mrs. E. Randolph Williams	5.00
Millward Branch (support leper boy, at Fusan, Korea)	13.00
Christmas gifts (girl and boy, Purulia, India)	4.00
Mr. H. M. Kendall	10.00
From five pigs boarded out	7.11
Charlottesville Branch (for our leper at Thanksgiving)	5.00
Girls' Friendly Society (Trinity Episcopal Church, Covington, Ky.	3.50
Grace Church Sunday School, Cismont, Va. (Pete Banks)	9.00
Sunday School, First English Lutheran Church (Pete Banks)	38.46
Mr. T. W. Blackstone, Accomac C. H., Va.	2.50
Miss Gayle (our leper at Christmas)	1.00
Mrs. C. W. Warren, Smithfield, Va.	4.00
Miss Lou Jones' Sunday School Class and friends, Webster Groves, Mo. (five cots in one of Mrs. Mason's Homes)	24.00
Miss Annie Nelson, Mitchells, Va.	5.00
Mrs. Frederick Hahr, Athens, Ga.	20.00
In His Name Los Angeles, Cal.	5.00
St. James' Branch, Woman's Auxiliary, Leesburg, Va.	2.00
Leper meeting (January)	11.00
Misses E. J. and M. Nolting (two lepers)	50.00
Miss L. Jones, Sunday School, Webster Groves, Mo., Pete Banks (cot in Mason Home)	25.00
The Misses Murray, Cumberstone, Md. (Mrs. Mason's Memorial)	5.00
The Misses Somerville, Mitchells, Va. (two lepers)	50.00
Miss Lou Leigh	5.00
Section B. Woman's Auxiliary, Charles Town, W. Va.	25.00
Woman's Auxiliary, Christ Church, Winchester, Va.	2.00
Woman's Auxiliary, First Presbyterian Church, Richmond	12.25
Mrs. A. Moore, Jr., Berryville, Va., Pete Banks (support of leper)	12.43
Miss Marion Hanckel, Charleston, S. C.	5.00
Millwood Branch (two lepers, Purulia, India)	16.00
Sunday School, First Presbyterian Church	25.00
Virginia Branch, Woman's Auxiliary	13.00
Miss Florence Garnett, Seventh Street Christian Church	1.00
March meeting	14.20
Grace Church Sunday School, Cismont, Va (Pete Banks)	2.59
Member First Presbyterian Church through Woman's Auxiliary), (boy at Ranigang, India)	20.00
Mrs. L. P. Muller, Charlotte, N. C. (work in Korea under Presbyterian Board)	25.00
Miss Gabriella Hunter (memory of mother)	5.00
For George Hodges (our leper)	4.43
Total	$506.43

E. P. MERIWETHER,
President and Treasurer, Richmond Branch, Leper Mission.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

Worthington: Entered into rest, March 19, 1921, VIRGINIA WORTHINGTON, daughter of the late G. Y. and E. T. Worthington.

Stephens: Entered into life eternal, at his home, near Charlottesville, Va., Monday, March 9, 1921, RICHARD CHANNING STEPHENS son of the late Dr. George B. and Mary S. Stephens.

"Father, in Thy gracious keeping,
"Leave we now Thy servant sleeping."

Pearsall: MR. DAVID J. PEARSALL, senior warden of St. Mark's Church, and Secretary of the Diocese of Bethlehem, died on Easter Day, 1921. The funeral was held in the church Wednesday afternoon, March 30, at 2:30.

RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT.

Resolutions passed at general meeting Colonial Dames of America, State of Virginia, March 29, 1921:

Entered into rest eternal, on March 23, 1921, at her home in Richmond, ANNA DEANE, widow of the late Dabney Jefferson Carr, of Albemarle County, Va. She was the daughter of Richmond's beloved physician, Dr. Frank Deane, and his beautiful wife, Elizabeth Drew.

Born in the purple of luxury and exclusive social position, Anna Deane was one of the most popular girls of her young day. She married early a descendant of that Dabney Carr, the friend and brother-in-law of Thomas Jefferson, who rests at Monticello with the great prophet of Democracy.

Widowed early, with indomitable zeal and untiring devotion, she reared wisely her five children, who now, in womanhood and manhood, rise up and call her blessed. In her long life she never knew defeat, but each disappointment was but a stepping-stone to renewed hope and energy.

She believed in the Southern Confederacy, the Virginia aristocracy and the Episcopal Church. Motherhood was to her a challenge for purity of life and friendship, a bond which she jealously defended.

Years of ill health failed to dim her brave spirit, and she went to her God as a little child goes to its father's outstretched arms.

"She has fought a good fight; she has finished her course; she has kept the faith."

It is resolved that a copy of this inadequate tribute be sent to her bereaved family by the Colonial Dames of America in the State of Virginia.

BESSIE TOMPKINS,
SALLY NELSON ROBINS,
LUCY PEGRAM SCRIVENOR.

MISS VICTORINE KOONES.

Funeral services for MISS VICTORINE KOONES, one of the most prominent workers in the Episcopal Church in Washington, who died Sunday, March 20, while visiting her sister at Leesburg, Va., were held at the Church of the Ascension, Twelfth Street and Massachusetts Avenue, Northwest. The service was conducted by Bishop Harding assisted by Rev. David W. Curran, Rev. Robert Kell, of Govans, Baltimore, Md., and Rev. E. Pinckney Wroth, of Poolsville, Md. Interment was in Rock Creek Cemetery.

Miss Koones was active in all endeavors of the Episcopal Church, and was devoutly religious. She was born in Clarke County, Va. She was the daughter of the Late Charles Montgomery Koones and Elizabeth Koones.

In 1876 Miss Koones came to Washington to live. She devoted her extraordinary ability as an organizer to the Church and was president of the Chancel Guild of Ascension Church; president of the Daughters of the King; secretary of the Bell Home for Children, of the Diocese of Washington; president of the Girls' Friendly Society, and an officer of the Ladies' Auxiliary of Ascension Church.

Her interests in things ecclesiastical were not confined to her own parish. She was identified with almost every movement at the cathedral, and was active in the Bishop's Guild. On Holy Thursday, at the Church of the Ascension, Mr. Atkinson, of St. Thomas' Church, played the "Dead March from Saul" as a memorial to Miss Koones.

Miss Koones is survived by a sister, Mrs. William Hawling, of Leesburg; two brothers, Dr. Charles K. Koones, of 20 Iowa Circle, with whom she lived, and Samuel S. Koones; two nieces, Miss Elizabeth and Miss Catherine Koones, and one nephew, Charles Carr Koones.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

(Continued from page 12)

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.

Death of a Prominent Churchman.

Mr. David Jarvis Pearsall, Secretary of the Diocese of Bethlehem and of the Executive Council, senior warden of St. Mark's Church, Mauch Chunk, trustee of the Church Home for Children at Jonestown, Yeates Episcopal School for Boys at Lancaster, the Robert Packer Hospital at Sayre, and Lehigh University at Bethlehem, died at the Moses Taylor Hospital at Scranton on Easter Day, March 27, having undergone an operation on Saturday afternoon.

Mr. Pearsall, a lay deputy to the last General Convention, was one of the leaders of the Church in Pennsylvania, one of his latest services being rendered on the Friday before Palm Sunday, when he was secretary of the committee which gathered together a great body of laymen for a conference on increased lay activity throughout the Diocese of Bethlehem. The burial service was held at St. Mark's Church, Mauch Chunk, the Rev. Walter Coe Roberts, rector, on Wednesday, March 30. The Rev. R. P. Kreitler read the opening sentences, the Rev. W. N. Weir read the lesson, the rector made an address, and Bishop Talbot took the creed and prayers.

The burial of the Rev. Robert H. Kline, late rector of Grace Church, Allentown, Pa., occurred on Tuesday afternoon, March 29, Bishop Talbot and several clergymen officiating at Grace Church, of which Mr. Kline was rector from 1885 to 1917. For the four years preceding he had been rector of St. John's Church, Ashland. He was ordained deacon by Bishop Stevens and priest by Bishop Whittaker in 1875. His son, the Rev. Robert F. Kline, is the present rector of Calvary Church, Wilkes-Barre.

St. Luke's Church, Scranton, the Rev. R. P. Kreitler, rector, contributed about $1,200, and St. Paul's Church, Montrose, the Rev. Wallace Martin, rector, contributed $500 to the European Relief Fund. The Rev. Wallace Martin was chairman of the Susquehanna County European Relief Council.

W. M.

NORTH TEXAS

Rt. Rev. E. A. Temple, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. L. L. Swan, for the past ten years and more in charge of the church at Gainsville, Tex., has resigned his work there and accepted work in North Texas, taking charge of the work at Clarendon and other missions.

Plainview: The work here has been greatly assisted by Mr. Meade F. Griffin, who has acted as lay reader for the past two months. Monthly visits are made by the clergyman in charge.

Services once a month have been resumed at Sweetwater and Snyder.

D. A. S.

Personal Notes

The Rev. James Lawrence Ware, curate of St. Stephen's Church, Wilkes-Barre, Pa., has accepted election to the position of Secretary of the Department of Religious Education of the Province of Washington. He will take up the work of his new office April 15, though his official relation to his parish will not cease until May 1.

The Rev. W. R. Dye has resigned the parish at Hancock to accept a call to St. John's Church, Ellicott City, Md.

The Rev. Herbert Jukes, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Romney, W. Va., also of Emmanuel Church, Keyser, and the church at Morefield, has accepted a call to the Church of the Incarnation. Knoxville, in the Diocese of Pittsburgh, and will take charge early in April.

Rev. A. H. Van Meter, dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, Erie, Pa., who has accepted a call to become rector of Calvary Church, Germantown, will assume charge on Sunday, May 15.

The Rev. Frederick W. Goodman has entered upon his work on the clergy staff of Trinity Parish, New York City, with duty at old Trinity, commencing April 1.

The Rev. J. R. Ellis, for fifteen years missionary in the Blue Ridge Mountains, with headquarters at Yancey, Va., has gone to Pedlar Mills, Amherst

JUST READY

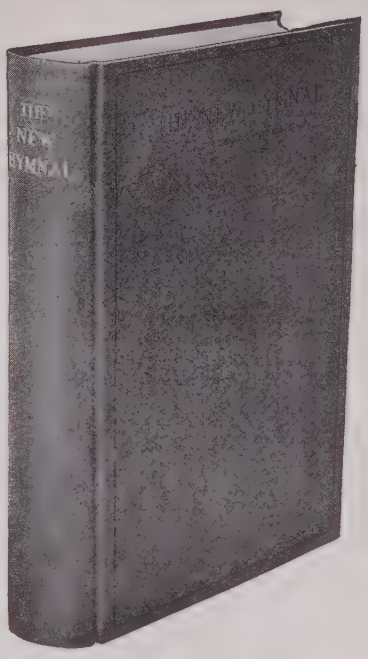
More "FIVE-MINUTE TALKS"

By Walter R. Bowie, D.D.

SUNNY WINDOWS

Author of "The Children's Year"

AND OTHER SERMONS



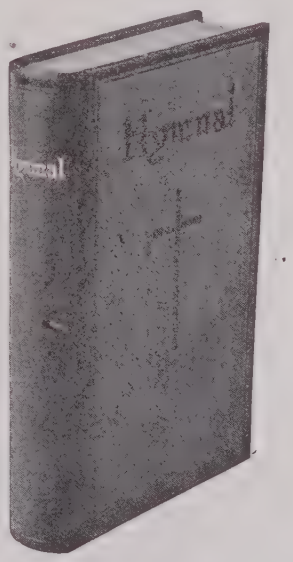
Here is another volume of Dr. Bowie's talks to youngsters, all attractively suited to the child mind. The subjects are arresting themes, calculated to almost invariably catch the attention of boy or girl—while the treatment thereof is simplicity itself.

As the Record of Christian Work said: "Dr. Bowie's talks are capital—straight to the hearts of children, clever, interesting, helpful."

Cloth, $1.25 net

For Sale by

Southern Churchman Co., Richmond, Va.



The New Hymnal

(With Both Words and Music)

Single copies, $1.20 per copy

In lots of 100 or more, $1.05 extended payment; $1.00 cash

Carriage Charges Extra

The New Hymnal

(With Words Only)

Forty Cents a Copy

Published by

The Church Pension Fund

14 Wall St., New York

County, Va., to take up his new work there.

The Rev. W. Winthrop Smith has become assistant minister at the Free Church of St. John, Philadelphia, of which the Rev. Frank Goostray is rector.

The Rev. Joseph Baker, after three years and seven months, has resigned Overwharton Parish, in Stafford County, Va., and retires on the Church pension list. His address is 614 Prince Edward Street, Fredericksburg, Va.

The Rev. Wallace Martin, of St. Paul's, Montrose, Pa., has been called to the charge of the American Church Seamen's Institute at Charleston, S. C.

Miss M. Estelle Daughtry, of Atlanta, Ga., who for a year has been the capable superintendent of St. John's Hostel, Jackson, Wyo., has been compelled to resign and return to her home.

The Rev. A. E. Woodward, rector of Trinity Parish, Van Buren, Ark., has accepted a call to St. Paul's Parish, Palmyra, Mo.

Ordinations.

At the Church of the Redeemer, Morristown, N. J., on March 31, Bishop Lines ordained to the priesthood the Rev. J. Reginald Moodey and the Rev. C. Russell Moodey, twin brothers, presented for ordination by the rector of the parish, the Rev. T. W. Attridge. Bishop Stearly preached the ordination sermon and took a large part of the service. Twenty of the clergy were present, as an Archdeaconry meeting was held in the afternoon for the discussion of the rural work in the western part of the Diocese.

The young men ordained are graduates of Hobart College and the Cambridge Divinity School, their father being one of the wardens in the Church of the Redeemer, in which they grew up. The first named is in charge of St. Mary's Church, Newark, and the second is one of the clergy in Trinity Church, Boston.

The Rev. Mart Gary Smith, A. M., D. B., was ordained to the priesthood Tuesday in Easter Week at Holy Trinity Parish, Memphis, Tenn., by Bishop Beatty. The Rev. B. B. Ramage presented the candidate.

The Bishop-Suffragan of Connecticut advanced to the priesthood the Rev. William Colcord Woods, in the Church of the Epiphany, Durham, on March 4. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Percy M. Binnington, and the candidate was presented by the Rev. W. P. Downes. Dr. Woods, who has been minister in charge of Epiphany Parish, Durham, during the past year, will continue there as priest in charge. In addition he is Associate Professor of Biology in Wesleyan University, Middletown.

Deaths.

The Rev. William B. Gordon, rector-emeritus of Grace Church, Camden, S. C., died recently at his home in Camden, aged eighty-two.

Mr. Gordon was ordained to the priesthood in 1869 by Bishop Atkinson, and held charges in Newbern, N. C., and Kinston, N. C., Norfolk, Va., Accomac C. H., Va., Smyrna, Del., and Edgefield, S. C. From 1887 to 1892 he superintended the work of the Church in Mexico, leaving on account of ill health, and taking charge of the Church at Edgefield, S. C., in 1893. He took charge of Grace Church, Camden, in 1897.

The Rev. Edwin Homer Wellman, a non-parochial priest of the Diocese of Connecticut, died at his home in Madison, Conn., on March 23, after a long illness. Burial services were held in Christ Church, Guilford, Conn., on Saturday afternoon, March 26.

The Rev. J. J. Rowan Spong died suddenly at Ardmore, near Philadelphia, on March 16. He was buried in the church yard of St. James-the-Less, Falls of Schuylkill, on March 19.

The Best of the New Things for Springtime

In the enthusiastic seeking of "lower prices" which seems to have become so general during recent months, there is danger, we think, of overstepping the bounds of true economy and mistaking the cheap and tawdry for the low-in-price.

This is one reason why you will find a visit to this store particularly helpful at this time, in fulfilling your plans for the new season.

No unworthy goods may find a place among the stocks, and we think you may safely rely upon our taste and good judgment in selection.

And while everything here is of the same high, dependable quality that has always been characteristic at MILLER & RHOADS, prices are now materially lower.

To-day the store is gaily decked out in its spring-time dress, splendidly ready to serve your every need, whether for articles of apparel and personal adornment or for the home.

Miller & Rhoads

"The Shopping Center" Richmond, Va.

STAMMERING CAN BE CURED

YOUR MONEY BACK IF NOT SATISFIED

Write for booklet and references

(Anybody can be cured)

SCHOOL FOR STAMMERERS, TYLER, TEXAS.

Rely on Cuticura To Clear Away Skin Troubles

Soap to cleanse, Ointment to soothe, Talcum to powder, 25c. Samples of Cuticura, Dept. V, Malden, Mass.

Stevens Anti-Amebic Dentifrice

For Prevention and Treatment of PYORRHOEA OR RIGG'S DISEASE

Guaranteed to contain 3% fluid extract of Ipecac

Price, 50c per Tube, Postage Paid

Stevens Medical Mfg. Co.

717 Kent Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Service

that rings true is the service that places your interest first.

That is the service you get at

The Union Bank of Richmond

1104 East Main Street

BIG SERVICE FOR 10C

Washington, D. C.—In order to let people, all over the country, see for themselves how valuable the Pathfinder can be to them, the editor of that old-established national weekly offers to send his paper on trial 8 weeks for only 10 cents. The 10c does not begin to pay the cost, but the editor says he is glad to invest in new friends. The Pathfinder has been going for 28 years. One family in every 70 in the entire United States now takes it. Thousands more would take it if they realized what they are missing. The proof of the pudding is in the eating. Only a dime sent to the Pathfinder, 160 Langdon Station, Washington, D. C., will keep your whole family informed, entertained, helped and inspired.

Leake Printing Co.

ENGRAVING, PRINTING, EMBOSSING.

Special attention to out-of-town orders

Samples sent upon request.

615 East Main Street, Richmond, Va

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health and, above all,

Provide yourself with Traveler Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank

Richmond, Virginia

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS

FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG

S. T. Beveridge & Co

Office: 1217 East Cary Street

Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd

Richmond, Va.

HICKORY HILL DAHLIA FARM

QUALITY DAHLIA

Box 227-C, Richmond, Va

Send for a Catalogue

HOT WATER HEAT

For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars

ARCOLA SYSTEM

R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.

9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

Not Merely

a counting house, but a people's bank and a useful servant in this community.

We believe that it is the duty of any company which serves the public to be a builder of good will in its community, and that its success depends upon the efficiency of its service.

3% interest on savings and dormant accounts. Interest figured on daily balances.

Irrespective of its size, we invite your account.

Richmond Trust Company

Capital and Surplus, $1,200,000

Main and 7th Streets

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary
J. M. Leake, General Agent

E. B. Addison, Vice-President
J. C. Watson, Treasurer
Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

(Just Published)

The Gospel of Life

By the Reverend

PHILLIPS STANDISH GILMAN

Author of "The Church and the Individual," etc.

With an Introduction by

THE BISHOP OF EAST CAROLINA

A pithy book for a busy age, with a vital, practical message of divine truth for the attainment of HEALTH, HAPPINESS and HOLINESS.

READ THE FOLLOWING OPINIONS

'I pray that it may bring a fuller appreciation of all that the blessed Christ may mean to those who are willing to accept His promises and follow Him all of the way."—Bishop Darst.

"It is splendid."—Rev. H. B. Wilson, Society of the Nazarene.

"Spiritual, practical and full of the Gospel of Christ."—Rev. Prof S. A. Wallis, D. D., Virginia Theological Seminary.

"Particularly apt and inspiring. The appendix is of tremendous value."—Rev. F. M. Wetherill, St. John's, Philadelphia.

Price, 75 Cents, Postpaid

The Southern Churchman Co.,

Richmond, Va.

Young Men's Christian Association

Grace and Seventh Streets
Richmond, Va.

Information, Reading, Rest, Visitors Welcome

92 ROOMS FOR MEN 92

Hot and Cold Water
Shower Baths

Gymnasium, Swimming Pool, Bowling Alleys, Games, etc.
Gospel Meetings and Bible Study

For information, address
S. K. McKEE, Gen'l Sec'y
P. O. Drawer 1238

Many pens have attempted to write a Life of Christ since Canon Farrar wrote his famous volume. The difficulty with most of them is that they give so much attention to technical details they do not hold the interest of the general reader. For some time there has been need of a book that would make its appeal through its clearness and charm of treatment.
This need has now been filled by

PATERSON-SMYTH'S
NEW BOOK

A PEOPLE'S LIFE OF CHRIST

Told in a way that will be read again and again for the solid enjoyment it affords.

The Churchman says: "A book which the average man will read for the pleasure of reading it—a new and popular version for the day and generation."

ONLY $3.50 NET
THE SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO.
RICHMOND, VA.

Johnson's Foot Soap

(On market for over fifty years)

Made of Borax, Iodine and Bran, is a sure and safe relief for those tired, aching, tender swollen, burning that have been causing you so much pain. 25c, ALL DRUGGISTS. If unobtainable at your druggist, sent direct on receipt of price.

FEET

Thomas Gill Soap Co.
711-719 Kent Ave., Brooklyn, New York

O. Luetke's Art Works

Church Furnishings
IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.
Est. 1886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

Central National Bank

Cor. 3d and Broad Sts., Richmond, Va.
Banking Hours-
Monday to Friday. ...9 A. M. to 2 P. M.
Saturday..... 9 A. M. to 2 P. M.
6 P. M. to 8 P. M.

3% Allowed on Savings Accounts

R. Geissler, Inc.

56 West Eighth Street, New York
Memorials
FOR THE CHURCH
Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

ORGANS

for Church and Home

Send for our beautifully illustrated catalog of the famous Estey, Packard and Corley Organs—showing styles and prices of our great stock.

Easy payment terms can be arranged

The Corley Company
INC.

213 East Broad Street, Richmond, Va.

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson
Security Storage Company, Inc.
Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage
Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

LEARN MUSIC AT HOME

Don't Be a "Wall Flower"

Piano, Organ, Violin, Cornet, Guitar, Banjo, Mandolin, Harp, 'Cello, Trombone, Flute, Clarinet, Piccolo, Saxophone, Ukelele, Sight Singing, Harmony and Composition, Hawaiian Steel Guitar, Tenor Banjo, Drum and Traps.

No longer need the ability to play be shut out of your life. Just mail coupon or postal to-day for our new Free Book. Let us tell you how you can easily, quickly, thoroughly learn to play your favorite musical instrument by note in your own home, without a teacher by our New Improved Home Study Method. Different, easier than private teacher way—no tiresome, dry exercises—no inconvenience, no trick music, no "numbers," yet simple, wonderful, amazingly easy for a mere child.

SPECIAL OFFER

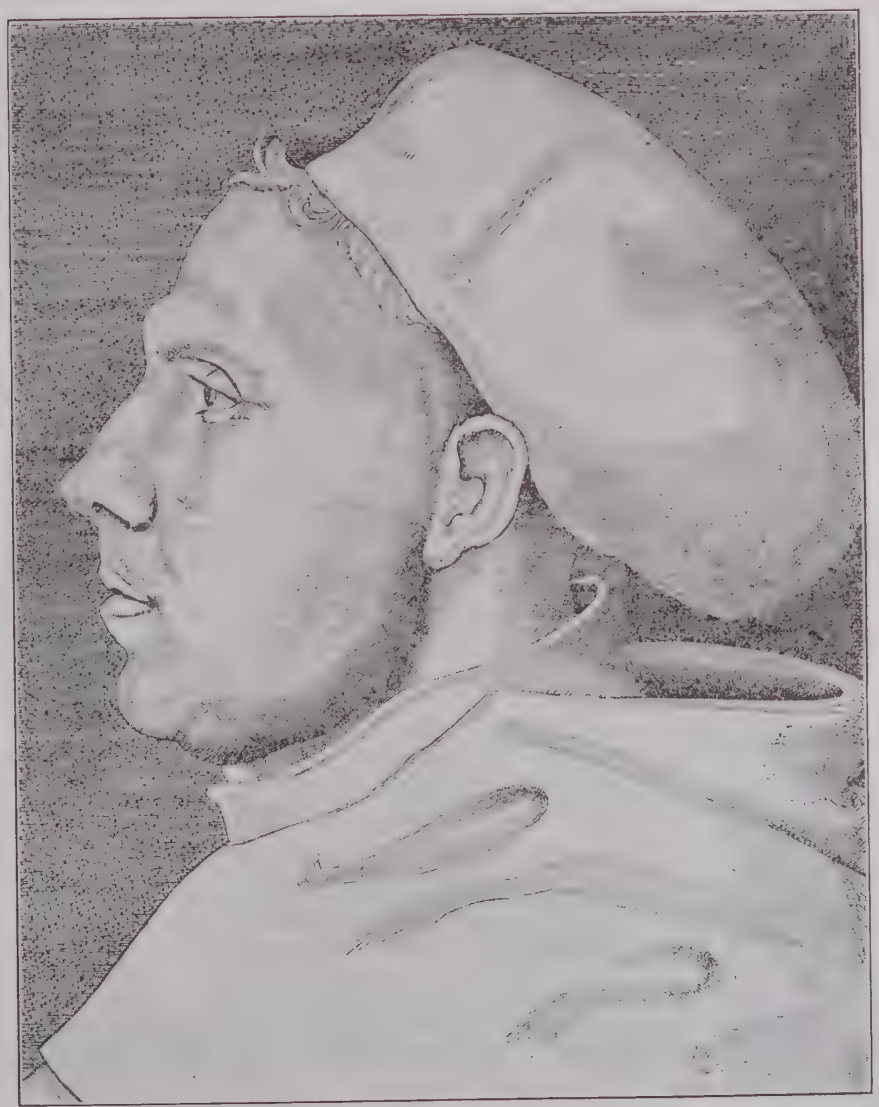
We want to have ONE PUPIL IN EACH LOCALITY AT ONCE to help advertise our wonderful, easy system of teaching music.

We therefore offer our marvelous lessons and charge only for postage and sheet music, Beginners or advanced pupils. Get all the proof, facts, letters from pupils. AMAZING OFFER and fascinating New Book just issued. ALL FREE! Write postal to-day. Instruments supplied when needed, cash or credit.

U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC
374 Brunswick Bldg., New York

U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC,
374 Brunswick Bldg., New York.

Please send me your free book, "Music Lessons in your own home," and particulars of special offer



Name_____
(Please print name)
Address_____
City_____ State_____

Southern Churchman

DOMINUS FRUSTRA ISIN 1835

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., APRIL 16, 1921. No. 16.

The Monk who Defied a Pope and Emperor

MARTIN LUTHER

(From an Engraving by Cranach, in 1521.)

EDUCATIONAL

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

Established A. D. 1823.

The ninety-seventh session will open on Wednesday, September 15th, 1920.

Special Students Admitted

For catalogue or other information, address the dean or Secretary.

Theological Seminary
Alexandria, Va.

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to
REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean
Petersburg, Va.

The Virginian Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY.

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-third year of this School for Boys opens September 15, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to
REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

ST. MARY'S

AN EPISCOPAL SOUTHERN SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

Founded 1842. Four-year preparatory and two-year collegiate courses. Music, Art, Elocution, Domestic Science, Business. Gymnasium. Mild climate makes outdoor life possible the year round. 25-acre campus of old oaks. Fourteen electrically lighted, steam-heated buildings. Moderate rates. Catalog.

REV. WARREN W. WAY, RECTOR
Box 19, ST. MARY'S SCHOOL, RALEIGH, N. C.

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each.

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

God's power to give is only limited by our willingness to receive.

Our place in eternity is to be decided by whom we love.

Life has nothing more beautiful to give than the opportunity of loving service.

Mark the man or woman who seeks and sees something good in everybody; there goes a magnificent soul.

Christ is risen! The things of earth
Lose their power and change their worth
As we soar to things above,
Cloudless light and boundless love.
—A. P. Stanley.

We do well to celebrate the anniversary of our Lord's resurrection by our special Easter services, but it is well enough to remember that there are fifty-two Easters every year.

It is a good, safe rule to sojourn in every place as if you meant to spend your life there, never omitting an opportunity of speaking a true word or making a friend.

He who would be ready for immortality should begin to realize it now by cultivating a comradeship with Jesus that involves telling Him everything and by letting Jesus share with him all that is in Jesus' heart.—J. G. K. McClure.

Virginia, Chatham. Box 13.

The Chatham Episcopal Institute for Girls

Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Thorough preparation for all colleges. New buildings. Ten-acre campus. Athletics. Gymnasium. Terms moderate. Catalogue and views.

B. D. Tucker, D. D., President; Rev. C. O. Pruden, D. D., Rector; Miss Annie Marian Powell, A. B., Sweet Briar, A. M., Columbia, Prin.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,

REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

St. Christopher's School

(Formerly the Chamberlayne School)

A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND VA.

Tenth session begins September 22, 1920 Tuition in boarding department limited to twenty-two boys—$700.

For catalogue, address

Rev. C. G. Chamberlayne, Ph. D., Headmaster

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.

A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. College preparatory. Boarding department 503 W. Franklin Street. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health; out-door life.

MISS ROSALIE H. NOLAND, Principal

ST. ANNE'S SCHOOL

Boarding and Day School for Girls under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. Charlottesville, Virginia. Location healthful and beautiful. General and College Preparatory Courses. Music and Art. Intermediate and Primary. Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Pres.: Rev. W. R. Mason, Rector. Third term begins April 1st. Catalogue sent on request.

(Miss) EMMA YERBY, Principal.
Charlottesville, Va.

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLESTOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

St. Paul's Girls' School

BALTIMORE

A church school where the usual Grammar and High School grades are taught; also classes in Domestic Science. Spacious building; grounds for athletics and outdoor life. Moderate tuition. A few scholarships. Address

MISS MARION MITCHELSON
2411 N. CHARLES ST., BALTIMORE, MD.

National Cathedral School

A Boarding and Day School for Girls. Fireproof buildings in Cathedral Close of 40 acres. College Preparatory. Advanced and Special Courses. Music and Art.

The Bishop of Washington,
President of the Board of Trustees.
Jessie C. McDonald, M. S., Principal.
Mount St. Alban, Washington, D. C.

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., APRIL 16, 1921. No. 16.

WHEN THE GREAT MAN COMES

We devote this issue of the Southern Churchman to the commemoration of one of the supreme events in the progress of the soul of man. Four hundred years ago Martin Luther went on his way to face the gathered powers of his world; and to stand trial for the books that he had written, and the words that he had preached, in his protest against the corruption of the mediaeval Church, and his proclamation of the new liberty of the Christian man. There at Worms, threatened by his enemies, he spoke those unforgettable words—"Here I stand. I can do no otherwise. God help me. Amen."

Sometimes we are tempted to lose hope of the power of the individual as against the crowd. We feel the inevitable drift of circumstances. We see the desire of the single life caught like a swimmer in the unseen yet treacherous undertow of mass forces that prevail against him. We may almost despair of the adequacy of any single effort to achieve things which are different from the crowd opinion of its time. Let the individual conform, we are inclined to say, for if he do not conform he will be conquered.

But today, on this anniversary of Luther's high defiance to all the leagued authority of his time, we hear another message. We hear the message of the power of one life against all the weight of this world's sham importance when that one life has laid hold on truth. We read again, written not in words alone, but in the living witness of an heroic life, the proclamation that one, with God, is a majority.

For the man who faced the emperor was the miner's son. There he stood with no backing of these things which the world instinctively counts powerful. The tremendous inertia of long centuries of false custom was against him. Yet he triumphed. He lifted the beacon of a moral protest against the corruption in God's Church which shall never die He gave new hope and power to the hearts of half the world. The power of his soul's faith said unto old mountains of iniquities, "Be thou removed and cast into the sea." And they obeyed him.

Let the assurance of that fact sink deep into our minds and hearts. We live within a world of different needs and different problems from those in the time of Luther. But it is by a power like his that they must be solved. Faint hearts among us are tempted to capitulate before the formidableness of the things that must be overcome. Here is the long tradition of hate and war. Here is the selfish greed of national policy. Here are all the awful difficulties that seem to block the hope of a world made over according to the ideals of Jesus. But let us look back to that great, valiant figure, who, by the power of God within him, wrought the spiritual miracles of his day. Let us confess again that when the great man, and the great idea, made human barriers go down, the roads which men called impassable became straight ways before his feet. Let us kindle our trust anew in the living forces. Let us believe that if we can raise up leaders great enough, and light in our hearts a faith that is high enough, we also, in this great, solemn time, shall yet accomplish all that our holiest impulses teach us we must do.

A mighty Fortress is our God,
A Bulwark never failing;
Our Helper He amid the flood
Of mortal ills prevailing:
For still our ancient foe
Doth seek to work us woe;
His craft and power are great,
And armed with cruel hate,
On earth is not his equal.

Did we in our own strength confide,
Our striving would be losing;
Were not the right man on our side,
The man of God's own choosing:
Dost ask who that may be?
Christ Jesus, it is He;
Lord Sabaoth His Name,
From age to age the same,
And He must win the battle.

And though this world, with devils filled,
Should threaten to undo us;
We will not fear, for God hath willed
His truth to triumph through us:
The prince of darkness grim,
We tremble not for him;
His rage we can endure,
For lo! his doom is sure,
One little word shall fell him.

That word above all earthly powers,
No thanks to them, abideth;
The Spirit and the gifts are ours
Through Him who with us sideth:
Let goods and kindred go,
This mortal life also;
The body they may kill:
God's truth abideth still.
His kingdom is for ever.

—M. Luther, Tr. F. H. Hedge.

If we should ask for the secret of Luther's strength, well might we find the answer in these words of his from the tract, "On Christian Liberty."

"Now, preaching ought to have the object of promoting faith in Him, so that He may not only be Christ, but a Christ for you and for me, and that what was said of Him, and what He is called, may work in us. * * * Who can injure such a heart, or make it afraid? If the consciousness of sin or the horror of death rush in upon it, it is prepared to hope in the Lord, and is fearless of such evils, and undisturbed, until it shall look down upon its enemies. * * * It learns, too, with the apostle, to scoff at death and sin, and to say, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." For death is swallowed up in victory, not only the victory of Christ, but ours also, since by faith it becomes ours, and in it we, too, conquer."

THE LIFE OF LUTHER

And His Appearance Before the Emperor, Charles the Fifth

Four hundred years ago there was framed against the background of Germany of the Renaissance one of the supreme scenes of all religious history. On April 16, 1521, Martin Luther entered into the imperial city of Worms to face in his trial the Emperor Charles the Fifth, and the assembled powers of the Holy Roman Empire and the mediaeval Church. There in that clash of forces between the new and the old Martin Luther's life reached its boldest climax; and the doors swung open into a new era of spiritual liberty for the world.

Martin Luther was born the son of a miner, in the little Thuringian town of Eisleben, on the 10th of November, 1843. Under circumstances of not a little hardship and toil, the boy grew up, but as he looked back upon those years he was not sorry that he had come out of the ranks of the common people and the common life. "I am a peasant's son," he said. "My father and my grandfather and my great-grandfather were genuine peasants." And in the sweeping impetuous fashion which was characteristic of him, he went on. "Rich folks' children seldom turn out well. They are complacent, arrogant and conceited, and think they need to learn nothing because they have enough to live on anyway. On the contrary, poor men's sons must labor to lift themselves out of the dust, and must endure greatly. And because they have nothing to boast about or pride themselves upon, they trust God, control themselves and keep still."

Luther Before Charles V—1521.

But the industry of Hans Luther, the father, so far enabled the family to prosper that the boy Martin was enabled to go off to school at Magdeburg, and later to Eisenach. At Eisenach he came into touch with a new humanistic spirit and methods of learning which had been spread through Europe by the influence of the Renaissance. When he was seventeen years of age he was ready to enter the university at Erfurt, the greatest of the universities in the Germany of his day. In its stimulating atmosphere he went forward eagerly in his study of Latin, of theology and logic, which were the subjects that dominated the curriculum of the time. When he was less than nineteen years old he took his Bachelor's Degree, and, according to the desire of his father, began to study law.

Yet, at the very hour when he seemed to stand upon the threshold of worldly advantage, to the amazement of his friends, and the indignation of his father, Martin Luther suddenly broke away from the entire circle of his interests and associations, and entered the Augustinian convent, at Erfurt, as a monk.

The decision itself came with a volcanic suddenness which was always characteristic of his nature. Yet beneath it, of course, there must have been trains of causes which had been working silently. Martin Luther had deep emotions, and a sensitive imagination which he had inherited from his mother. Religion had always been very real to him. What happened was that the half-articulate religious impulses which long had been stirring in his heart through some exciting causes which our information perhaps is not full enough adequately now to trace, surged into the possession of his thought and will. And when his will was committed to a decision, he followed unreservedly in the path toward which it pointed.

In the monastery he gave himself to the ascetic practices of his new life with heroic thoroughness. His deeds of self-mortification, his fastings, his self-imposed penances, were such as to make him an example pointed out and spoken of throughout the whole Augustinian order. "If ever a monk gained heaven by his monkery," he said, "I must have done so. All the brethren who knew me can bear witness, for I would have martyred myself if I had kept it up much longer, with watching, praying, reading and other labors." During the years in the monastery he was in great spiritual ferment, and often distress. He felt himself burdened by a haunting sense of sin. He tried to win peace with God by his own self-inflicted punishment, but the method failed him. He seemed to move as under the shadow of God's wrath. He felt himself caught, as it were, in the coils of the world and the doom of the world, and by no effort of his own could he get free.

The gateway of relief for Luther from his own inner torment, and also the open road to the mighty achievement to which his life was destined, came through the action of the wise and kindly Staupitz, the Vicar-General of the Augustinian order, who took Luther out of the convent at Erfurt, where his own intense and imaginative nature was turned in upon itself, and put him at the University of Wittenberg, where his energies could breathe a wider and more normal air. This university, though it had been founded as late as 1502, had already grown to amazing rank through the prestige of the faculty which the Elector Frederick of Saxony had summoned to it. There Luther was brought, in 1508, to teach logic and ethics. But his studies included also the Church fathers and the Bible.

Back again at Wittenberg, Luther assumed his place in the faculty. Through the next five years his rise was rapid. In 1512 he was made a Doctor of Theology by the university, and as a preacher he won recognition, not only in Wittenberg, but through all the Augustinian order. He had the deep fires of emotion and fervor, the kindling, swift imagination, which are the great gifts of those who would sway men's hearts, and besides this, he had an extraordinary sympathy and understanding with human nature, and a marvelous gift of simple, vivid language, which made great truths plain to the appreciation of plain men. In 1515 he was appointed District-Vicar of the Augustinian order, which involved the oversight of eleven monasteries, and brought him into intimate touch with the life and affairs of a far larger circle than that at Wittenberg. Meanwhile, as a teacher he was growing steadily in originality and power. His studies centered particularly on the Bible. He gradually conceived a distaste which grew presently into an outcpoken aversion for the scholastic philosophy which had been the central subject in the universities of his time. He learned Greek and Hebrew so that he might study the Bible in its original tongues. He was determined to get back to the source, in order that he might know exactly what the Scriptures said and meant. And not with his mind only, but also with his heart, he was studying. Gradually there was dawning for him a new spiritual conviction and a transforming experience. He was laying hold through his reading of the New Testament, and particularly the epistles of St. Paul, of the saving grace of God in Jesus Christ. He was beginning to understand that spiritual peace can never be won, as he had thought, in the monastery at Erfurt, by one's own mortifications and acts of penalties. It must come through the surrender of the life to the influence of the Saviour through whom the undeserved grace of God is mediated to those who open their hearts to receive it

The Cathedral at Worms, Which Was Standing in Luther's Time.

Up to this time Luther's life had moved within the ordered and regular channels of the Church. It was true that the originality of his teaching had stirred the jealous resentment of the upholders of traditional methods. The faculty of his old universisty at Erfurt, particularly, were irritated by the way in which in his teaching he had slighted the philosophy that he had learned there. There were others who did not like his unconventional and colloquial language in the class-room, but, nevertheless, he was recognized as a figure in thoroughly good standing with the authorities of his order, and one devoted with his whole life's energies to the service of the Church.

As we think of the Protestant Reformation, and the great conflict which it precipitated, the first instinct perhaps is to consider it as a matter of creeds and doctrines over which the theologians fought. But its beginning in the work of Luther involved at first no conscious clash of creed nor doctrine whatsoever. It was a vital and important matter that had to do with conduct. It was a moral protest against what Luther saw to be corruption against the Church, and which he honestly believed at first that the authorities at Rome would be as eager as he to see corrected.

In 1517 the young Archbishop of Mayence made an arrangement with the pope by which he was to sell in Germany certain indulgences which Rome had determined to offer as a means of paying for the great Cathedral of St. Peter, then in course of building. For centuries it had been a part of catholic theology that sins committed after baptism must be atoned for by repentance and confession to a priest, and after the priest's absolution of the sinner from his guilt, the performance of some act of self-mortification in order that the pains of purgatory might be remitted. In the mediaeval Church there grew a custom of allowing these acts of discipline to be remitted for a sum of money paid in for the Church's use. This arrangement constituted the indulgences, and it was indulgences such as these that the Archbishop of Mayence contracted to sell through Germany. A Dominican monk, by name John Tetzel, was put in charge of the vending of these indulgences, and an elaborate campaign was planned by which all the fear and superstition and the emotional piety of the people throughout Germany might be roused to make the sale of indulgences a heavy one. The manner in which Tetzel went about his business roused the moral indignation of Luther to its utmost. The whole traffic was almost incredibly sordid. The whole right moral emphasis upon the need of contrition of the heart for real remission of sin was perverted by Tetzel to his ends of promoting a revenue from his sales. The power of indulgence became in his teaching a sheer act of magic. If men would not buy the indulgences they would be damned, and their parents and friends in purgatory would remain in the damnation which was theirs already. And if, on the other hand, the proper amount were put in the box he set up in the churches where he preached, then a man might be assured he had his certificate of forgiveness, and the souls of his friends flew out of purgatory at the chink of the coin which they had paid. In a letter, written afterwards, Luther declared that Tetzel said, "The red cross of indulgence, with the pope's arms, when set up in the church, was as powerful as the cross of Christ; that in heaven he would not change places with St. Peter himself, for he had saved more souls with indulgences than the apostle with his preaching."

With all the sincerity of his moral nature, with all the fervent truth of his religious indignation, Luther reacted in horror from this obvious blasphemy of real religion. He did all that he could to prevent his own people of Wittenberg falling under Tetzel's influence. But this was not enough. He desired to find some method by which a protest that should be powerful enough to be widely effective should be launched against Tetzel and the whole system for which he stood.

For this purpose, therefore, he posted in 1517 on the doors of the castle church at Wittenberg ninety-five theses which he proposed to defend. It was an anniversary of the founding of the Church, and it was customary to celebrate such anniversaries by academic debates. Luther seized this opportunity, therefore, to bring into open discussion, if he might, the evil he wished to destroy. He wsihed to have Tetzel condemned with the weight of the university's influence.

But the position which Luther set himself in his theses to present went deeper than a mere condemnation of Tetzel's methods. Unconsciously, and wholly without a realization at the moment of the magnitude of the issue he was provoking, he struck at the root of deep-seated principles in the Church upon which the sale of indulgences really rested. In his thirty-sixth and thirty-seventh theses he said: "Every Christian who feels true compunction has of right plenary remission of punishment and guilt without sales of indulgences; and every true Christian, whether living or dead, has a share of Christ and all His benefits to the Church, given him by God, even without such sale." Here was the beginning of an assault against the whole penitential system of the Catholic Church. Here was the thin point of the wedge which was to split asunder presently the whole weight of superstition and priestly dominance by which the conscience of Christendom had been crushed out of self-reliance and self-expression. Here was a banner unfurled, round which every influence for human liberty and the spiritual democracy of all souls before the face of God should rally in the coming days.

Pope Leo X (From His Portrait by Raphael.)

The consequence of Luther's act did not immediately develop. He himself, as we have already hinted, was quite unaware as yet of what a fire his words would kindle. He assumed, as a matter of course, that the high authorities, when the facts were brought to their attention, would support his protest. "If indulgence were preached according to the spirit and mind of the pope," he said, "all the questions raised about that would be resolved with ease—nay; would not exist." And as Luther did not anticipate then the opposition which was to develop, neither did he anticipate the extraordinary response which his theses waked among the German people. He had thought he was launching an academic debate. Instead of that, his theses, printed in pamphlet form, were circulated everywhere, and a vast wave of enthusiasm rose to greet them. Long smouldering resentments against the exactments and extortions of the papal government leaped into expression. Men felt that here was a leader who had dared to speak the things which many had been believing. Here was a champion who dared take up the gage of obvious evils, and the blood tingled in the veins of thousands because they scented a combat that should be worth while.

In Rome, the pope, the easy-going and worldly Leo X, was disposed to brush the whole affair aside contemptuously. "A drunken German wrote them," he said when he heard of the theses. "When he is sober, he will think differently." But the minds of the Roman curia became more serious when they found that Luther's influence was wrecking the financial prospect of the indulgence sale. Tetzel's business fell off conspicuously. It was obvious that something needed to be done.

The Archbishop of Mayence first took up the cudgels and threatened Luther with condemnation for heresy if he did not retract his words. Luther ignored it, and the Archbishop, disgusted, referred the matter back to Rome. Then Tetzel issued a pamphlet defending the indulgences, and the pope's infallible right to proclaim them. The students of Wittenberg burned Tetzel's theses publicly, though Luther himself had nothing to do with the act. At the next convention of the Augustinian order, which was held at Heidelberg, Luther was greatly stirred and strengthened to find how many of the monks, especially the younger ones, rallied to him as to a leader in the combat that needed to be undertaken. Meanwhile, however, his enemies were becoming more aggressive. The Dominicans, the traditional rivals of the Augustinian order, were trying to press the pope into action. Sylvester Prierias, master of the papal palace, was called upon to prepare a reply to Luther's theses, which he did, and it was a bitter and abusive document. Luther answered him directly, but what was more important, he published what was a commentary upon the theses, which was circulated among the German people. Expecting excommunication, he preached a sermon in Wittenberg in which he maintained the position that so long as one kept his Christian loyalty he could not be really hurt, even though he were excluded from the official Church. Here was another long step forward on the road of his divergence from Roman Catholic orthodoxy as the pope wished it to be understood. Luther was beginning to feel the grave perils of his position. To the much beloved Staupitz he wrote, "Everywhere I am caged about with thorns, but Christ lives and reigns yesterday and today and every day." And then the warrior spirit flamed out in him in this very exultant and human sentence—"Pray for me that in this time of temptation I be not too joyful and too confident."

In 1520 there appeared from his pen two pamphlets, which were epoch-making in his career. One was his address to the German nobility, in which he appealed to the princes of Germany to put an end to the corruption of the Church and restrain the unlimited authority of the papacy. He struck also in this appeal against the mendicant order, against clerical celibacy, and the whole superstitious influence of the clergy over the people. A few weeks later appeared his "Babylonian Captivity of the Church." In this he set against the sacramental system of Rome his new belief in the right of the lowest human heart to an approach to God that should be immediate and direct, and for which the instrumentalities of the Church were aids, but not slavish necessities. In this he had dared, and reached his final break with Rome. Before the year was over he had been excommunicated. The law of Church and State required that he be delivered up to papal power, and executed as a heretic. Yet the love of the people had been roused so powerfully behind him that the Roman authorities knew that they must work circumspectly if they were to be able to apprehend it.

They pressed their attack through the new Emperor, Charles V. By him Luther was summoned to the first imperial Diet of his reign, which met in the city of Worms in January, 1521.

To Worms, therefore, Luther went to face the crucial test of his career. To a friend he wrote: "If they use force, as is probable, my cause shall be committed to the Lord; for He lives and reigns who preserved the three children in the furnace of the Babylonian king. If He is unwilling to preserve me, my life is a small thing compared with Christ's, Who was wickedly slain to the disgrace of all and the harm of many. Expect anything of me except flight or recantation. I will not flee, much less recant. So may the Lord Jesus strengthen me." He had need of strength. It was true the great multitude of the common people were on his side, but the great authorities of the Church and State were against him. In the Diet which met in the Bishop's palace at Worms, he stood alone, a poor monk, to confront Charles V, the Emperor who ruled in his own right Spain and Austria, Burgundy and the Netherlands, and by the election of the princes of Germany, had been made sovereign of the German people also. He confronted Alexander the legate of the pope, who represented the august majesty of the Church, which in past centuries had throned and unthroned kings, and by its dread power of excommunication and interdict, held enthralled the souls of man, not only in this world, but in the next. He faced a company of princes, noblemen, ecclesiasts, ambassadors from foreign nations, all curious to see this monk who had filled the world with his disturbance—some friendly, perhaps, but most of them cynical or hostile. He was led to a table on which were a pile of his own books. He was asked to say whether or not they were his, and, if so, whether he would recant what was written there. He refused. Unless he were convinced by the clear testimony of the Scriptures, he said, he could not change what he had written and preached. The Emperor abruptly closed the session. Luther went back to his friends, and, as one of them testified afterwards, cried out with joy—"I am through. I am through." He was put under the ban now of an edict of condemnation. His books were ordered to be burned. He was an outlaw whose life was forfeited.

Of the fortunes of the rest of Luther's life there is not space to tell the story. By the effective defense of his friends, and by the tangled political events in Germany, he was saved from the condemnation pronounced against him at Worms, and until 1546 he lived and carried on the work that resulted in the definite organizing of the Protestant spirit into new ecclesiastical forms. But over all the subsequent events towers still in significance the mighty act of the drama that was played in Worms. For there was vindicated, not for that one moment, but for all the course of Luther's life, the words which a famous warrior said to him as he passed on his way into the hall of trial: "Thou art on thy way to make such a stand as I and many of my knights have never done in our toughest battles. If thou art sure of the justice of thy cause, then forward in the name of God, and be of good courage—God will not forsake thee."

W. R. B.

"He that hateth his life shall keep it." He that would be saved must be ready to give up life itself, if necessary, in order to obtain salvation. He must bury his love of the world, with its riches, honors, pleasures and rewards, with a full belief that in so doing he will reap a better harvest, both here and hereafter. He that loves the life that now is so much that he cannot deny himself anything for the sake of his soul, will find at length that he has lost everything. He, on the contrary, who is ready to cast away everything most dear to him in this life, if it stands in the way of his soul, and to crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts, will find at length that he is no loser. In a word his losses will prove nothing in comparison with his gains.—Bishop Ryle.

Not religion only, but human nature itself, demands the setting apart of sacred places, and of places appointed for special uses and services. Reverence of manner, devotion of heart and voice, sacredness of place, God commands and man demands, if the best within us is to be fed and nourished, and the noblest part of us is to survive and grow. The gifts and graces ministered by churches, erected, consecrated, used, subserve the glory of God and the good of men. They help man to discharge duty, for man's moral task in this world is summed up not in "the survival of the fittest," but in the effort to fit as many as possible to survive. And if gifts and graces center themselves in the church building as a storehouse, ready to be contributed and distributed as helps and blessings to brother men, we that are within may well join in the glad and grateful cry, "Master, it is good for us to be here."—Bishop Tuttle.

THE MESSAGE OF LUTHER TO CHRISTIANITY TODAY

By the Rev. W. Russell Bowie, D. D.

What is the message, unchanged by changing years, which speaks to the Christian consciousness of the twentieth century from the great prophet and reformer who four centuries ago opened the doors of spiritual freedom?

1. First of all, and most fundamentally, there comes to us from Martin Luther the old, yet often forgotten, truth—that religion ought to be a new experience to every man. This does not mean, of course, that each man invents his own religion. He does not experience unprecedented things; but the ancient, proven things he must experience in a new, fresh way that is his own.

The Church of Martin Luther's time was crushed with the weight of its own traditions. It was swathed like a corpse in the grave-clothes of its lifeless dogmas, and its mechanical and perfunctory forms. Scholars studied the schoolmen of the middle ages and their obscure philosophy. Very far away, and all but forgotten were the first simple days of the Christian faith. The common man knew little of the Bible, and indeed in that age when printing still was young, had small chance of access to it. Religion to him meant the masses which the priest recited in his monotonous Latin—a superstitious bowing down to relics, a going on pilgrimages to some famous shrine by virtue of which it was supposed that sins were to be forgiven. The authority of the Church discouraged questioning. Men were to take what the Church taught, and be content to listen and obey. The living water of the grace of God was passed on through many lands, and when at last it came to the common man, it was flat and stale.

What Luther did was to go back to the Fountainhead. He had in his own soul a restlessness which made him discontent with the utmost that the ecclesiasticism of his time could give him. He could not reach satisfaction in the monastery, desperately though he tried. He found the schoolmen and philosophers like so many dried-up desert pools to his fierce thirst for spiritual reality. He kept pressing back and back beyond the dull patter of men who droned their second-hand repetitions, to find the truth which the living heart might know and prove. It was for this reason he became so deep and devoted a student of the Bible. He read the Bible with a kindling imagination. In his search he came, with the thrilling wonder of a personal discovery, upon the thing he sought. He reached his own conviction of the grace of God, as revealed in Jesus Christ. He found the living gospel message that welled up for him with peace and certainty and power. He discovered afresh that which for many of his time was only a dim and dull report. Henceforth, the authority of his own spiritual experience was more incontrovertible for him than anything that a thousand functionaries—whether cardinal, priest or king—could either affirm or deny.

When a man has thus attained conviction for himself, and set his feet upon a rock, there comes to him such courage and independence of judgment as in no otherwise can be attained. He is no longer solitary. When he stands upon the basis of the things that he has learned from immediate communion with God, he may dare to range himself with God against his world. He can be bold against the assaults of foes. He can be firm—and this is harder—against the doubts of friends. It was so with Luther. When he first attacked the indulgences, the prior and sub-prior of his order, troubled by the cry of heresy, expostulated with him lest he bring reproach against the convent. He answered, "Dear fathers, if it be not begun in God's name, it will soon come to naught; but if it be, let Him look after it." And again, in one of his letters, he wrote: "This affair will not have an end if it be of God until all my friends desert me, and truth be left alone, which will save itself by its own power, and not by mine, nor thine, nor any man's." A man of this spirit can be, as Luther was, very humble as to his personal demerits, yet inflexible when he stands for that which was larger than himself. At his back he feels the presence of the eternal certainties, mighty as hosts of angels.

And is it not true that in every time, in ours as well as others, men need to listen to the superb challenge which confronts us here in Luther's life? It is so easy oftentimes to take religion as a second-hand thing. The power and might of it evaporate into formulas. Men hand down traditions of what the Church used to be in ages gone, and imagine that in the new times, with new and urgent needs, there is nothing new for them to learn and to achieve. It is a frequent thing for men to think, as the prior of the Augustinian convent thought when Luther assailed the indulgences, that it is an unfortunate thing for the Church to be drawn into unpleasant controversy. They would rather keep to the old compromising ways. They would rather have peace than the perilous great adventure. And the reason is because the flame of religious impulse is dead within them. They have caught only the empty torch, the ritual, the comfortable practice, the safe and decorous behavior. What we need in every time is men and women who dare to be sincere with all the splendid urgency of their heart's best impulses after first-hand truth. We need those who go back continually to be rekindled at the fire of the purposes of Jesus, and let that fire flame anew into light and power for the actual problems of their present world. When this is true, then the Church has within it a force that nothing can stop. It has the courage that does not fear opposition; the serenity that burns, like the strong upsurging of the dawn, through the fogs of doubt and hesitation; the eager will that knows itself to be at one with God, and will not stop for all the obstacles which this world may interpose.

2. We pass on to note a second point in that message which comes from Luther—that the religion which for him had its springs in reality applied itself to the moral regeneration of its world. It created in the man who possessed it a sense of responsibility which he could not shirk.

Consider the relationship of Luther to the sale of indulgences, and toward all the shaming corruption of the Church of which this sale was the expression. What had Luther to do with it more than others? He had never been asked his opinion about it. He was not responsible for the fact of it He could well have sheltered his conscience behind the deference he thought he owed to those in authority The weight of the whole Church was behind this practice which he disapproved of. A pope had launched it, cardinals and archbishops favored it. What was he—a poor monk in his obscure place—that he should seek to set his world to rights?

Those were the questions the ordinary man would have asked of himself—questions to which the answer seems so obvious that he may go on his way in dull and docile silence. But not so the great souls in which the terrible truths of God have been set alight. They do not ask what others have done or failed to do. Singly and alone they stand before the face of God, and to Him individually they give answer. Where anything defies His righteousness, however little the world may think they have to do with it, they must gird themselves for action. Wherever weakness flaunts itself, there they must hurl their soul's defiance, let who will be silent. By souls like these the conscience of the world is kept from sinking into deadness. By them the popular opinion that herds so often in its low and common place is led perforce upon the heights.

The inertia of custom is a tremendous and all but paralyzing thing. The Church, which is supposed to be the organized force for righteousness, is always in danger of condoning that which is evil simply because it finds plausible reason to suggest that the evil is some one else's fault. But God's moral leadership in this world requires the resurgence in every time of a spirit like that of the valiant monk of Wittenberg. There is need of those who seek the good war which others may avoid. There is need of the clear vision which can see through the sophistries that many are deceived by, and of the swift strength to strike when the swords of many rest unused within their scabbards.

3. A third thing our time may learn from Luther is the sacredness which religion, rightly interpreted, can give to every common aspect of human life.

The emphasis of mediaeval Catholicism had been the reverse of this. It tended to make men believe that all the ordinary course of living was at best only a half-worthy concession to the weaknesses of the flesh. The real religious life was that which should be lived in the monastery and in the convent. The greatest saint was he who mortified himself most, who scourged his body with self-chastisement, who withdrew from men altogether, that in fastings and prayers he might give himself wholly to God. We find that thought characteristic of Roman Catholicism even to this day. In the Roman Catholic vocabulary, the very word "religious" is turned into a name to mean those who are set apart in ascetic orders. Monks and nuns—these are "the religious." In Luther's day, of course, this conception was stronger still. He himself shared it in his early days. There in the monastery at Erfurt, he tried to win his peace with God by his own extreme asceticism. Life with men to him seemed one thing: life with God, and for God, a wholly different thing.

But the truth which came to Luther, and which shines like a great light through all the Protestant Reformation, is the truth that all life can be made holy. The difference between the secular and the sacred is not a distinction between inflexible spheres of life. Rather, it is a distinction in spirit. The so-called sacred can become secular when the love of God is lost from it, and degenerate into something than which nothing else in this world can be more common and unclean. The secular can be made sacred when the common life and the common day is lived in the light of the thought of God. "What you do in your house," said Luther, "is worth as much as if you did it up in heaven for our Lord God. For what we do in our calling here on earth, in accordance with His word and command, He counts as if it were done in heaven for Him."

This gospel of Luther brought to human life a leaven of the working of which no man can trace the limits. It brought a new sense of self-respect to the common man. Previously he had been taught to think of his religion as a sort of second-rate compromising thing. He could never be really great in the eyes of God as long as he kept his place among the common occupations of his world. But Luther taught him differently. However humble his occupation, he could be as near to God as any monk or nun within the cloisters. Religion was henceforth no delimited thing. It was applicable in its full meaning and in its full beauty everywhere.

Wherever Protestantism went, and has ever gone, this truth has brought its transfiguring touch. One may look, for example, at the art of Europe after the Reformation, and see the effect of it, as, for example, in the great, rich galleries in Holland, filled with the paintings of the Dutch masters who lived when the spirit of the new and human influence of Protestantism had entered into Holland. A century before the only things which men painted were madonnas and legendary saints. Now men turned to paint the human life of their own day—the shop, the street, the fair, the fish market—the whole range of the work and toil of the familiar day. Here was something deeper than a mere accident of art. Here was a new conception working. It was a sense of the worthwhileness, both in the eyes of man and God, of that which the great multitude of God's people are busied about from morn till night of the simple every day.

One watches this new consciousness of the dignity of human life entering also into the social and political structure. The democratic movements of modern times have been the workings of that yeast which the sturdy message of Luther planted. When all men come to feel themselves as of worth in the sight of God, tyranny, and autocracy, and selfish, brutal privilege are doomed. Then the force is generated which will not stop until all humanity has begun to realize the rightful fulness of its life.

As this gospel of the sacredness of every human life dignified each man in his own living, so also it quickened the sense of responsibility in each man for his neighbor. The peril of the mediaeval theology, and of all asceticism, is that it may make the worship of God such an absorbed thing that it may become at last a sentimental selfishness, blindly indifferent to the needs of one's neighbors. Because of the greatness of the mercy and love of God that had come to him, Luther taught that every man owed immeasurably much to every other whom he could help. He must learn the truth of the Christ's parable of the judgment, that he who ministers unto one of the least of these, His brethren, ministers unto Him. To every Christian, in the privilege of his touch with God, Luther said, "Though he is thus free from all works, yet he ought again to empty himself of this liberty, take on himself the form of a servant, be found in fashion like a man, serve, help, and in every way act toward his neighbor, as he sees that God, through Christ, has acted, and is acting toward him."

Is it not good to remember this brave and hopeful message in our life today? All that we do, or need to do, may be made well-pleasing unto God.

> "Who sweeps a room as by God's laws > Makes that and the action fine."

The woman in her housekeeping, the maid going about her daily routine, the contractor who fulfils his promise to the utmost of his capacity for good work, the man who hammers the nail and solders the pipe, and lays a foundation, and gives his honest strength to do it well, serves God as truly as any cloistered saint who spent his life at vigils. And he who helps his neighbor in distress, he who goes out of his way to do a kindly simple deed, he who, out of his none too great plenty, gives to him who has less, is by that act beautiful in the sight of the Father Who loves us all.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

SUNDAY SCHOOL CURRICULUM.

Mr. Editor: At the recent Synod of the Province of Washington held at Norfolk, some good resolutions were adopted at the request of the Provincial Board of Education. There is reason to point out, however, that "uniformity of lesson material" can be had without resorting to the Christian Nurture Series. To say that "the Christian Nurture Series seems to offer at this time the only possible basis for uniformity" is to ignore the work that has been done for years by the Joint Diocesan Sunday School Lesson Board. And there are other series that not only seem to, but actually do, offer a basis for uniformity. As the Churchman told us some weeks ago, there is a question whether we want uniformity of teaching in our Sunday schools. And certainly there is room in this great Church for more than one series of Sunday school lessons. One of the "recommendations of the Executive Secretary" adopted by the Provincial Board has a portion which reads as follows: "The Board recommends to the churches of the province the use of our recognized material, that they may thus assist the Department of Religious Education to perfect her Church School Standards. Especially does this apply to the Standard Curriculum. The Christian Nurture Series, as a standard curriculum, is the first essential in the development of Church School Standards."

I merely wish to call attention to the non sequitur in the words quoted. The Christian Nurture Series cannot be called the Standard Curriculum; it is but a series of lessons prepared according to the outline of the Standard Curriculum. The Joint Diocesan Lesson Board has been just as careful to follow the directions of the Standard Curriculum as has been the Department of Religious Education. So it is saying too much to say that the Christian Nurture Series is the Standard Curriculum.

A. E. CLATTENBURG.

St. Peter's Church Rectory, Hazleton, Pa.

TO SAVE OMITTED HYMNS.

Mr. Editor: Will you allow me, through the columns of your valued paper, to suggest "a way out" from the tangled Hymnal situation, for the benefit of others, as well as myself?

No one is more grateful than I for the addition of new hymns to our worship; and in this let me express my deepest gratitude to the "New Hymnal." But what I cannot understand seems to be the passionate fury with which its promoters seem determined to cut out of our worship most of the hymns expressing the devotional sentiment, which I, for one, feel most helpful to my congregations, and desired by them. To my regret, therefore, I have had to wait for some solution that would give me the new additions, without depriving us of the hymns we love and use.

Dr. Hutchins saw this point, and issued his Revised Hymnal, and saved many valuable hymns, but left out nineteen, among which are some we most use: 677, 80, 9, 569, 351, 482, 589, 237, 218, 177,, 278, 84, 272, 594, 409, 528, 595, 592 and 69. For the lack of these, I have not wanted to order even his Revised Hymnal.

Now my suggestion to some publisher is to issue the words of these nineteen hymns in a small pamphlet of the size of the words only hymnals so that they could easily be pasted in, at a price so small that it would be easy to buy them in quantities.

If, however, no publisher is willing to undertake this rational solution of our difficulties, I will, for my own use, have them printed, and will be willing to help others who may wish such a solution for their own churches. They could probably be supplied at two dollars a hundred.

As to the tunes, there are sufficient tunes of the same metre in either Hymnal to make it possible to use the words without additional music being printed.

If any brother clergyman would communicate with me, it may be possible to accomplish something which would help everybody.

KENNETH SYLVAN GUTHRIE.

All Saints' Church, 292 Henry St., New York, April 3, 1921.

The understanding has its joys no less than the heart, and a keen sense of intellectual joy is experienced when we perceive the truth, or any part of it, resting on a secure basis. A man is happy when he has attained to know the causes of things. The chemist, the historian, the mathematician, the anatomist, are examples. Christ's resurrection is such a fact to the Christian. It is the foundation on which the Christian creed rests. This was the reason it had such a prominent place in apostolic preaching.—Canon Liddon.

Church Intelligence

Consecration of the Rev. Dr. Manning.

The Presiding Bishop has taken order for the ordination and consecration of the Rev. William Thomas Manning, D. D., Bishop-elect of the Diocese of New York, as follows:

Time: 10:30 A. M., Wednesday, May 11, 1921.

Place: Cathedral of St. John the Divine.

Consecrators: The Presiding Bishop, the Bishop of Southern Ohio, the Bishop of Massachusetts.

Preacher: The Bishop of Tennessee.

Presenters: The Bishop of Vermont, the Bishop of Pennsylvania.

Attending Presbyters: The Rev. Dr. W. W. Bellinger, the Rev. Dr. M. H. Gates.

Registrar: The Rev. Dr. G. F. Nelson.

Master of Ceremonies: The Rev. Canon Nash.

DANIEL S. TUTTLE,
Presiding Bishop.

April 9, 1921.

Locating Missing Sailors.

Some of the world's "missing men" may be gathered from figures which have just been assembled by the American Seamen's Friend Society, New York, which maintains a large institute for sailors on the North River water-front. It is in these quarters that thousands of sea-farers find their land home between voyages.

However, these thousands who come and go are no less remarkable than are the thousands of letters that come yearly to James C. Healey, chaplain and assistant superintendent of the Home, inquiring for missing sailors.

Recently this kind of an appeal has arrived in very great numbers. There is a letter for each day in the week; sometimes three or four arrive in one day. Although the society has no bureau for the location of missing sailors, there are registration lists at the institute of those who have had lodgings there or who have been helped by the society when shipwrecked or in want. From this information and the broad acquaintance of those men who happen at the moment to be quartered in the Home, Mr. Healey is able, in the case of about ten out of thirty letters received within a month, to give valuable suggestions on the whereabouts of missing sailors. Occasionally the man is one of the hundreds staying at the society's building at that time.

Mr. Healey makes the interesting observation that he can locate practically 100 per cent. of the men asked for if the men themselves are willing to be located, but none when they are not willing.

St. Stephen's College.

St. Stephen's College will grant some scholarship assistance to men who are gifted with good voices. They are hoping to develop the musical side of the college even further than it has at present grown, and are anxious for good voices. This may possibly be of interest to young men in the Church who are contemplating attendance at some college and who in choirs or elsewhere have shown the possession of first-rate voices. Correspondence in this matter should be addressed to the Rev. Bernard Iddings Bell, President, St. Stephen's College, Annandale, N. Y.

Meeting of Provincial Board Religious Education.

A meeting of the Board of Religious Education of the Province of Washington will be held in Memorial Church and Parish Hall, Bolton Street and Lafayette Avenue, Baltimore, Md., Thursday and Friday, April 21 and 22. A very interesting session is planned, and there will be a public meeting in Memorial Church at 8 P. M. Thursday.

The New York Bible Society's New Home.

New York Bible House, 5 East Forty-eighth Street, New York City, the new home of the New York Bible Society, which has been in process of construction since early last summer, has reached completion, and the society has now taken possession of its new quarters. The society was for fifty years in the old Bible House, in Astor Place, and more recently has been located at 675 Madison Avenue. The new building, a gift to the society from the estate of Mr. James Talcott, is gothic in structure and of striking beauty. It will be dedicated on April 25 with ceremonies, to be held in St. Nicholas' Church, at which Governor Nathan L. Miller, of New York, will be the principal speaker. Prominent clergymen of all denominations will attend.

The new building will also house the Bible and fruit mission to the public hospitals of New York, of which Mrs. James Talcott is president, and the Female Auxiliary Bible Society. The building contains an auditorium, with a capacity of two hundred and fifty, which will be available for meetings of all sorts.

The society was established in 1809. John Castree West is president and the Rev. George William Carter general secretary.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

The Diocese Secures An Interesting Old Prayer Book.

An old leather-bound folio Prayer Book, stamped with the name of Beckford Parish, which was in use in the church at Woodstock when the Rev. Peter Muhlenburg, afterward General Muhlenburg, of the Revolutionary Army, was rector, has recently been secured by the Diocese.

The congregation in Woodstock, according to the story in Bishop Meade's History of Old Churches and Families in Virginia, came of Swedish Lutheran descent and entered bodily into the Church of England. They had selected as their rector a young Lutheran minister who was sent to England for ordination and came back to serve as rector until the outbreak of the Revolution. Young Muhlenburg, as a boy in Germany, had been drafted into the German Army from which, after a period of service, he had escaped and had then come to Virginia and studied to enter the ministry. At the outbreak of the Revolution Mr. Muhlenburg, owing to his military experience, secured a commission from the Virginia Legislature. He preached his last sermon in Beckford Parish on the text: "There is a time for peace and a time for war." At the close of the service, after he left the pulpit, he threw off his vestments and appeared in the uniform of a colonel of the Virginia troops. The men of his congregation enlisted almost to a man and marched off to the war. The regiment became the Eighth Virginia, or German Regiment, and behaved with honor and distinction throughout the whole Revolution.

His regiment was with Washington during the campaign in New Jersey, and was once placed directly opposite a regiment of Hessians in the British Army. As Colonel Muhlenburg in the evening hours was inspecting his outposts he heard in the Hessian outposts nearby the voices of men whom he knew. He called out to them and they recognized him, and he found that the regiment was the German regiment in which he had been enlisted as a youth; and then ensued one of the most remarkable events in the whole Revolution, in the meeting under the flag of truce of an American colonel with his old comrades in the Hessian Army.

The Prayer Book just secured by the Diocese was the one General Muhlenburg used in that last service. After his departure it was of course impossible, on account of the conditions of the times, for the parish to secure another rector, and the church was closed. The Prayer Book was taken from the reading desk shortly after the last service and kept as a highly prized relic in a Virginia family until the Diocese secured it by purchase.

The old church in which General Muhlenburg preached has long since been destroyed. The present church in Woodstock is built in the same church yard, though not exactly on the old foundations.

Prisoners Attend Service at Monumental, Richmond.

A unique feature of the evangelistsic services conducted in Monumental Church, Richmond, the week of April 4, was the presence on Thursday night of fourteen prisoners from the city jail. These men were there by special permission from Judge Richardson, of the Hustings Court. They had accepted the cordial invitation extended to them by the vestry of the church, and delivered in person by the Rev. George P. Mayo, rector of the church, and the Rev. R. Cary Montague, associate rector and City Missionary. A guard accompanied them, made up of Chief of Police Sherry and some of his force, all in citizens' clothes, and of volunteers from the men of Monumental Church. By the choice of the men themselves this group sat in the gallery, not because they were not welcome to the body of the church, but to avoid any conspicuousness which might have been embarrassing or disagreeable to them. During the singing of one of the familiar hymns, at a sign from the rector, the choir became silent, and this body of men carried the refrain, their strong male voices ringing through the old hisstoric church from the gallery like a "choir invisible."

This service Thursday evening is said to be the first ever held in a Richmond church at which inmates of the city jail were present. It is the hope of Mr. Mayo that this innovation may prove the beginning of a fixed custom on the part of Monumental Church to administer directly to the spiritual welfare of the men and women who are confined in the city prison and who have no other opportunity of worshipping in a church.

Farewell Service for the Rev. J. R. Ellis.

A farewell service was held at Yancey for the Rev. and Mrs. J. R. Ellis, who have given up the flourishing missionary work which they have established and carried on for the past sixteen years. They left on March 31, and will make their future home at Pedlar Mills, Amherst County.

The members of the Valley Convocation conducted the service: The Rev. B. D. Chambers, Millwood, dean of the Convocation; the Rev. Messrs. Malcolm S. Taylor, Berryville; Giles B. Palmer, White Post; William A. Cumpston, Luray; Walter Williams, Harrisonburg, and the Rev. Frank Persons and Mrs. Persons, who are to take charge of the work, were present. The Woman's Auxiliary of the Valley Convocation was also represented. After the beautiful service of prayer and praise addresses were made by the Rev. Messrs. B. D. Chambers, Malcolm S. Taylor, Walter Williams and J. R. Ellis. The meeting was then turned over to the Woman's Auxiliary. Mrs. E. Jacquelin Smith, chairman, made a short address and read an appreciation of the work done by Mrs. Ellis as Secretary of the Valley Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary. Short addresses were made by Mrs. Barton, representing the Junior Auxiliary, and by Mrs. William A. Baker, representing Section B. The church was crowded with the friends of Mr. and Mrs. Ellis from near and far, and all united in wishing that God would bless them in their new work.

The Rev. Philip A. Arthur, rector of the Church of the Ascension, Highland Park, Richmond, and Miss Florence May Wilson, of Highland Park, were married Wednesday afternoon, April 6, in the Church of the Asscension, the Rt. Rev. William Cabell Brown, D. D., officiating.

Large Confirmation Class: Bishop Brown visisted St. Andrew's Church, Richmond, Sunday, April 3, and confirmed a class of fifty-seven presented by the rector, the Rev. J. F. Ribble, D. D.

Piedmont Convocation: The one hundred and seventh semi-annual meeting of the Piedmont Convocation will be held in St. Timothy's Church, Herndon, Wednesday and Thursday, April 27 and 28, 1921.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

An International Baptism.

An historical and most interesting ceremony took place in the Bethlehem Chapel of Washington Cathedral on the first Sunday after Easter, when Bishop Nikolai Velimirovitch, of Ochrida in Macedonia, South Serbia, who had preached most eloquently in the chapel in the morning, took part in the baptism of Velizar Stanoyevitch, infant son of the Secretary of the Legation of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, Dragomir Stanoyevitch, and his wife, Ljoubitza Stanoyevitch. The godfather was Colonel Dragomir Stoyanovitch. Mme. Slavko Y. Grouitch, wife of the Serbian Minister, stood as proxy.

Bishop Nikolai began the service with prayers and other ceremonies of the Holy Orthodox Eastern Church, but the baptism was performed by Dr. Bratenahl, dean of the Cathedral, according to the use of the Book of Common Prayer, the Bishop concluding the service with the prayers of the Eastern Church. The Serbian Minister and a small circle of friends, chiefly from the Diplomatic Corps, were among the witnesses.

The Baptism of this little Serbian, who is now to be enrolled in the Serbian Orthodox Eastern Church, records a rare incident in the history of the Church, if not the only one of its kind, when in the administration of the sacrament the Eastern and Western Churches were brought very concretely together.

The Rt. Rev. Nikolai Velimirovitch is Bishop of Ochrida, a very ancient city which is in Macedonia, and a part of the territory concerning which the second Balkan War was fought. The Bishop's Cathedral was built in the sixth century by the Emperor Julian and has been a Christian church ever since, even the Turks having respected its Christian character. It is one of the cradles of liberty of the Serbian race revered in song and story, magnificently situated between the lower ranges of Macedonia and the Black Alps, which are the frontier between Macedonia and Albania.

The population suffered very terribly under the Bulgars, many of the inhabitants having been massacred; those remaining were in a complete state of destitution when delivered by the Allies early in October, 1918.

Under Bishop Velimirovitch's pastorate conditions in the province have greatly improved, and the country people, who are mostly shepherds and fishermen, have been greatly assisted by the Allies to recover their flocks and to resume their occupations.

During the war Bishop Velimirovitch was a refugee in England, where he was welcomed by the highest ecclesiastical authorities, and preached frequently at St. Paul's, St. Margaret's, and other cathedrals and churches of note.

He visited America once before in the summer of 1915 to assist in awakening among the Jugo-Slav immigrants in this country a spirit of sympathy for their sorely pressed brethren in the old country.

He has written a Manual for education and has very advanced ideas about the brotherhood of men and the unification of all forms of Christian people.

Oldest Church in Washington Destroyed By Fire.

A loss which will be felt by the whole Diocese was sustained on Wednesday, April 6, when St. Paul's Church, Rock Creek Parish, was completely destroyed by fire. St. Paul's Church is the oldest church in Washington and one of the oldest in the country, having been built in 1776. Of this historic structure the four walls are all that now remain. The interior of the building, valuable memorial windows, relics and paintings were burned, and while the financial loss is estimated to be about $100,000, the records and historical relics were priceless and cherished by all the Church people of the Diocese. Of these of special interest was a large folio Bible, which was contained in a glass case near the chancel. This Bible was bought in 1727 and was paid for by the congregation with tobacco.

The fire was discovered about 3 o'clock in the morning, and was so far under way that little relief was possible from the fire department. The great distance between the church and the fire plugs outside of the grounds constituted another serious handicap.

It has been impossible so far to determine the cause of the fire, since there were no electric wires in the church, no fire was in the furnace, and the church had not been used since Monday. The present rector of the church is the Rev. Joseph Fletcher. No plans for the future in regard to rebuilding have been announced.

The first Easter service to be held in the present territory of the District of Columbia took place at old St. Paul's Church, Rock Creek, in 1791.

The Rev. John Frazier, who was rector of Broad Creek Church, in St. John's Parish, Prince Georges County, in 1719, found that his parish was growing so that a chapel was necessary, and on September 19, 1719, the people of the Eastern branch and Rock Creek decided to build a chapel.

A little frame chapel was soon built and consecrated St. Paul's, though called Rock Creek then, as today. The membership grew so rapidly that in 1726 the Colonial Assembly passed an act separating it from St. John's Parish and creating a new parish. The creation of this parish marked a religious era in the capital, and for seventy-five years its history was the history of the Episcopal Church in the District, as well as of the social life of many of the prominent families whose weddings were celebrated at St. Paul's and whose dead were buried from the little country church.

The first incumbent of St. Paul's was the Rev. George Murdock, sent by the Lord Bishop of London, who was rector for thirty-four years and died in 1761. Mr. Murdock is said to have been the first clergyman to live in the District, and the rectory in which he lived stood until 1866, when it was destroyed by fire. He was succeeded by Alexander Williams, who was rector until 1776, when the brick church burned today was begun. The body of the church was forty by sixty feet, but this seemed too large, and in 1820 walls were erected within walls, which stood until 1850, when they were removed and the building restorerd to its original size. A gallery built in the church in 1735 was also torn out in 1868, and since that time the present chancel was added, as well as a vestibule.

The affairs of the parish were well administered, and in 1767 it owned its own tobacco warehouse in Georgetown and seemed to do a thriving business.

Out of the seven men appointed to establish the town of Georgetown, five were officers of Rock Creek Parish.

The Junior Daughters of the King of the Diocese held their annual convention in the Cathedral close on Wednesday, March 30, beginning with a celebration of the Holy Communion in the Bethlehem Chapel, when the boys of the Cathedral choir rendered the music. On Monday, April 4, the Bishop's Guild held their annual Easter meeting in St. Alban's Guild Hall, beginning also with a celebration of the Holy Communion in Bethlehem Chapel. At this meeting all the women's organizations of the Diocese were asked to make a report.

Church School Service League: A meeting for all officers and leaders of the Church School Service League was held on April 9 at Epiphany Parish Hall. Reports made indicated co-operation on the part of many of the Sunday schools in the new plan, and those in charge feel that with a wider understanding of the work of the league all of the Sunday schools will eventually fall into line.

A special service for the children of the Diocese was held at Epiphany Church on Sunday afternoon, April 10, when the Lenten offerings of the Sunday schools were resented. Superintendents, treasurers and one child from each class in the Sunday schools marched in the procession, and the large body of the church was filled to the doors with children and friends of the Sunday schools. The offering amounted to a little over $3,800, and the honor schools were St. Margaret's, with over $400 as the largest offering, and St. Columba's, with the largest per capita offering of something over $2. Dr. Freeman, the rector of Epiphany, addressed the children.

M. M. W.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robt. C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

Meeting of the New River Convocation.

The New River Convocation, embracing Roanoke and the counties lying in the southwestern portion of the Diocese, held a one-day session in Radford on Tuesday, April 5. The convocation was presided over by the dean, the Rev. G. Otis Mead, and was well attended by the clergy and quite a number of lay representatives.

The three departments of work were under consideration. The Rev. Mr. Hughes, of Graham, led the discussion along the line of missions; the Rev. Karl M. Block, of Roanoke, led the conference on Christian Education, and the Rev. F. H. Craighill conducted the conference on social work. It was resolved by the convocation that the clergy place themselves in the hands of a committee under the direction of the Bishop, with a view to conducting missions in accordance with a program soon to be adopted. The meeting was unanimously pronounced an unusual success. All left with renewed interest and enthusiasm. A delightful luncheon was served by the ladies, and the full delegation was entertained at supper at the hotel.

The Bishop visited St. John's Church, Roanoke, Sunday, April 3, and confirmed twenty-seven. In the evening he preached in the chapel of the Virginia Episcopal School, Lynchburg, and confirmed twenty boys.

NORTH CAROLINA

Rt. Rev. Jos. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop.

Easter a Memorable Day for Christ Church, Raleigh.

Noteworthy services were held in Christ Church, Raleigh, the Rev. Milton A. Barber, rector, on Palm Sunday and throughout Holy Week culminating with the triumphant Resurrection services of Easter Day. Rare specimens of palms and palmetto leaves decorating the chancel gave significance to the first day of Holy Week. At the 11 o'clock service a class of thirty-two was confirmed by Bishop Cheshire, and the church was thronged.

Daily celebrations of the Holy Communion, except Good Friday, were observed during the week. On Good Friday Morning Prayer was said at 9 o'clock; the "three hours' service" was held from 12 to 3, and Maunder's "Olivet to Calvary," with a full choir, was sung at 8 o'clock, with record crowds attending all services. Easter Day brought an unprecedented attendance at all the services. At the early communion, at half past seven, between three and four hundred were present. At 11 o'clock there was another overflowing attendance, and the large vested choir was supported by organ and orchestra. The congregation had been asked to make a thank offering of $3,000 to cancel the parish house debt, and in recognition of one hundred years of continuous parish life. In response to this appeal of the rector and vestry, the entire collection for the day, including the children's offering, exceeded $5,000. This splendid collection more than wipes out the last vestige of encumbrance on the magnificent parish house property and causes great rejoicing throughout the parish. Easter, 1921, was a memorable day at Christ Church, Raleigh.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Completion of New Calvary Church, Americus.

In the completion of their new church building, the members of Calvary Church, Americus, and their rector, the Rev. James B. Lawrence, saw the culmination of the hopes of many years realized on Easter Day. The church, a very beautiful one, designed by Cram & Ferguson, of Boston, is constructed of red brick with a slate gray roof, and was built at a cost of $25,000. The interior, which is of gothic design, is finished in dark oak, and has a large triple stained glass window entirely across the front portion of the building. The chancel was beautifully decorated for the occasion, and special music was rendered. The Bishop was present and dedicated the building with special prayers. He also confirmed a class presented by the rector. The rector, who has worked unceasingly for years towards a new building, has been ably supported by all of the members and organizations in the parish, who have contributed largely to the building fund. The Rev. Mr. Lawrence has been rector for fifteen years.

E. D. J.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop

Riverside: By the expenditure of about $700 for material and some expert labor, the basement of Grace Church, Riverside, has been fitted for parish house purposes. Under the direction of the minister in charge, the Rev. W. Nevin Elliott, the work was done by the men and boys of the parish.

Bloomsburg: At the recent visitation of the Bishop to St. Paul's, Bloomsburg, a class of fifty-one, mostly adults, was presented by the rector, Rev. R. R. Morgan. This is the largest class presented for confirmation in the history of that parish.

L. F. B.

NEWARK

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

The new parish house at Christ Church, Hackensack, costing about $50,000, means a largely extended ministry of the parish, which moves on vigorously under its new rector, the Rev. Augustine Elmendorf. Thirty-four persons were confirmed there on the first Sunday after Easter. The parochial chapel at Rochelle Park is prospering and services have been begun in communities east of Hackensack.

The Diocesan Church Extension Fund has recently appropriated $1,000 or more to aid the people in obtaining rectories at Oradell, Ramsey and Westwood.

The Diocesan Convention meets on May 17 at the Cathedral, and the question of admission of women as delegates to the convention and as members of vestries comes up on the report from the committee to which it was referred last year.

Correction: The announcement of the acceptance of the rectorship of St. John's Church, Jersey City, by Rev. William B. Beach was incorrect.

NEW YORK.

Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D.,
Bishop-Elect.

Dr. Manning's Consecration to Take Place May 11.

The morning of May 11 has been set as the date, and the Cathedral determined on as the place, for the consecration of the Rev. Dr. William T. Manning, rector of Trinity Parish, to be the tenth Bishop of New York. The date well precedes that of the Diocesan Convention, and facilitates the work of that body and of the Diocese.

At the last dinner of the Churchman's Association the Rev. Dr. Manning was presented with a service book which was the property of Bishop Provost, and which was discovered some time since in a second-hand book stall in New York. It contains the offices of the Church. Through the efforts of the Rev. Dr. Milo H. Gates and the Rev. Dr. Edward C. Chorley, the book has been placed in a leather case for preservation. At the presentation to Dr. Manning Bishops Lloyd, Cook, Hulse and Ferris were present.

Funeral of the Rev. Joseph W. Hill: More than one hundred clergy and many men and women prominent in the life of the Church in New York attended the funeral of the late Rev. Joseph Warren Hill, held in Trinity Church. Mr. Hill was English by birth, but coming to America he entered Trinity choir at the age of twenty. In 1867 he was ordained by Bishop Horatio Potter, and in 1881 joined Trinity clergy staff as curate. Here he served for thirty-seven years. Interment took place in Trinity Cemetery.

War Tablet Unveiled: At the Church of the Heavenly Rest, on the second Sunday after Easter, a war tablet bearing one hundred and eleven names was unveiled. It carried the names of six gold star patriots. Military men from the Seventh Regiment, the Color Guard, the Twenty-third Division and officers of Army and Navy were present. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Herbert Shipman, rector and chaplain.

Aid for Former Service Men: In the Town Hall the Rev. Dr. William T. Manning gave one of several addresses in favor of former service men. It seems there are half a dozen departments of the government charged with the duty of caring for these men, and between them and the red tape that all governments seem to provide, many worthy men get left. Efforts are making to create a public opinion that will force consolidation of agencies and care for men. At a local hospital evidence has come to light of improper conditions as well as neglect.

C.

ERIE.

The Rev. A. R. Van Meter, dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, who has accepted a call to Calvary Church, Germantown, Pa., will leave for his new field about May 15.

Dean Van Meter has been in charge of St. Paul's for the last five years. He has proven himself a fearless champion for civic righteousness in a difficult field where those who were willing to do difficult and unpopular civic tasks were few in number. He has been a most active leader in the Diocesan Social Service work, keeping the people of the Diocese informed of State and national issues, pending which called for Christian action.

The Diocese is heartily sorry to hear of the Dean's decision to leave, and wishes him Godspeed and great success in his new field.

Christ Church, Oil City: This congregation is anxiously awaiting the coming of the new organ which it is hoped will be installed shortly, at a cost of approximately $10,000. Almost the entire amount is in sight, and it is expected that the organ will be dedicated without much, if any, debt. The Rev. Dr. Reilly is in his twelfth year as rector of Christ Church. Four years ago, for the first time in its history, the parish dispensed with the use of the Easter offering for current expenses, which custom has been continued ever since. The parish has no debt and recently the congregation presented Dr. Reilly with a gift of $1,500.

Emmanuel Church, Corry: An appreciated and beautiful gift made to the remodeled Emmanuel Church here was the window which was placed in the vestibule recently. It represents "Christ knocking at the door," and is the gift of the Lillian Guild, one of the women's organizations of the church.

The civic forums, which were inaugurated at the beginning of Lent by the rector, the Rev. Mortimer S. Ashton, attracted many, who were interested in Chamber of Commerce work. Among the speakers were Mr. H. A. Davidson, general secretary of the Erie Board of Commerce; Hon. Frederick Schoonmaker, of Bradford, and Mr. Milton L. Brown, principal of the Corry High School.

R. S. R.

MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. Chas. D. Williams, D. D., Bishop

New Organ for St. Paul's Cathedral.

What is reputed to be the best four manual electric organ in the United States has just been completed in St. Paul's Cathedral, Detroit, and is to be formally dedicated within the next few weeks. The organ is a gift to the cathedral from William T. Barbour, who is one of the vestrymen of the cathedral and who has been interested in it since its inception ten years ago.

The organ will be played by Francis Mackay, A. G. O., dean of the Michigan Chapter of the American Guild of Organists. Mr. Mackay is also master of the choristers of the Cathedral and in charge of the adult choir of ninety-two voices, which sings at the evening services. The boy choir, which sings at the morning services in the cathedral, numbers fifty-eight boys, and is the largest boys' choir in the Middle West. In addition there are twenty-five men singers who participate in the morning services.

It is hoped in the near future, according to Mr. Mackay, to begin a regular choristers' school at St. Paul's along the same line as that followed in England and at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine in New York. This will include the entrance of boys into a school where their secular education will be taken care of as well as training them as choir singers. All of this will be done at the expense of the church, and the boys thus trained will be available for churches throughout the Diocese.

Dr. Marquis Accepts Call to Detroit Church.

Announcement has just been made that the Rev. S. S. Marquis, D. D., has decided to accept the rectorship of St. Joseph's Church, Detroit.

For the past five years and since relinquishing the position of dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, Dr. Marquis has been in sole charge of all the industrial welfare work of the Ford Motor Company. He resigned from that position about two months ago, and despite several very flattering offers from other industrial concerns to again take up welfare work, he decided to re-enter the Church.

St. Joseph's is very fortunate to secure Dr. Marquis just at this time, in view of the fact that they are about to begin a new church edifice which will cost more than $100,000.

I. C. J.

WYOMING

Rt. Rev. Nat. S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Thomas has completed a two months' tour of duty in the East, under the Nation-Wide Campaign. His preaching appointments included Rochester, Pittsburgh, Baltimore, and a four-day engagement as University preacher at Princeton.

Rock Springs: The Hon. T. S. Taliaferro, senior warden of the Church of the Holy Communion, Rock Springs, has donated a lot in the city, to which the rectory is to be moved. This will enable the new church and parish house to be erected upon the original lot. The lot is splendidly situated, and is a most valuable addition to the fabric of the Church in that community. The parish is actively working toward the erection of its new church and parish house.

St. Mark's, Cheyenne, had a series of special preachers at the Wednesday night services during Lent. These included Bishop Johnson, of Colorado; Bishop Beecher, of Western Nebraska; Dean Thornberry, of St. Matthew's Cathedral, Laramie; the Rev. Mr. Edwards, of Casper; the Rev. Mr. Walters, of Boulder, and Mr. F. S. Burrage, of Laramie.

The children at St. Michael's Mission, Ethete, are showing the results of the careful training given them along practical lines. Several of the older boys are finishing a one hundred and fifty hour course in farm blacksmithing. A night school in agriculture has been opened for the benefit of the children of the Arapahoe tribe. The boys of the mission are now doing all the shoe repairing required at the school.

The Parish House at Rawlins, the Rev. R. F. Philbrook, rector, is being made a community center in every sense of the word. The reading-room has been equipped with books and the current magazines. On Monday evenings about fifty boys receive instruction in gymnastics. On Wednesday evenings classes in folk-dancing are given for the younger girls. The small people of the parish are entertained on Saturday afternoons by an expert along the line of "story hours." On Friday evenings moving pictures of a very high quality are displayed. It is planned to show a Bible story, through the agency of the movie machine, each Sunday morning at the close of the session of the Sunday school. Plans are being worked out for the utilization of the parish house on the remaining days of the week, to meet the great demand for clean and wholesome recreation for the young people of a typical Western town.

St. Thomas' Parish, Rawlins, has suffered a great loss in the death of Richard J. Daley on February 24. Mr. Daley came to Rawlins in 1871, and has been a devoted layman of Wyoming since that date. He was for many years a vestryman of St. Thomas' Church, and this work he made a first charge upon his time and labors. He served as senior and junior warden, and was active in all matters pertaining to the welfare of the kingdom. As the parish church was too small to contain the numbers who would attend the funeral services, the Burial Office was read by the rector in the Masonic Temple.

A very successful mission for young people has been conducted by the vicar of Trinity Church, Thermopolis, the Rev. Henry H. Daniels.

The Rev. F. C. Wissenbach, vicar of the Little Snake River Missions, is holding services at the county poor farm in Dixon every Tuesday evening. He is assisted by the Church people of Dixon, who are manifesting great interest in these services.

L. M. T.

A Christian Endeavor Society was formed in the Church of the Prince of Peace, Baltimore, about seventeen years ago. What has it accomplished? A readiness in finding passages of Scripture, improvement in singing hymns, an increasing knowledge of the fundamental truths, brotherly love, deep interest in missionary enterprise, the support and education of two girls in India—we hope soon to train these girls—the circulation of Christian literature, especially that great paper, The Christian Endeavor World; this society has given young people a vision of unity among the evangelical churches and emphasized the duty of loyalty to our own Church, and prepared the members for confirmation and service; it has brought tender relief to the poor; it has shown us why Christian people should "rejoice always" in order to serve God effectively.

The Christian Endeavor Society now numbers about 5,000,000 members; it is represented in almost every country in the world; its meetings are never dull. The great Church Missionary Society of England finds this society most helpful among the non-Christian nations. In one country one of the leading Endeavorers is the Rev. Dr. Floyd Tomkins, of Philadelphia.

Take Him at His word; what you can comprehend of the mystery of the Supper receive that way, but let faith reach across and receive all He graciously offers, whether your mind grasps all its meaning or not. It is a reason for thankfulness that there is so much more to Christ, and to His work for us, than our little minds can reason out, but never too much for the simplest faith to accept.

Our work, thought, speech, songs, goings and comings are the conservation of our energy in a new form of life. It is the process of directing one kind of power through certain channels in order to live as another kind of power. The seed dropped into the ground dies to seed life, in order to live in harvest life. All life is sacrificial. The tragedy is that men and women have died for the wrong things.—The Christian Herald.

All the sin of heathendom, all the sin of Christendom, is but the outgrowth of the one root—God dethroned, self-enthroned in the heart of man.—Rev. Andrew Murray.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

A GREAT CAUSE.

A little magazine has come to our desk entitled "World Friendship."

It is only the fourth number of the first volume, but it advocates such a Christian and practical cause that we feel that we cannot do better than devote this page to the furtherance of its aim, which is world peace, through "The World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches."

It tells us on its front page that "it believes that the kingdom of God can be established in the inter-racial and international relations of men. It seeks to achieve this purpose through the following agencies and activities:

(a) National councils, (b) interchange of speakers and preachers, (c) annual world conferences of international committees, (d) propaganda through articles, speeches and sermons."

Its declaration of principles is as follows:

"1. We believe in the power of friendship to establish right relationships between the nations and to secure universal peace.

2. That friendship is based upon justice.

3. That to win over the nations of the earth to friendship is one of the most fascinating, adventurous and useful tasks to which men and women can bend their minds.

4. That the Church is an agency through which peoples and governments can come to know each others as brothers with a common spiritual lineage and not as enemies with aims necessarily antagonistic.

5. That in a League of Nations the world has the only instrument by which and through which justice and right can be administered between the nations.

6. That the League of Nations must be permeated with the spirit of religion and this task must be accepted by men and women everywhere who are interested in making it a vital instrument.

7. That the immediate task of the League of Nations is that of reducing armaments. Large armies and navies are sure provocations of war, as they are declared to be in the covenant of the League.

8. That the Golden Rule must be made to apply in all international relations."

On the first page of this magazine we find a very striking and impressive table of government expenditures, showing that for past wars we are now paying in pensions, hospitals, soldiers' homes and so forth no less than 68 per cent. of the total cost of government, and that for future wars, army, navy, coast defense and so on, we are appropriating another 23 per cent., making a total of 91 per cent. of the entire amount paid out by the government that goes to the expense of war.

On the other hand, only 1 per cent. of the public funds goes for education and scientific development.

A consideration of these figures will surely impress us with the fact that the abolishment of war has as great an economic importance as it has moral and religious value.

On the last page of this little magazine comes the following appeal and statement:

"Wanted, 10,000 Members to Promote International Friendship Through the Churches.

Purpose To organize the religious forces throughout the world so that the weight of all men and women of goodwill can be brought to bear upon the relations of governments and peoples to the end that the spirit of peace and goodwill may prevail and that there may be substituted arbitration for war; friendship for suspicion and hate; cooperation in place of ruinous competition, and a universal spirit of service and sacrifice rather than greed and gain in the transactions between nations.

Scope: As its name signifies, it is a world organization engaged in the enterprise of establishing national councils in every country. Its ultimate object is to mobilize goodwill for the effective working out of international relationships.

Organization: Twenty-five great nations have national councils. Eight others are being organized. Delegates from twenty-six nations were present at the conference in Geneva, Switzerland, August, 1920.

International Organizer: Through the Church Peace Union and its officers the functions of this office will be continued until such time as the Alliance elects a successor to the late Dr. Nasmyth.

The Orient: Through Dr. Sidney L. Gulick the Alliance is making a real contribution toward a better understanding of the Oriental in his relationship to America.

To stimulate discussion with a view to intelligent judgment on problems of world justice, world friendship, world organization, and a League of Nations.

Specific Objects for America: To foster just and friendly relations between our country and all other nations, especially China and Japan, also Mexico and the other nations in the Western Hemisphere, and to defeat the attempt now being made to stir up enmity and discord between the white and yellow races.

To foster right relations between the foreign born and native groups of America.

To co-ordinate the work of religious and social service organizations of America for concerted action in matters of international righteousness and goodwill through the medium of Local Committees on Co-operation with the World Alliance.

We want ten thousand members in America to join with the men and women who love peace in the other nations of the world.

Membership in the American Council will bring to you the magazine "World Friendship," and all the other publications of the organization, and also gives membership in the world organization. The cost is small; the cause is great.

Write for particulars and literature today."

Sometimes we are apt to neglect taking part in a thing like the World Alliance because we think that our influence is so small that one person does not amount to much, but we must remember that in order to get those ten thousand who are wanted for this great cause it will be necessary for ten thousand individuals to make up their minds that they each have a personal responsibility in this matter, and that their combined efforts will amount to a great deal, even though as individuals they are not very strong.

Another way, too, that you can assist in this cause is to carry this article to your auxiliary, guild or Bible class meeting and get ten or fifteen or more others to join the Alliance with you.

In this way you can be doing your part toward bringing "peace on earth, goodwill toward men."

In writing for literature and information address Rev. Frederick Lynch, D. D., 70 Fifth Avenue, New York. The subscription price of the magazine is $1 per year.

ENCOURAGING INCIDENTS.

Not long ago a white man was murdered in one of our Southern States by a negro, and shortly afterwards a colored man was arrested purely on suspicion. He was placed in the county jail, and one night a large mob attacked the jail to try to take him out and lynch him. Fortunately, they could not get in, and the prisoner was saved.

Since then once of the leaders of this mob has been indicted, tried, convicted and sentenced to pay a $500 fine and serve one year in jail.

In another Southern county the leader of a lynching mob was shot dead by the sheriff of the county.

It is much to be hoped that these two incidents will convince impetuous young men that it is wiser to let the law take its course.

If persons could only realize that organizing a mob to carry out what should be done in due time and by due process of law is a deliberate insult to the State authorities, such barbarities would not happen so often in our Southern States.

The Vitality of Religion.

The liberty, the freedom, the democracy we spoke so much about are big ideas and require more of those enjoying their benefits than we are apt to realize. I see no vehicle but the Church with its message to the secret spirit of men, by which to fashion an essential character. This institution, imperfect as it is, divided as it is, partial, priest ridden, pew-rented, full of dry bone doctrine and deadly traditionalism, is, in spite of all its defects, the one institution dedicated to making character. This badly battered, upheaved world, needs nothing so much as a high type of integrity and lofty character, the making of which is the real work of religion.—The Rev. Dr. Karl Reiland.

Family Department

APRIL.

1. Friday.
3. First Sunday after Easter.
10. Second Sunday after Easter.
17. Third Sunday after Easter.
24. Fourth Sunday after Easter.
25. Monday. S. Mark.
30. Saturday.

Collect for Third Sunday After Easter.

Almighty God, Who showest to them that are in error the light of Thy truth, to the intent that they may return into the way of righteousness: Grant unto all those who are admitted into the fellowship of Christ's religion that they may avoid those things that are contrary to their profession, and follow all such things as are agreeable to the same; through our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

For the Southern Churchman.

On Spirit Wing.

Gene Scott Wright.

Now falls the dusk, and star by star,
One, then another, gleaming,
Like many mansions shining far
They set my soul a-dreaming.

The stillness of the summer night
Is broken by the calling
Of many voices, soft and light
As dewdrops might be falling.

My questing spirit swiftly goes
To climb the star-beam's ladder;
Around and through me thrilling flows
Life stronger, sweeter, gladder.

Unhampered by the mantling flesh
How fast and far I travel!
How easy now the tangled mesh
Of long years to unravel!

I seek the land where Sharon's rose
Immortal blooms in beauty,
For them, I know, it fadeless blows
Whose watchword here is Duty.

The land where nothing ill may come,
And where Youth's fountain, springing,
Invites the burdened traveler home,
And sets his heart a-singing.

No sun nor moon in that fair land,
For none shall need their shining;
There Life and Joy go hand in hand,
And hearts all cease their pining.

There may I find some happy spot
(Though all unworthy, truly),
Where things that trouble touch me not,
And Love will find me duly.

On, on, I fare from star to star
Till wearied with my roaming;
Not yet for me those wonders are
I dream of in the gloaming.

O soul of mine, come back to earth,
Bide here a little longer;
Short be your flights, till proved your worth,
And till your wings grow stronger.

Then some sweet night, when all alight
Those distant worlds are beaming,
Hie swift away to glorious day,
And so prove true your dreaming!

Three Calls in the Night.

A young girl sat in Northfield, Mass. In her hand was a message which contained sufficient causes for the troubled expression on her face.

The message summoned her to come to India to see her mother, who was ill on the mission field. Ida Scudder did not want to go to India. She thought most resentfully of the many members of her family who had given their lives to India.

Her noble grandfather, Dr. John Scudder, might have been the most prominent of New York's physicians if he had not read "The Call of Six Hundred Millions" as he waited to see a patient in New York City. That call from out of the darkness and superstition and suffering laid hold of his heart and drew him out to India to give his life in self-spending ministration. His life and work had blazed the way with a trail of light through India's darkness, and never, since it set the light a-shining, had there been a day when there was no Scudder in India to keep this torch burning.

One by one they had come back to America to be educated—his children and his grandchildren. One by one the call of God and of India's awful need had drawn them back. Seven of his children and fifteen of his grandchildren had already gone back to India. Her father and mother were there now, pouring out their lives in service.

"It is enough," said Ida Scudder as she sat in Northfield with the summons in her hand. She would go, eagerly, gladly, to be with her mother while she was sick, but when her mother was well she would no longer bury herself in India. She would hasten back to America to live her life as other girls were living theirs.

One night she sat in her father's house in India. As the dusk of the twilight was deepening into the darkness of the night a knock sounded at the door. The girl answered the summons. A man stood before her. He was a high-caste Mohammedan, tall, slender, white-robed. He bowed low and spoke.

"My young wife is ill—ill to the death. Our doctors can do nothing for her. Will the gracious lady come to attend her?" Ida Scudder knew naught of medicine.

"My father," she answered eagerly, "is a medical man. He will come to see your wife."

The Mohammedan drew himself up proudly.

"No man has ever looked upon the face of my wife. We are high born. I should rather a thousand times that she should die than that a man should look upon her face."

Silently he turned and went out into the darkness.

Ida Scudder sat down and thought. She was in India now. In India, with this pitiful unpitied child-wife, who might be dying even as she sat and thought of her. How long she sat she knew not. She was startled by a second knock that sounded. Possibly the man had been softened by the sight of the agony of his little wife, and had come for her father. Eagerly she opened the door. It was not the same man who stood there. Possibly it was his messenger.

"My wife," began this man, as had the other, "my wife is very sick. She is giving me much trouble. It is a pity that a wife should give her husband so much trouble. After all my pains she may die unless the mem sahib comes and heals her."

The girl looked at him hopefully. Surely he could not be as prejudiced as the other one.

"I am not a doctor," she explained. "My father is a medical man. He will—"

The man interrupted her with a proud uplifting of his turbaned head. "I am a high-caste man," he said. "No man dare look upon the face of my wife."

Even as he spoke he turned and disappeared in the darkness.

Ida Scudder's thoughts went with him back to the girl. Perhaps she was only a little girl. So many of them were. Perhaps she was dying even now, because no man could help her and there was no woman to help. Something clutched at the heart of the American girl over there in India and choked her throat as she sat helpless and unhelping. It was terrible that two calls should come in such rapid succession on the same night. As she shuddered at the thought and the misery of it all a third knock sounded. A third man came before her. His voice was almost eager.

"My wife," he said. "She is ill, very ill. They told me I could find help for her here. A wonderful foreign doctor who had done remarkable things." At last there was a call for her father!

"Oh, yes, I will send father," she answered gladly.

The man involuntarily straightened himself. "Not a man! No man shall look upon the face of my wife. You must come."

In vain did the girl plead that her father would come. Sadly and alone the man departed, as had the other two men before him. Ida Scudder sat down again. Were all the suffering child-wives in India calling to her that night? Was one of those endless processions she had read about in missionary magazines actually going to march by her door with unending maddening continuance?

The night passed on. The day dawned. Ida Scudder walked out into the street. As she passed a gateway she heard wailing and loud lamentation. It chilled her heart. She knew that the life of one of the child-wives had passed with the passing of the day.

She went on. At another house the beating of the musical instruments, the shrieks and the moans, told her that a second little wife was dead.

She would have turned back, sick at heart, but a relentless hand drew her on until she stood before the rude bier bedecked with flowers, which was to carry away the poor little body of the third wife whom the skilled touch of a physician might have healed.

Unspoken accusations sounded in her ears, though no voice sounded the words that accused her. "If thou hadst been here, these might not have died."

That fall, among the names of those who entered the Woman's Medical College in Philadelphia, there appeared the name of Ida S. Scudder. She heard the call of the women and children of India; the call of her grandfather's love and of his life; the call of her father's and mother's sacrifice. Above all, she heard a call which came from the lips of a Man who hung upon a cross. The print of thorns was upon His brow. Nail wounds were in His hands and His feet, and His side was pierced. The cross seemed to be transplanted until it stood in India's soil, and the voice of Him upon it said not "Go ye," but "I have died for India. Come, follow Me."

As she followed the cross into India. Dr. Ida Scudder has brought blessing and health and life to thousands of India's girls and women. She passes on to the girls and women of America those knocks that are summoning aid in the night. The night is dark in India, and we have light. The call comes not from three only, but from the three hundred and fifteen millions of India's people. They appeal with an insistent call for some to go and for all to give and to pray.—Missionary Review of the World.

Divine Possibilities.

I dare say that it is possible for those who really are willing to reckon on the power of the Lord, for keeping and victory, to lead a life in which His promises are taken as they stand, and are found to be true. It is possible to cast all our care on Him daily, and to enjoy deep peace in doing it. It is possible to have the thoughts and imaginations of our hearts purified in the deepest meaning of the word, through faith. It is possible to see the will of God in everything, and to receive it, not with sighing, but with singing. It is possible in the inner life of desire and feeling to lay aside all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and evil speaking, every day and every hour. It is possible, by taking complete refuge in divine power, to become strong through and through, and where previously our greatest weakness lay, to find that the things which formerly upset all our resolves to be patient, or pure, or humble, furnish today an opportunity—through Him Who loved us, and works in us an agreement with His will, and a blessed sense of His presence and power—to make sin powerless. These things are divine possibilities, and because they are His work, the true experience of them will always cause us to bow lower at His feet, and to learn to thirst and long for more.—Selected.

The Strange Story of a Masterpiece.

Many centuries ago a number of workmen might have been seen dragging a great marble block into the city of Florence in Italy. It had come from the famous marble quarries of Carrara, and was intended to be made into a statue of a great prophet. But it contained some flaws, and when Donatello, the celebrated Italian sculptor, saw it, he refused to accept it. So there it lay in the cathedral yard, a useless block.

One day the great artist, Michael Angelo, caught sight of the block. There rose up before his vision a thing of beauty, and in his mind he resolved a great resolve:

He would make a great statue of it.

It was a noble resolve, and worthy of the man. So, nothing daunted, he began the work. On the 11th day of September, 1500, early in the morning, Michael Angelo began his work. There, day after day, week after week, he chiseled patiently away. He allowed no other hand to touch it. Months passed, and still the work was unfinished. Not that he was idle, for he worked so hard at times that he slept with his working clothes on. And one day he said to a friend who thought that he was only spending days and weeks of his time upon what seemed to be trifles, "It is these trifles that make perfection."

Two more years passed away, and at last the statue was finished. On the 25th day of January, 1504, some of the first artists of the day assembled together to see what Michael Angelo had made of the despised and rejected block. They were a famous company.

There was the architect Monciatto, and the great master Cosimo Roselli, and the renowned artist Botticelli, and San Gallo, the famous architect and engineer, and Leonardo da Vinci, the first painter then in Italy (you way, perhaps, have seen a photo or a print of his great fresco-painting, "The Last Supper," in the Santa Maria della Grazie in Milan), and there were also Filippino Lippi, and Pietro Perugino, the teacher of Raphael.

The marvelous work was unveiled, and it stood for the first time challenging the admiration of one of the most famous assemblages of artists and architects that the world has ever seen.

They all united in its praise, and their judgment was unanimous. It was a masterpiece. And as a masterpiece it deserved no common place. It must not be hidden. It must stand in the public square. It must be a tribute to the glory and fame of their renowned city. So it was decided.

The statue weighed eighteen thousand pounds, and great was the care and skill with which it had to be removed. They slowly swung it in ropes suspended from fourteen oiled beams, and, drawn by pulleys worked by forty men, it was brought through the door in the wall which had been broken open to allow its exit from the workshop of the great master into the open air. For threre days and three nights it was watched by chosen guards as if it were a sacred thing. On the 18th day of May, at dawn, it arrived in the great square of the city of Florence.

There, for centuries, it stood, though now it is placed within walls. And today, if you go to the Academia della Belle Arti, in the circular hall constructed at the end of the long entrance corridor, you will see the very statue that was once a valueless block. It is the far-famed "David" of Michael Angelo. It represents the Shepherd King, the sweet singer of Israel, in the strength of his ruddy youth. The eyes are full of sweet perceptiveness, the right arm poised so as to hold the sling, the body agile and strong; a sculptured poem of strength. In one word, it is a masterpiece of art.

But Michael Angelo's "David" is more than that. It is an everlasting lesson to this world's workers. It tells what a master can make of a useless block. It is a vision of hope. It is an inspiration of cheer for man and boy. It stands there to remind us that nothing is common or unclean which has in it the possibility of life. God can make out of a worthless Jacob, Israel, a prince of God. Simon, the swearing backslider, can become Peter, the Apostle of Pentecost. Mark, the coward, can become the courageous standby of St. Paul. The worst boy in the class may become the best man in the church. The career which the world pronounces hopeless and casts away in faithless scorn may, through the hand of the Master, become a thing of beauty and a joy forever.—Canadian Churchman.

Three Measures.

Of all things far, I love the best,
The distance from the east to west;
For, by that space, and all within,
God's mercy parts me from my sin.

And best I love, of all things high,
The space between the earth and sky;
For, by that height beyond all ken
God's love exceeds the love of men.

I love, of deep things undefiled
A father's pity for his child;
For by that depth, so far, so clear,
God pities all that faint and fear.

O Father, Father, endless kind,
I thank Thee for my human mind;
But chief of all my praise shall be
That mind cannot encompass Thee.

—Amos R. Wells.

For the Southern Churchman.

"Not Where to Lay His Head."

Luke 9:58.

Jane Dalziel Wood.

The stormy night is like a cavern dark with gloom
Illumed by fitful torch—
For now and then a zigzag streak of blazing light
In rending all the skies, would seem to burn and sear
And scorch.

I never hear the rain like mighty waters flooding,
Nor wind in frightful blast—
I never feel the rumble of the distant thunder,
But that I turn my wistful thoughts to Galilee's
Far past.

'Tis then I fancy that I mingle with the throng—
So near to Him I'm led
I hear, "The foxes have their holes to shelter them,
The birds of flight have nests, but I, not where to lay
My head."

And then I fancy, just because it makes more real
The great sad truth He taught,
The skies grow black, the thunder rolls,
the clouds droop low,
Before the winds and drenching rain the people fly
Distraught.

But I alone, of all the throng, go not away—
Creep softly to His view,
And then a great sob chokes my throat and cramps my heart,
For in His face I see that noble sadness seen
By few.

"Dear Lord" (how quick He smiles with ready hand outstretched,
His sympathetic way),
"I think my heart will break unless Thou willst to come
And let me shelter Thee beneath our humble roof
Till day."

And then He puts His gentle hand in mine without demur—
Through wind and rain we go,
And when at last we stand within my mother's door,
He lifts His hand above my head and says, as I
Bow low:

"My child, thou pray'st Me to spend a little time with thee
While wind and rain sweep past,
And thou hast feared that even that was much to ask;
Yet dost thou know? that with My Presence comes a life
So vast.

That where It is all else dies out in gloom and dark.
Light, Love and Life am I,
And so I will not give thee just a fleeting glimpse
Of glorious Light, triumphant Love and Life—
Draw nigh.

Then—then withdraw Myself, and leave thee poor and blind,
Soul quickened, but bereaved;
Nay, child, I enter here—I Who Am Love and Light—
And stay to teach thee of that Life that mind hath not Conceived."

For the Young Folks

His Way.

He taught them His new simple law
Of right 'twixt God and man,
And showed them how from that would grow
Right too 'twixt man and man.

He taught that every man should do
As he would be done by,
For as man gives so he receives,
With utmost equity.

Give love and love will fill your life;
Give hate and hate is yours;
For as you give so you receive,
And shall while life endures.
—John Oxenhaam.

For the Southern Churchman.

"Laurie May Changes Her Mind."

Ethel Nelson.

"Oh, I wish I could die. Nothing ever happens." Laurie May spoke in the tone of one who might just have received his death sentence instead of a seventeen-year-old school girl. "It's school, school, school until I just hate the word. I never have any fun. I am going to kill myself."

Laurie May was so disgruntled with herself and the world in general that the words came thick and fast. She stood gazing out of the window upon a wonderfully beautiful scene. The park across the street was just turning green. The great beds of jonquils and hiacinths and all of the beautiful spring flowers were in bloom. The birds were singing like a full orchestra. But none of this Laurie May saw. It was a sad, gloomy old world to her, full of things no one wanted to look at or see or do. She was sick of it all.

Mrs. Willoughby glanced up from her sewing, but kept a discreet silence. She understood her daughter thoroughly. She added a few more stitches and waited. Laurie May never listened to reason or took advice until her irritation was quite spent. It would soon be time for the examinations and she knew that the girl was having to work very hard at school.

"I don't see any good it all does, anyway. What do I care for algebra or arithmetic. It is put in to make it hard for us. They just want to make us work." The tears in her voice warned her mother that it was time to interfere.

"Dear." Her mother spoke in an even gentle tone. "Suppose, before you quite completely do away with yourself, that you take some things over to Mrs. Imboden for me. She is quite ill, and I know poor little Emily has more than she can do, with those children on her hands, to take the proper care of her mother."

"Emily has not been at school for several days." Laurie May spoke in an entirely different tone. She liked Emily very much. "But I did not know that her mother was ill."

"Yes, she has had quite a spell. I have the things all ready if you will take them."

"Yes, I will take them." The answer lacked enthusiasm, but there was at least a show of interest in it.

Laurie May took the tray in one hand and a bouquet of flowers in the other and started for the little yellow house that stood on the street back of them. Just as she reached the kitchen door Emily was tying the baby into his high chair and saying in a very tired voice:

"Now, Jackie dear, sit still like a good little boy until Emie gives mother some supper."

Jackie let himself be tied into the chair very nicely, but at the mention of supper an S. O. S. came from somewhere in the region of his own little tummy, and beating a regular dinner march on the arm of his chair, began in a deafening wail:

"Jackie wants tupper; Jackie wants tupper."

As soon as she could make herself heard Laurie May was invited to come in, and Jackie, astonished at seeing a stranger in their midst, became as quiet as a mouse, much to the relief of Laurie May, who was becoming quite bewildered by the confusion.

"Mother sent over a little lunch for your mother," Laurie May explained as she handed the tray to Emily.

"Thank you ever so much," the other answered. "I have been wondering what to fix and just how to do it. It is so hard to cook, especially for one who has been sick so long."

"Eat, eat." Jackie had again found his voice, and it had lost none of its luster.

"Oh, dear, I will have to let mother wait until I have given you some supper."

And Jackie became as quiet as could be when Emily placed before him a generous bowl of milk and bread. While Emily was giving her mother the dainty lunch Laurie May had brought, Jackie jabbered away between bites at such a rate Laurie May could hardly understand him, but when Emily returned she found them both laughing and talking, apparently having a great time and the best of friends.

"I don't see how you ever get lonely with such a dear little baby to love and play with all of the time," Laurie May said.

"'All of the time' is right," Emily answered. "That is the trouble. With father away and mother sick I have so little time to myself. Sometimes I just envy you with all of that big house and no one to bother you when you want to study."

"Envy me? I did not know any one ever envied me."

"Well, I do. It seems to me that my lessons would just naturally do themselves if I could have all of the room and quiet you have. Of course," she added, "I would want mother and the children afterwards."

She smiled at Jackie and leaned over to kiss him, and at the same time he decided to return the affection, and reaching up with his spoon, patted her on the head. Emily scolded him a little, but the girls both had a hearty laugh over it, and Mrs. Imboden, hearing them, called to know what they were doing.

"Come in and see mother a few minutes." Emily untied Jackie and they went into her room. Laurie May wondered as they went in just what one said to an invalid, but her fears were lost and forgotten in the warm smile of welcome she received, and she was no longer a stranger, but one of the merry party and the jolly time they had.

"Why, mother," she said a little later that evening; "we had the best time. It was just like a party. Mrs. Imboden was so jolly, and yet she knows that she will have to stay in bed at least two weeks longer; and Emily is going to come over every night to study with me. She has lost so much time since her mother has been sick, and I am sure I can help her quite a lot."

"Yes, I am sure you can. I am glad that you thought of asking her," and her mother added to herself, "Emily can help you."

"Mother," added Laurie May, "may I let Emily wear my new May Day dress for class night and graduation? They cannot afford to have one made, and Mrs. Imboden was going to try to make one while she is still in bed."

"Why not give it to her?"

"Oh, mother, if I could! I would just love to do something for them."

"Mother." Laurie May stood in the door of her mother's bedroom, clad in her night-dress, her yellow hair loosened from its ribbons, and falling over her shoulders in a mass of curls, a picture of loveliness and youth. Her big blue eyes were dancing with merriment.

"I am not going to kill myself just yet. I have too much to do. And besides, I find that I really enjoy living."

"Dear," the mother answered, as she kissed the girl good-night, "you have found that one secret of living happily lies in the happiness of giving to others."

For the Southern Churchman.

A Night Adventure.

Claude M. Lee, Jr., Age 9 Years.

Once upon a time there was a little boy named John. One night his father and mother went out to supper, and so he went to bed early.

In the night he woke up with a start, for in the yard he heard a rustle in the bushes, and as there were no cats or dogs around there, he knew it must be a thief.

To make sure, he tiptoed to the window and peeped out. There in the dark he saw creeping cautiously along the dark form of a man.

He jumped back, and hunting up his clothes, he quickly put them on. Then he got his 22-rifle and some cartridges. Then he went downstairs and out the back door. But scarcely had he gone out than he saw the same figure he saw before, and it was creeping along.

John jumped back and hid until the man had gone by, and then John followed the man, keeping under the shadow of the house so that he could not be seen.

Finally the man stopped, and pulling a bottle of oil out of his pocket, he poured it on to the frame of the kitchen door. Then he started to set fire to it, but before he could do so John rushed forward and yelled at the man.

The man turned around, and, loading his pistol, fired! But the pistol did not go off. John raised his gun and fired, but his gun also did not go off! Now it was too late to shoot again, for the robber had already loaded his pistol and started to fire, but John was too quick. He threw aside his rifle; he rushed at the robber, and seizing the robber's arm, started to break it. With a yell the robber let go of the pistol and tried to free himself. In an instant John had the pistol, and pointing it at the robber, ordered him to go to the gate. Then John made the robber go to the police station, where the police locked the robber up.

The next morning a policeman came to John's house and gave him five dollars for the rrobber's arrest. When John's father and mother asked him why he got the money he told them, and they were very proud of their brave boy.

Why Johnny Failed.

Johnny had a little mind;
It was his very own,
And nothing could be put in it
Except by him alone.
It wasn't very big, it's true,
But there was room inside
For lots of things, chosen out
As Johnny should decide.

Mother and father gave him
All sorts of good advice;
But Johnny never put it in
Or thought about it twice;
But all the ugly things the boys
Upon the corners said,
Why, Johnny picked them up at once
And put them in his head.

At school the teacher tried her best
To give him facts and rules
Of every useful sort—but no,
For Johnny hated schools.
He picked up brag and vulgar slang,
Dime novels, too, ten deep;
And filled his mind till it was like
A tainted rubbish heap.

So when the day of manhood came.
When Johnny searched his mind
For skill and power it played him false
And nothing could he find
But worthless trash and ugly thoughts.
And so he failed, alas!
Is any other boy who reads
Coming to Johnny's pass?

—Exchange.

Thank You.

"That was a fine lunch you put up for Fred," declared Joe to his chum's sister, Ruth. The two boys had just come back from a day in the woods and were resting on Joe's veranda.

"I'm glad it tasted good," replied Ruth.

"It surely did, and everything was wrapped up so nicely in waxed paper—no cake crumbs sticking to the bread. Mother was away, so I just had to pick up anything I could find myself, and it was pretty poor picking. I guess I ate more than my share of Fred's feed. And those pieces of maple sugar tucked 'way down in the bottom were fine, a regular surprise."

"I thought you'd like them," Ruth returned. "They were the last of some sent to us from Vermont. I've been saving them for a special occasion."

"Your sister surely takes the prize for putting up lunches," Joe went on.

"Yes, I suppose she does do it pretty well," Fred assented.

The two boys sauntered off toward Joe's house. Ruth's cheeks were glowing happily.

"How nice it is to be thanked," she said to herself. "Fred never thinks to tell me he likes my lunches. But, come to think of it, I wonder if I always think to thank him and other people, too."

She reflected a minute.

"There's a book Aunt Ellen sent me on my birthday. I wrote her a polite note, of course, but I hadn't read the book then, and it was so good and I've had so much fun lending it to the other girls! I believe I'll sit right down now and tell Aunt Ellen how much I really enjoyed it.

"And I'm sure I never said more than a bare thank you to Fred for cleaning my bicycle. I'll try to remember to tell him how much better it runs when he comes back. I've been taking a lot of things for granted. I believe I'll try to remember how good a thank you makes you feel after this."

—Rebecca Deming Moore, in Exchange.

Little Faults.

One little drop of water isn't much. Yet the biggest flood that ever happened began with just one drop of rain. One little bad fault isn't much, you may think, but if it is repeated often enough it will soon grow into a very big one, indeed. One little disobedient act doesn't make a boy or girl bad, perhaps you will say; but every time you disobey willfully, makes it just that much easier to do wrong again. After awhile you will find that you do not feel half so sorry when you fail to mind mother as you did the first time. One little habit may seem like a small thing to make a fuss about, but habits grow just as boys and girls do, and many times a great deal faster. The older a habit grows the harder it is to fight. So if you set about it right away to get rid of that troublesome habit, you will not have half so hard a fight as you will if you wait until you are older. Every time you break yourself of a small habit you make yourself just that much stronger to fight the big habits that big folks find so hard to conquer.

Just one cross word or one ugly frown will not spoil a sweet child, but every time you allow a cross word to pass your lips it makes it just that much harder to choke back the bad feelings next time. Before you know it you will find that ugly words and cross answers are slipping out before you have time to think. Begin right now to stop saying cross words. Practice smiling every time you feel cross. and see if you cannot think of something nice to say when things seem to go wrong. Good habits grow just as fast as bad ones. and if you try hard enough the good ones will be able to drive all the bad faults away.—Jennie E. Stewart.

The Sentinel.

The morning is the gate of day;
But ere you enter there
See that you set, to guard it well,
The sentinel of prayer.
So shall God's grace your steps attend,
But nothing else pass through
Save what can give the countersign—
The Father's Will for you.

THE IRISH HOME RULE QUESTION.

Protestants of Ulster are opposed to "Home Rule," which is simply Roman Rule. This book is informing, awakening. Friends are contributing to send it to Congressmen, Governors and others. Are you a lover of the Bible, a Protestant? Read and circulate this book. Price 30c, 4 for $1. Order today.

PENTECOSTAL PUB. CO., Louisville, Ky.

The South's Best Book Store

HUNTER & CO

105 E. Broad Street
Richmond, Va.

Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen
Prompt and Reliable Service

Spring Styles

NOW READY

Have Your Old Hat Fixed Like New

Many customers use their old hats by having them made over for their children. We specialize on children's hats.

PARCEL POST DEPARTMENT AT YOUR SERVICE.

VERRA HAT WORKS

211 NORTH FIRST STREET
RANDOLPH 90

The Wing-Foot Electric Shoe Repair Shop

ALL KINDS OF GENERAL REPAIRING

Mail Orders a Specialty

Owned and Managed by T. A. BUNNELL
311 N. Second St. Phone Ran. 1286-W

Earn Extra Dollars in Your Spare Hours

You need no experience to be successful—You can learn as you earn. Let us tell you about our plan.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN is the oldest Episcopal Church Paper published in America. Every dollar received in subscriptions will be devoted to the improvement of the paper and the extension of its service in the work of the Church.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

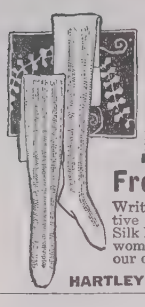
Street.....



"The Store That Pleases"

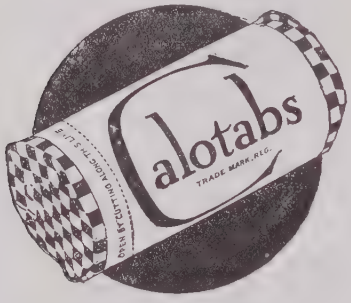
FOR FURNITURE

JONES BROS. & CO.

INCORPORATED

1418 East Main St. :-: Richmond, Va

SILK HOSE
DIRECT TO YOU



Saves you 25c to 60c a pair. Our leader —Ladies' full-fashioned, highest grade pure silk stockings, five-thread linen spliced heel and toe: $2.60 a pair, three pairs $6.00. Strongest and best wearing hosiery on the market. Money back if not satisfied.

Free Samples showing colors and quality of silk.

Write for these today with new descriptive Price List of our full line of Silk, Silk Lisle, Fibre Silk and Cotton hosiery for women, misses, men and children—all at our direct-to-you money-saving prices.

HARTLEY HOSIERY CO., Louisville, Ky.

Renew your health by purifying your system with

Quick and delightful relief for biliousness, colds, constipation, headaches, and stomach, liver and blood troubles.

The genuine are sold only in 35c packages. Avoid imitations.

Service

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE
CARPETS DRAPERIES

R. L. Christian & Company

514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.

Leading Fancy Grocer

AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.

Catalogue mailed on application.

Playing Animals.

Did you ever watch bear cubs box? Probably not; few of us have the chance. Yet they do box, and that with Queensbury rules of their own. Ever really watch kittens wrestling, or lambs gamboling? Why not? All of us have the chance. And the games of animals are as interesting as those of man.

Animals don't play in any haphazard fashion. Far from it. Each different species has his own racial habit of play. Some of them are curiously well organized. Monkeys play "tag" with a certain regard for a few simple understood rules; squirrels play "follow my leader," insects perform intricate dances in the air; kids run races together; otters slide for the agreeable sensation of sliding; and even the clumsy fur-seal does a two-step all summer long on the foggy beach of his Pribilov Islands. Sham-hunts and sham-fights are common. Many birds, such as the magpie and the jackdaw, have collecting fads, and the bowerbird builds a playhouse to play in.

Play is the young form of work. Play is educative. The animals who play best when young, work best afterwards, live best and thus hand on to their children the same love of play. A most important point is that the animals which man has succeeded in domesticating are notably the playing animals.

There are two kinds of play in animals, one of movement only, which trains the muscles and the nerves to the work of life. The other is the play of experiment, finding out what other things are. So, in ourselves, any amusement or play which quickens the muscles or the nerves, or which helps us to find out about something or some one, is worth while. The cleverest man or woman is often the one who never gets too old to play.—Presbyterian Banner.

An Easter Story.

The fuzzy caterpillar crawled along on the garden path. It took him a long, long time to crawl from the poppy-bed to the rosebush.

There he stopped to rest. And there, perched on a branch, was a yellow bird, only the caterpillar did not see the yellow bird. He could not because he was too close to the ground.

"Are the poppies blooming?" called the yellow bird.

"I do not know, for I could not see," said the caterpillar.

"What a pity!" said the yellow bird. "It's such a beautiful country up here where we can see everything. I suppose you don't even know that the rosebush has a pink rose?"

"I can crawl up and see that," said the caterpillar, but he got started up the wrong branch, and could not find the pink rose. There was no one to tell him where it was, for the yellow bird had flown away to the tip-top of a tree.

"Come up! come up!" called he. "I can see the beautiful country far and wide."

The caterpillar tried, but when he had crawled a little way he felt sleepy, so he spun a stout thread and fastened himself to the end of a twig. He grew very stiff and forgot about everything, just as you forget when you are asleep. And he slept a long time.

Then, one lovely, sunny day, he woke up, and—what do you think?—he was not a caterpillar at all, but a yellow butterfly, drying his wings on the same twig on which he had gone to sleep!

"Why don't you fly?" called the yellow bird, perching near. "Why don't you fly and enjoy the beautiful country, butterfly?"

This was the first time the butterfly knew he was a butterfly. His wings were dry and he did fly, in the sunshine, over the flowers, high in the air. He found it was a beautiful country where one need not keep close to the ground, and where one need not sleep and forget, and where everything was bright and fair.—Selected.

R. Geissler, Inc.

56 West Eighth Street, New York

Memorials
FOR THE CHURCH
Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

DISTANCE

Makes no difference to Berry patrons—our Mail Order Department can serve you anywhere; delivery free.

Write for our new catalogue of MEN'S and BOY'S CLOTHING.

The South's "Old Home" store with new blood and best values!

O. N. Berry Co.
ESTABLISHED 1879

Main and 11th Sts., Richmond, Va.

Jno. L. Williams & Sons

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565)
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds.

NICK BULL'S MARKET,

Richmond's Leading Dealer in

FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME

312 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va

Phone Randolph 1680

WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

WAITING

Millions Are Waiting For Death—or Your Aid

China is now in the grip of the world's greatest famine. Six million lives must perish before July 1st unless aid reaches them from America. Tragedy eclipsing anything seen during the World War now stalks the length and breadth of the five most populous provinces of North China. Thousands are dying every day, amid scenes of unspeakable suffering.

AMERICA'S OPPORTUNITY

The Church of Christ in America was never presented with such an opportunity for exemplifying the spirit of Christ. For many years we have been sending the Word of God to the people of China, and that Word says:

"Whoso hath this world's goods, and seeeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him? My little children, let us not love in word, neither 'u tongue; but in deed and in truth."

YOU MUST HELP

This message comes direct to you. As a Christian man or woman, living comfortably amid plenty, knowing nothing of the pangs of hunger nor lack of food, the Word of the Lord comes directly to you in this moment of China's supreme need.

It has not been given to you, as it has been to Bishop W. R. Lambuth, to see the actual suffering. The bishop saw, and his message to American Christians is:

"China famine situation entering the acute stage. Crisis comes last of April. Thousands dying. Manchuria can furnish food and Chinese government transportation. Reliable committees distribute relief. The imperative need is money. Exchange is in our favor; one dollar will now save a life. America has saved millions already. Prompt action will save two million more. Missionaries, merchants and Chinese are working together. They will do their part if we do ours. God calls; humanity appeals. It is up to us to finish the task. We must do it in the next sixty days."

Let no man or woman who professes to love God fail to heed this cry of a people in the last throes of distress.

THE SOUTHERN COMMITTEE

DR. W. B. BEAUCHAMP, Nashville, Chairman.

Vice Chairmen

DR. E. Y. MULLENS, Louisville, Ky.
DR. EGBERT W. SMITH, Nashville, Tenn.
DR. CAREY E. MORGAN, Nashville, Tenn.
BISHOP W. A. GUERRY, Charleston, S. C.
BISHOP E. G. RICHARDSON, Atlanta, Ga
DR. GEORGE R. MACK, Nashville, Tenn.
DR. W. W. ALEXANDER, Atlanta, Ga.

Members

DR. GEORGE R. STUART, Birmingham, Alabama.
DR. L. E. McNAIR, Jacksonville, Fla.
BISHOP THEODORE D. BRATTON, Jackson, Miss.
DR. GEORGE SUMMY, New Orleans, La.
JOHN J. EAGAN, Atlanta, Ga.
CHARLES M. NORFLEET, Winston-Salem, N. C.
T. S. SOUTHGATE, Norfolk, Va.

WHAT YOUR PENNIES CAN DO:

1 cent buys a meal.
3 cents saves a life for a day.
$1.00 saves a life for a month.
$2.00 saves a mother and baby a month.
$5.00 saves a family for a month.
$10.00 saves a mother and babe till harvest.
$25.00 saves a family till harvest.

WHERE TO SEND YOUR CONTRIBUTION

If the Southern Committee for China Famine Fund has no representative in your community, give your contribution to your bank or send it to Vernon Munroe, Treasurer, China Famine Fund, Bible House, New York City.

China Famine Fund

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

FAMINE RELIEF.

For the convenience of our readers we publish the addresses of the treasurers of the various Relief Funds whose appeals for the starving, and especially for starving children are so urgent and touching. The Southern Churchman will forward contributions to any of these, but to save time, postage and possibility of miscarriage, checks would better be sent directly to the treasurers as below:

Near East Relief (formerly "Armenian and Syrian Relief")—Cleveland H. Dodge, No. 1 Madison Ave., New York City.

European Relief (Central and Eastern Europe)—Franklin K. Lane, 42 Broadway, New York City; or locally for Virginia, DeSoto Fitzgerald, 218 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.

Chinese Famine Relief—Remit through Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer, Presiding Bishop and Council, 281 Fourth Ave., New York City.

PIPE ORGANS

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID in building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

I take this method of thanking my many clients for their past patronage, and assure them I am still selling Spirella corsets, and can be reached at the Wallerstein, Apartment 202, or by phone, Randolph 3694-W. MISS MYRTLE McDONNELL.

DON'T TRY ON YOUR NEW DRESSES over your old corset. Let us help you select and fit to you the corset that does greatest justice to your figure. The Corset Shop, 317 N. Fifth St. Mrs. A. J. Pyle, Prop. Phone Ran. 3397.

Doll Skirts Accordion Pleated Free. ASHBY B. PYLE, 315 N. 5th St. Hemstitching, Pinking and Button Covering.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER

Invites you to inspect her line of GAGE Tailored HATS. Also the ADVANCE Showing of Spring Hats in the most attractive shapes.

209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

NIAGARA METAL WEATHER STRIPS

Saves 25 per cent. Fuel, Prevents Rattling Windows, keeps out Dust, Dirt and Storm.

CINCINNATI REWIRABLE METAL AND WOOD FRAME SCREENS.

L. F. HEROLD,
2 N. 11th St., Richmond, Va.
Phone Randolph 3550.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue T. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

A GENTLEMAN DESIRES WHOLESOME country board and pleasant room with open fire, in well-bred Virginia family. Piedmont or mountains. Kindly send terms, location, etc., to "B. R.," care of Southern Churchman

HELP WANTED

YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCATION AND refinement wanted to enter the St. John's Hospital Training School for Nurses (Episcopal), Brooklyn, N. Y. Applicants required to have one year of high school or its equivalent. Course three years. A registered school of high standing. Nurses receive remuneration. Many social privileges. Home life pleasant. Graduates are now receiving $6.00 per day. Apply to St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED—A REFINED, CAPABLE woman as mother's helper. Two small children in family. Write Mrs. W. Holmes Robertson, Gainesville, Va.

Henley Frank M. electn h 2228 Hr WANTED POSITION AS (TRAVELING) companion to a lady, by a lady of pleasing personality. For information address Rev. R. R. Phelps, 105 Pine Street, Berkley (Norfolk), Va.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

Smith-Hart: Married, on Saturday, April 2nd, PEYTON McGUIRE SMITH, son of Rev. and Mrs. Claudius F. Smith, of Lynchburg, Va., to MRS. MAUDE PEMBERTON HART, of Chattanooga, Tenn.

Badger: At Raleigh, N. C., Monday, April 4, "in the communion of the Catholic Church," BETTIE AUSTIN BADGER, wife of the late Richard Cogdell Badger, of Raleigh, N. C., and daughter of the late Alexander A. Austin and Martha Williams (Joyner) Austin, of "Woodlawn," Halifax County, N. C.

"Eternal rest grant unto her, O Lord, and may light perpetual shine upon her."

Bruce: In Maryland, after a long illness, on Thursday, March 17, 1921, JOSEPH REID ANDERSON BRUCE, son of the late Thomas Seddon Bruce and Mary Anderson Bruce. Laid to rest in Hollywood, Richmond, Va.

"In Thy light shall we see light. O, continue Thy loving kindness unto them that know Thee; and Thy righteousness to the upright in heart."

MRS. BLAIR WILSON PEGRAM.

MRS. BLAIR WILSON PEGRAM passed away peacefully Saturday morning, March 19, 1921, at the residence of her son-in-law, Mr. Charles W. Warren, Smithfield, Va., and was buried at "Old Lower Surry Church," Surry County, Sunday evening at 3, March 20.

Mrs. Pegram was born at "Woodlawn," Surry County, Va., May 6, 1838, and married June 5, 1855. She lived in Surry County until the year of her golden wedding, 1905, when she moved to Smithfield, Isle of Wight County, Va. On January 19, 1916, she lost her life companion after sixty-one years of happy married life. This left her stunned and bruised. While not complaining, she never fully recovered from the shock, and she had been an entire invalid for several years.

She leaves two daughters, Mrs. T. N. Jones and Mrs. C. W. Warren, and one grandson, W. P. Warren, all of Smithfield, Va.

A loyal, loving wife, a devoted mother, a faithful friend, a warm-hearted and sacrificing Christian has gone to rest.

RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT.

At a meeting of the vestry of Abingdon Church, held on January 22, 1921, in Abingdon Church, Gloucester County, Va., the Rev. William Byrd Lee, our rector, tendered his resignation, to take effect June 30, 1921.

Therefore, the vestry, in accepting the resignation of its beloved rector, embodies in its resolutions its sense of its great and deep loss.

Therefore, be it resolved—

First. That we wish to express to him, in terms of the most sincere affection and regard, that after nearly thirty-six years' untiring Christian labor in our parish, and ever heedful to the calls of all humanity, that it would be selfish on our part to ask him to reconsider his decision.

Second. We further wish to express to him our heartfelt appreciation of his unselfish devotion to his church and people. Our great loss is tempered by the welcome knowledge that he is to remain in our midst ever ready in future, as in the past, to succour and help the sorrowing and afflicted in his ever tender Christian spirit.

Third. Therefore be it resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the records of this vestry, a copy published in the Southern Churchman, and copy forwarded to the Rev. William Byrd Lee.

(Signed) THE COMMITTEE.

AN UNPRECEDENTED Free Trial Offer of HYMN BOOKS
100 COPIES OF THE NEW "KING OF SONG BOOKS"

GLAD TIDINGS IN SONG

(Just off the press)—188 pages—314 songs
Compiled by 100 leading evangelists

Will be send Free, prepaid to any Church, Sunday School, Young People's Society or other religious organization,

For One month's Free Trial

If not satisfied, you may return the books and we will pay the freight or express both ways. If satisfied, send us the money for the books.

Returnable Sample Copy Sent on Request

Cloth, 45c; prepaid, 50c. Limp, 35c; prepaid, 40c. Manila, 30c; prepaid, 35c.

ABRIDGED EDITION

96 pages—107 hymns
Manila, 15c, prepaid. 12 1-2c, not prepaid.
Limp Cloth, 20c, prepaid. 17 1-2c, not prepaid.

THE GLAD TIDINGS PUBLISHING CO
202 S. Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois.

Rockford College

A Standard College For Modern Women

A college of distinguished graduates, seventy years of fine traditions and high standards of scholarship. A. B., B. S., A. M. degrees.

Reservations Limited

Send for Catalog

Wm. A. Maddox, Ph. D., Pres.
Box 478, Rockford, Illinois

Cuticura Soap
—Imparts—
The Velvet Touch

Soap, Ointment, Talcum 25c. everywhere. For samples address: Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. V, Malden, Mass.

I am not careful for what may be a hundred years hence. He who governed the world before I was born shall take care of it likewise when I am dead. My part is to improve the present moment.—John Wesley.

The door of death has become not a door to take Christ from us, but a door to take us to Christ.—James I. Vance.

Personal Notes

The Rev. S. Arthur Huston, rector of Christ Church, Baltimore, has accepted a call to St. Mark's Church, San Antonio, Tex., succeeding Bishop Coadjutor Stevens, of Los Angeles.

Colonel, the Rev. Charles C. Pierce. D. D., chief of the Graves Registration Service of the Army, is in Europe as head of the commission for beautifying our permanent military cemeteries in England and France.

The Rev. B. D. Tucker, Jr., D. D., Professor of Ecclesiastical Polity and Pastoral Theology at the Theological Seminary in Virginia, Alexandria, has been called to Trinity Church, Columbia, S. C., in succession to the Rev. K. G. Finlay, D. D., recently consecrated Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese of South Carolina.

The Rev. Randall W. Conklin has resigned the charge of St. Alban's Mission and St. George's Mission, Newark, and accepted the rectorship of St. Stephen's Church, Riverside, N. J., to take effect May 1.

The Rev. J. C. M. Shrewsbury, of Calicoon, in the Diocese of New York, has accepted a call to Trinity Church, Shamokin, Pa. His first services there were on Sunday, April 3.

The Rev. J. K. Burleson has resigned his position as assistant at St. Paul's Church, Rochester, N. Y., with the intention of taking up work in South Dakota under his brother, the Bishop of that missionary jurisdiction.

The Rev. Floyd Appleton, Ph. D., has resigned the rectorship of St. Paul's, Harrisburg, Pa., and accepted a call to Christ Church, Danville. After Sunday, April 10, his address will be Danville, Pa.

The Rev. W. E. Grimshaw, rector of St. Thomas' Church, Croome, Md., will take charge of Trinity Church, Fayatteville, N. Y., and St. Mark's, Jamiesville, about the middle of April.

The Rev. Dr. Carl E. Grammer, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Philadelphia, has become a member of the editorial staff of The Chronicle.

The Rev. Frank M. Johnson, Jr., has become General Missionary of the Big Bend District, with address at Marfa, Tex.

The Rev. Lawrence R. Kelly, formerly curate at St. Paul's Church, Albany, N. Y., has accepted a position on the clergy staff at the Chapel of the Intercession, New York City.

The Rev. William B. Allen, for the past ten years connected with the District of Asheville, has become rector of St. Michael's Church, Tucumcari, N. M.

Ordinations.

On Tuesday, March 29, Q. E. Primo, colored, was ordained to the diaconate by the Bishop of Georgia, at St. John's Mission, Albany, Ga. The Rev. P. M. P. Carrington, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, colored, Thomasville, preached the ordination sermon.

In Emmanuel Church, Memphis, Tenn., on March 19, the Rev. James Aladuhi Johnson was ordained priest by Bishop-Coadjutor Beatty. He was presented by the Rev. W. C. Robertson, and the sermon was preached by Bishop Demby. The Rev. Messrs. B. B. Ramage, Charles T. Wright, A. H. Noll, LL. D., and J. Henry King united in the imposition of hands; and the Rev. Mart Gary Smith, deacon, was present in the chancel. The Rev. Mr. Johnson becomes rector of Emmanuel Church, Memphis.

On Saturday, April 2, in Emmanuel Church, East Syracuse, N. Y., Bishop

JUST READY

More "FIVE-MINUTE TALKS"

By Walter R. Bowie, D.D.

SUNNY WINDOWS

Author of "The Children's Year"

AND OTHER SERMONS

Here is another volume of Dr. Bowie's talks to youngsters, all attractively suited to the child mind. The subjects are arresting themes, calculated to almost invariably catch the attention of boy or girl--while the treatment thereof is simplicity itself.

As the Record of Christian Work said: "Dr. Bowie's talks are capital--straight to the hearts of children, clever, interesting, helpful."

Cloth, $1.25 net

For Sale by

Southern Churchman Co., Richmond, Va.

Church Furnishings, Memorials, etc.

MOLLER PIPE ORGANS

Highest grade instruments. In use in three thous. and churches. Every organ specially designed for the church and service in which it is to be used and fully guranteed. Specifications and estimates on request. Correspondence solicited.

M. P. MÖLLER

Hagerstown, Maryland.

CHURCH VESTMENTS

Cassocks, Surplices, Stoles

EMBROIDERIES

Silks, Cloths, Fringes

CLERICAL SUITS

Rabats, Collars, Shirts

COX SONS & VINING

2 Madison Avenue New York

CHURCH VESTMENTS

Gold, Silver and Brass

Church and Chancel Furniture

Write for Catalogue for Episcopal Churches

W. & E. SCHMIDT CO.

108 Third Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS

Largest stock in the South

We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival

The Couper Marble Works

(Established 65 years)

264-268 Bank St., Norfolk, Va.

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.

Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor

Richmond, Va.

Fiske advanced to the priesthood the Rev. James Francis Root. The Ven. H. W. Foreman preached and the Rev. E. C. Tuthill presented the candidate. The Rev. Theodore Haydn said the Litany, the Rev. S. F. Burhans read the Epistle, and the Rev. A. A. Jaynes the Gospel. Among those present was a delegation of Indians from the Onondaga Reservation. Following the service luncheon was served in the new parish house. The Rev. Mr. Root, who has been in charge of Emmanuel Church and of the services at the Indian Reservation, will continue in this field.

Deaths.

The Rev. Fred W. Crook died of pneumonia on Monday, March 21, in a hospital in San Francisco, Cal. Funeral services were conducted by Bishop Moreland in Holy Trinity Church, Uklah, of which he had been priest in charge for twenty-three years.

The Rev. Owen F. Jones, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Baker, Ore., died a few weeks ago in a Portland Sanatorium, following a nervous breakdown.

No Strangers.

There ought to be no strangers in this little vale of tears;
I haven't seen a stranger's face for years and years and years.
I see, of course, some people that I never saw before,
But they're just like the others that I've known in days of yore.
They've felt and known the self-same things the rest have known and felt.
They'll freeze up for unfriendly folks, for kindly ones they'll melt.
They've each one had a sorrow that they thought they couldn't bear,
But bore it, just as people do with sorrows everywhere.
There ought to be no strangers in this so-called world of woe!
I see new people that I love, just everywhere I go.
And every one has felt some joy that I had felt some time;
And each has had his little dream of higher slopes to climb;
And each has known the sweets of home
at some time or another;
And nearly every man you meet will rave about his mother.
They thrill at things that thrill me, too,
these friends I never met—
There ought to be no strangers in this misnamed world of fret.

—Strickland Gillian.

For the Southern Churchman.

The Bishop's Work.

This is a true story of a Bishop's daughter. A member of a parish in the city in which the Bishop lives telephoned the Bishop's residence to ask "Mrs. Bishop" to receive at a tea. The telephone was answered by the Bishop's daughter, who replied to the invitation with this statement: "Mother is out of town. She is in A—— with father, who has gone to desecrate a church." The surprised ejaculation of the listener made the Rt. Rev.'s daughter realize her mistake, and she quickly corrected, "O, I mean to consecrate a church!"

It harms us to think evil; it harms us even more to say what we think. It is for this reason that silence is so often golden. But it is also on the same general principle that it is worth while to speak a pleasant word—if we can do no more.—Christian Work.

The Best of the New Things for Springtime

In the enthusiastic seeking of "lower prices" which seems to have become so general during recent months, there is danger, we think, of overstepping the bounds of true economy and mistaking the cheap and tawdry for the low-in-price.

This is one reason why you will find a visit to this store particularly helpful at this time, in fulfilling your plans for the new season.

No unworthy goods may find a place among the stocks, and we think you may safely rely upon our taste and good judgment in selection.

And while everything here is of the same high, dependable quality that has always been characteristic at MILLER & RHOADS, prices are now materially lower.

To-day the store is gaily decked out in its spring-time dress, splendidly ready to serve your every need, whether for articles of apparel and personal adornment or for the home.

Miller & Rhoads

"The Shopping Center" Richmond, Va.

"If you want a bank with a heart, try the American National"

This is a bit of advice one of our customers gave to a friend who was coming to Richmond.

Our modesty would never lay claim to such a title, but as it was given us unsolicited, we ask you to put us to the test.

American National Bank
Richmond, Va.

Have You Made Your Will?

See G. Jeter Jones, Vice-President, about this now. All conferences confidential. Phone or write for appointment.

Merchants National Bank
11th and Main Streets, Richmond, Va.

"SAFEST FOR TRUSTS"

Sacramental Wine

Absolutely Pure Grape Wine

Made expressly for use at the Communion Table

Established 1857

Phone, Write or Call Tel. Cortlandt 3001

H.T. Dewey & Sons Co.

Address Either

138 Fulton Street, New York City or Cellars, Egg Harbor, New Jersey

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health and, above all,

Provide yourself with Traveler Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank

Richmond, Virginia

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS

FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG

S. T. Beveridge & Co.

Office: 1217 East Cary Street

Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd

Richmond, Va.

HICKORY HILL DAHLIA FARM

QUALITY DAHLIA

Box 227-C, Richmond, Va

Send for a Catalogue

HOT WATER HEAT

For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars

ARCOLA SYSTEM

R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.

9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

WHEN WRITING OUR ADVERTISERS PLEASE MENTION THIS PUBLICATION

Not Merely

a counting house, but a people's bank and a useful servant in this community.

We believe that it is the duty of any company which serves the public to be a builder of good will in its community, and that its success depends upon the efficiency of its service.

3% interest on savings and dormant accounts. Interest figured on daily balances.

Irrespective of its size, we invite your account.

Richmond Trust Company

Capital and Surplus, $1,200,000

Main and 7th Streets

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary
J. M. Leake, General Agent

E. B. Addison, Vice-President
J. C. Watson, Treasurer
Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

(Just Published)

The Gospel of Life

By the Reverend

PHILLIPS STANDISH GILMAN

Author of "The Church and the Individual," etc.

With an Introduction by

THE BISHOP OF EAST CAROLINA

A pithy book for a busy age, with a vital, practical message of divine truth for the attainment of HEALTH, HAPPINESS and HOLINESS.

READ THE FOLLOWING OPINIONS

"I pray that it may bring a fuller appreciation of all that the blessed Christ may mean to those who are willing to accept His promises and follow Him all of the way."—Bishop Darst.

"It is splendid."—Rev. H. B. Wilson, Society of the Nazarene.

"Spiritual, practical and full of the Gospel of Christ."—Rev. Prof. S. A. Wallis, D. D., Virginia Theological Seminary.

"Particularly apt and inspiring. The appendix is of tremendous value."—Rev. F. M. Wetherill, St. John's, Philadelphia.

Price, 75 Cents, Postpaid

The Southern Churchman Co.,

Richmond, Va.

Vapo Cresolene

Used for more than forty years. The benefit derived from it is unquestionable.

Established 1879

FOR more than a generation we have been receiving grateful testimony to the virtues of this thoroughly tested and proven treatment. It stops violent coughing, and difficult breathing, assuring restful sleep because the antiseptic vapor carries healing with every breath. Booklet 43 tells why the diseases for which Cresolene is recommended yield to this simple and dependable treatment.

Vapo-Cresolene is sold by druggists

VAPO-CRESOLENE CO., 62 Cortlandt St., New York

O. Luetke's Art Works

Church Furnishings

IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.

Est. 1886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

Young Men's Christian Association

Grace and Seventh Streets
Richmond, Va.

Information, Reading, Rest, Visitors Welcome

92 ROOMS FOR MEN 92

Hot and Cold Water
Shower Baths

Gymnasium, Swimming Pool, Bowling Alleys, Games, etc.
Gospel Meetings and Bible Study

For information, address

S. K. McKEE, Gen'l Sec'y
P. O. Drawer 1238

Many pens have attempted to write a Life of Christ since Canon Farrar wrote his famous volume. The difficulty with most of them is that they give so much attention to technical details they do not hold the interest of the general reader. For some time there has been need of a book that would make its appeal through its clearness and charm of treatment.

This need has now been filled by

PATERSON-SMYTH'S
NEW BOOK

A PEOPLE'S LIFE OF CHRIST

Told in a way that will be read again and again for the solid enjoyment it affords.

The Churchman says: "A book which the average man will read for the pleasure of reading it—a new and popular version for the day and generation."

ONLY $3.50 NET

THE SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO.
RICHMOND, VA.

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffein contained in each:

Black tea—1 cupful (hot) (5 fl. oz.) ..... 1.54 gr.

Green tea—1 glassful (cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice) ..... 2.02 gr.

Coca-Cola—1 drink, 8 fl. oz. (prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup) ..... .61 gr.

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

The Coca-Cola Co., Dept. J, Atlanta, Ga., U. S. A.

J1

Are You Burying Your Talents?

Have you stopped to think that, if you are keeping at home any considerable sum of money you are doing yourself a great injustice? Certainly you are, because you are depriving yourself of the interest your money should earn for you.

Let us write your name on our books.

Planters National Bank

Main and 12th Streets

Resources over $20,000,000.00

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson
Security Storage Company, Inc.

Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage

Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

Southern Churchman

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., APRIL 23, 1921. No. 17.

"Live for some earnest purpose,
Live for some noble life,
Live for the hearts that love you,
Live that you conquer strife;
Live that the world may find you,
Honest and pure of thought,
Live though it frown upon you,
Live as all true men ought."

EDUCATIONAL

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

Established A. D. 1823.

The ninety-seventh session will open on Wednesday, September 15th, 1920.

Special Students Admitted

For catalogue or other information, address the dean or Secretary.

Theological Seminary
Alexandria, Va.

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to
REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean
Petersburg, Va.

The Virginian Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-third year of this School for Boys opens September 15, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to
REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

Virginia, Chatham. Box 13.

The Chatham Episcopal Institute for Girls

Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Thorough preparation for all colleges. New buildings. Ten-acre campus. Athletics. Gymnasium. Terms moderate. Catalogue and views.

B. D. Tucker, D. D., President; Rev. C. O. Pruden, D. D., Rector; Miss Annie Marian Powell, A. B., Sweet Briar, A. M., Columbia, Prin.

Sewanee Military Academy

In heart of Cumberland Mountains, elevation 2,000 feet. College preparatory. 40-acre campus; 8,000-acre added domain. Vigorous outdoor life. All athletics. R. O. T. C. Episcopal. For catalog, address the Principal, Box 664, Sewanee, Tenn.

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each.

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

God being Love, can only be understood by those who put love into action.—Marcel Kraus.

There is only one appointed way of doing good, and that is by being good. —F. B. Mozley.

"If when in your endeavor to achieve a high purpose you meet with misunderstanding and apparent defeat, let your solace be found in the memory of Him Whose mission on earth culminated in Calvary."

"In Christ's kingdom the only greatness is usefulness and the only dominion is service."

We have too often relegated the kingdom of God to another world. The Master brought it here.—Bishop Burnett.

Though we travel the world over to find the beautiful, we must carry it with us or we find it not.—Emerson.

"Grief, nor pain, nor any sorrow
Rends thy heart to Him unknown;
He today and He tomorrow,
Grace sufficient gives His own."

Be sure of God and nothing can overthrow you.—Phillips Brooks.

Many have done more good by dying than they would by living.—N. Emmons.

What God says will always make people think, if stated in a way suited to their comprehension.—Ex.

Thy strength can make us strong indeed,
Thy love can cheer and bless,
Thy presence can refresh the soul,
E'en in a wilderness.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,
REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

St. Christopher's School

(Formerly the Chamberlayne School)

A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND VA.

Tenth session begins September 22, 1920 Tuition in boarding department limited to twenty-two boys—$700.

For catalogue, address

Rev. C. G. Chamberlayne, Ph. D., Headmaster

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.

A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. College preparatory. Boarding department 503 W. Franklin Street. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health; out-door life.
MISS ROSALIE H. NOLAND, Principal

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLES TOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

St. Paul's Girls' School

BALTIMORE

A church school where the usual Grammar and High School grades are taught; also classes in Domestic Science. Spacious building; grounds for athletics and outdoor life. Moderate tuition. A few scholarships. Address
MISS MARION MITCHELSON
2411 N. Charles St., Baltimore, Md.

Beautiful Monogram Stationery

Any monogram in red, blue, gold, or silver, on any of six colors of Linen Finish Paper, $2.00. Send for style sheet and information how to get a box. Free

WAG MFG. CO., 234 So. 8th St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Whosoever does anything to depreciate Christianity is guilty of high treason against the civilization of mankind.—Macauley.

Without faith in God and God's love and future for us, there cannot be for us any true comfort. With it we can lift our burden with serenity, and find service.—Selected.

EDUCATIONAL

IT IS WELL TO REMIND YOU

OF ST. STEPHEN'S COLLEGE

1. That it is the Church's official College for Men in the East;
2. That it is a College of the same sort and scope as Williams, Dartmouth, Amherst, Haverford, Trinity, Kenyon, Bowdoin, etc., and the Arts departments of the Universities.
3. That its degree of Bachelor of Arts is acknowledged in all Universities both in this country and overseas.
4. That while it prepares men for no profession, it does give them very thorough training upon which to build in post-graduate professional study.
5. That its enrollment is small enough to insure careful preceptorial guidance of each individual student.
6. That its costs are reasonable—less than those of most other colleges of quality—$500 a year for tuition, board, and a room.

Apply for further information to the President, the Rev. Bernard Iddings Bell

ST. STEVEN'S COLLEGE

Post Office: Annandale-on-Hudson

R. R. Station: Barrytown, N. Y.

Happy are we even if we go at God's second bidding, though it is far better that we go at first.—J. R. Miller.

Every one who sets himself to live the unselfish life, no matter how humble a person he may be, has God on his side.—Bosworth.

A mother's first duty is to bring up her children for God. Whatever she can do for others after that will be acceptable. Outside duties may be hers in some measure, but the duty to her children is hers and no others.—Selected.

Paul saw our grave in the furrow of the plow, our burial in the corn dropped into the soil, our decay in the change undergone by the seed, our resurrection when, bursting its sheath, it rises green and beautiful above the ground that was once its grave.—T. Guthrie.

Love is the sunshine of life, which alone can conquer the darkest clouds and bring back the clear shining after the rain. And to believe that perfect love—the love of God in Christ—is really presiding over all, is the true support which Christianity offers to us in the battle of life.—Selected.

Measure thy life by loss instead of gain;
Not by the wine drunk, but the wine poured forth;
For love's strength standeth in love's sacrifice,
And whoso suffers most hath most to give.
—"Sermon in the Hospital."

Those who believe, not in word only, but in deed and in truth, in the great destiny of enfranchised souls, will not need to compassionate any true and upright spirit which is called away, however suddenly, from a life however sweet.—F. W. H. Myers.

Saved by suffering, not from it, is the law of life revealed in Christ. Character depends on inward strength, but this strength has two conditions: it is increased only by being put forth, and tested only by resistance. So the spiritual character must enter into conflict, and stand in comparison with something formidable enough to be a standard of its power.

Have You Selected Your School?

Enrollments are now being made for the ensuing school year. Many institutions already have a waiting list. If you find it difficult to make a choice, the Southern Churchman will be glad to assist you. Address

Southern Churchman School Bureau
815 East Grace St.
Richmond, Va.

SUMMER CAMPS

The growing popularity of camps for young people attests the benefit to mind and body of open air and well regulated exercise. Select your camp now. The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN will help you to make a choice.

CAMP NAVAJO FOR GIRLS

7-16 years. On beautiful Lake Thompson, Maine. (Via Bar Harbor exp. from New York, one night.) Rate $200 (no extras). Mid pines and birches on hill sloping down to lake. Full program of water and land sports taught by experienced councillors. Handicraft, folk and interpretative dancing. Excellent food. Physician and nurse. Catalog. Register before June 1st. CLARA HENDERSON, Dir., 1530 Linden Ave., Baltimore, Md.

Three Cents Saves a Life for a Day!

Think of it! For this paltry sum, just a fraction more than letter postage, a human life can be sustained from sun to sun in a land where FAMINE stalks rampant and men are dying by the thousands every twenty-four hours.

Think of it, you well nourished, well clothed American Christian, as you sit in your protected home that probably has never felt the pinch of necessity!

Did three cents ever seem so small or mean so much as in this hour of China's supreme need? Do you know of any investment where returns are so large?

A penny will buy a meal—a dollar will sustain a life for a month—five dollars saves a family.

BUY CHINA LIFE SAVING STAMPS

If you buy liberally, who knows but that you may save some babe from being drowned by its frantic mother to end its sufferings, or that you may prevent the sale of some young girl into servitude to provide food for the rest of the family, or that you may preserve some youth to grow into a great force for righteousness in a heathen land?

Your missionary societies should have them on sale. They should be obtainable at every church and Sunday school in the South. If your society does not have them, the secretary should write at once for a supply to MISS DAISY DAVIES, Stamp Sales Director, Southern Committee, China Famine Fund, 502 Candler Building, Atlanta, Georgia.

Do not let the purchase of these stamps keep you from making larger contributions to the fund if you are able to make a substantial donation in this hour of suffering.

WHAT YOUR PENNIES CAN DO:

1 cent buys a meal.
3 cents saves a life for a day.
$1.00 saves a life for a month.
$2.00 saves a mother and baby a month.
$5.00 saves a family for a month.
$10.00 saves a mother and babe till harvest.
$25.00 saves a family till harvest.

The stamps are intended to afford the poor, the little children, and those who count their possessions in pennies to have a part in this Christian cause. It will defeat the object of the stamp sale for any one who should give ten, twenty-five or a hundred dollars to be satisfied with buying a few stamps. Give in proportion to your possessions!

WHERE TO SEND YOUR CONTRIBUTION

If the Southern Committee for China Famine Fund has no representative in your community, give your contribution to your bank or send it to Vernon Munroe, Treasurer, China Famine Fund, Bible House, New York City.

China Famine Fund

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., APRIL 23, 1921. No. 17.

ON USING WHAT WE HAVE

The two articles which we print in this issue of the Southern Churchman combine in a single message. The address of Dr. Dillard is an instance of the new and larger employment of the laity, not only as servants of the Church's practical efforts, but as interpreters of its spiritual meaning for the lives of men. The article from Bishop Remington sets forth the way in which a diocese, with practically no help from outside and with the employment only of its own men, many of whom had no qualification of technical experience, but only the more vital qualification of a ready heart, carried through a great enterprise for the good of the Church From both these sources, therefore, there speaks this truth: that the power of the Church will come, not from wishing she had some extraordinary resources imagined to be needed, but from the recognition of the abilities which are already at her service if she will dare to venture boldly with what she has.

All through religious history it has been a common failing for men to hold back from service because they complained that they could not do it well. "I have never been trained," they say; "I have no special ability in this line." When the Lord commanded Moses to go and stand before Pharaoh, Moses wanted to shift the responsibility to Aaron, and in all the generations since men have been much more apt to imitate this particular piece of weakness on Moses' part than they have been to imitate all the rest of his strength.

Above almost everything else, the Church needs courage to use her human abilities, too long lying latent. There is new work to be done for God in every congregation and in every diocese, and the men exist to do it. It is a question of courage and faith. If we fix our eyes enough on the imperiousness of God's work, we shall not be able to see the small excuses which ordinarily prevent so many of us from attempting it. When a life yields itself obediently to His plans for service, God will take care of the results.

A GOSPEL FOR THE WORLD'S NEED

There is a disastrous idea still prevalent in some minds that Christianity loses its character when it begins to touch public affairs. Persons of this sort speak of the "pure gospel," by which they mean a gospel which confines itself to personal morality and holds aloof from the problems included in a wider civic consciousness.

There is a kind of pure gospel which everybody wants. We want the gospel in all the purity of its power. But if anything is true about Christianity, this is true—that the gospel loses the purity of its Master's purpose when it becomes a thing of segregated concern. It is only pure when it expresses the full reach and inclusiveness of the purpose of Jesus to make all life over after the fashion of the Kingdom of God.

It is possible to have what some people call the pure gospel, and have beside it a world given over increasingly to pure deviltry. The real genius of the Christian gospel is outraged and denied when the pitiful timidity which miscalls itself reverence keeps the gospel away from its saving contact with the tough facts of this world that need to be redeemed. Doubtless the theological professors and the preachers of Germany prided themselves on their pure gospel when they went mooning along exhorting fat individuals to personal complacency, with never a word of rebuke or warning to the terrible tendencies which were growing in the German policy toward the other nations. Doubtless they preached what they called the pure gospel at the very time when they had no words to denounce the invasion of Belgium, nor any indignation against the enslavement of the Belgium workmen and the whole brutal cruelty of the German occupation. It is probable that the outcome of the war has opened their eyes and that they realize their gospel would have been more pure if it had had more of the militant reality of Jesus, and had dared to reach out to touch the real sins of militarism and arrogance that were ruining the life of a people. Yeast may be pure yeast when it is held in one hand, and a mass of unleavened stuff in the other. Salt may be pure salt when it is kept shut up in a box and decay goes on unheeded in the thing it was meant to sweeten and preserve. But that is not the kind of purity which Jesus meant in His parable, and that is not the kind of purity He means for His gospel ever.

Indeed, the gospel which sanctimoniously imagines it can be itself pure by holding aloof from wrestling with the tough problems of the world does not even keep the poor negative purity which it imagines. If Christianity does not fight against the evil of this world, it becomes accommodated to those evils. If it does not go out to strengthen the redeeming influences in civic and industrial life, then it becomes tainted by its acquiescence with the conditions it is willing to permit. Even the gospel of personal conduct could keep virile in a Germany where Christianity forswore its touch with the mighty problems of its time. And neither in any other land, including ours, can the gospel lay hold upon the respect and allegiance of any part of the life of men unless it lays hold upon it all.

Among American journals there are no editorials more notable for their trenchant insight than those of "Life." Here is the way Mr. E. S. Martin sums up, in a recent issue, the situation of our world today:

"The war was won, but civilization is not yet saved and now bids fair to go to perdition" * * * "over questions of money, territory and reparations which as yet are so much fairly gold. Heaven knows what can be gotten out of Germany, but the effort to get it, the effort to decide how much, the effort to prevent it from doing immeasurable damage to the late Allies, all engage the best minds just now and seem to flabbergast them. The situation is most curious. It is working into a sort of competition between the Penal Code and the Sermon on the Mount for the right of way in the affairs of the world. The Penal Code provides punishment for crime and is much respected. The Sermon on the Mount says, forgive your enemies, and is much derided, especially by business men. But now, such is the state of the world, such are its recent experiences, and such are the minds of the present generation of its inhabitants, trained as they have been in the last six years, that it has actually come up for serious consideration which of these documents is the most practical, and which course of action is better business. Haggling about money and nursing of hatreds threaten absolutely to destroy the civilization of Europe. England is destroying what is left of herself and her prestige by her management of Ireland. France is losing the sympathy of friends who so greatly admired her by her attitude about Germany, Austria and Middle Europe are starving and Russia is a bedlam, all as the result of human folly. Europe cannot be relieved as it might be, because it cannot get together. Problems of credit and problems of transportation lag and people starve while food rots. A carload of supplies has to be loaded and reloaded four times between the Baltic and the Danube because no State in Europe lets a freight car go out of its boundaries."

What we need in our world today is more religion. We need more of the pure gospel truly understood, the gospel which has the purity not of a vacuum, but of a great, strong wind which cleanses and sets free. We need the courage to carry the mind of Jesus into all the affairs of this disordered earth, and to begin to ask whether it is not about time that we set ourselves seriously to learn from Him and see what we can make of our world if we let Him be our Guide.

The Church Service League

By Helen Sterling, Secretary of the National Committee.

It is scarcely a year and a half since delegates from the Woman's Auxiliary, the Girls' Friendly Society and the Guild of St. Barnabas for Nurses adopted at Detroit the resolution which began, "We invite all other women's church societies to join with us in creating a Church League of Service." This resolution, later approved and accepted by other societies, was followed by the definite suggestion that to conduct the business of the League and to prepare for its development there should be formed a National Council, with three representatives from each of the seven existing national organizations, and nine members at large. These representatives, who were subsequently chosen from their respective organizations, viz: the Woman's Auxiliary, Girls' Friendly Society, Daughters of the King, Church Periodical Club, Church Mission of Help, Guild of St. Barnabas for Nurses, the Church Women's League for Patriotic Service, met at Church Missions House the following December and elected nine delegates at large, thus forming the National Committee to which has since been added a delegate from each provincial council of the Church Service League as formed, and also one from each of those departments of the Executive Council of the Church upon which women are serving.

In the eighteen months since the resolution was adopted diocesan councils have been organized at the rate of more than two each month, five provincial councils have been formed, and in at least two dioceses there are fifty or more parish units. It is evident that the "invitation" was accepted.

But the history of the first year and a half of the Church Service League may not be written so much in figures and sums total as in the spirit in which the idea has been received. Doubts there have been, of course; inquiries, no end of them; but only those whose privilege it had been to see many of these same doubting and inquiring letters could understand how constantly increasing was the evidence that inquiry was very perceptibly deepening into interest, and doubt into an honest determination to have some share in developing the new project.

A careful analysis of the letters shows that the prevailing difficulties in the way to universal acceptance of the Church Service League arise not so much from a lack of understanding of its purpose as from fear of a supposed rigid technique of organization. That very simple little rule of success, "'Do what you can, with what you have, where you are," seems to help amazingly here. In other words, the whole question of intelligent organization, whether in diocese or parish, becomes merely a matter of making the plan yield to existing local conditions.

Paucity of organizations which may be drawn together into a Service League ought never to be a stumbling-block if one remembers that the reason for any federation is not that taken together three organizations are three times as powerful as one organization, but rather, as the recently recognized "group" idea declares, that when three or seven or any other number of groups get together for enlightenment, for consultation and co-operation, "an entirely new power in the universe is thus created." So it must be that whenever guilds and societies, however few in number, come together for "mutual understanding and co-ordination of effort," it must inevitably happen that there is then and there released, in parish and in diocese, an entirely new dynamic force capable of possibilities in the way of service hitherto undreamed of. There has arisen, moreover, in the development of the Church Service League a most interesting contingent; for it is becoming increasingly evident that the more natural Service League is that which includes men's as well as women's organizations, and it would seem from the number of Service Leagues so formed springing up all over the country that this ideal, which has been held in mind from the start, is capable of speedy fulfilment.

The National Committee has tried to avoid anything like didactic instruction or rigid formulas. Realizing that the real life of the Church Service League must be entrusted to the parish units, it has emphasized as essential two points only, namely, that the parish unit should consist of a federation of all societies or departments in which women work in the parish, with the understanding that during the year the activities of the unit shall include some definite service in the five fields, i. e., the parish, the community, the diocese, the nation and the world. The committee accepted as the "immediate program" before the women of the Church, United Prayer, United Study and United Giving, assuming at this time the publication of the Church Prayer leaflet, and recommending as an opportunity for corporate prayer and contemplation the observance of a Day of Intercession and Meditation early in Advent. The leaflet of Suggestions, published by the Committee on Devotional Life for use on this day, was ordered by sixty-four dioceses and missionary districts to the number of 58,458 copies. Bible Reading for use during Advent, published by the same committee, were ordered by sixty-eight dioceses and two missionary districts, to the number of 52,304 copies. A recent bulletin published by the Committee on Co-operation contains suggestions for ways in which the various organizations which make up the Service League may, by interchange of intelligent and devoted service, be mutually helpful. The Statement published by the National Committee sets forth the purpose and ideals of the Service League, with suggestions for organizing the several divisions.

When all is said and done, the heart of the whole thing seems to lie in the one word, "co-operation." It is, of course, inevitable that individuals working in and for the Church should have, as elsewhere, their own especial points of enthusiastic service; it is likewise certain that there can never be for any individual, who is not cognizant, at least, of all the work which the whole Church is doing, the joy of completely intelligent service. "We shall find, when we have time to study them," the Prayer Leaflet reminds us "that every mission and department of the Church has its own romance, its own pathos, its own peculiar joy." And some of us are finding, moreover, as we come together out of our separate corners, and learn of the work other women are doing in the name of the Church, that in working exclusively, as we have done hitherto, sometimes for the Woman's Auxiliary, sometimes for the Girls' Friendly Society, or, it may be, for the Church Periodical Club, we have been not altogether unlike craftsmen engaged for a long time upon a bit of detail, with no knowledge of the whole plan; but now the entire pattern is revealed, and we are permitted to see for the first time the design which we have, all these years, been helping to make.

Needless to say that one likes it; needless also to say that one seeks more eagerly than ever before opportunity to help in completing the design.

HOW WE RECEIVE GRACE.

How, then, is Christ crucified to be partaken of by each one of us? How are His merits, how is His blessed Person to be communicated to us, that sinners should dwell in Christ? and Christ in sinners? By faith; for it is written, "That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith": by united prayer, for He has promised "Where two or three are gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them"; but most directly and especially by sacramental union, "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ," and "Whoso eateth My flesh, and drinketh My blood, dwelleth in Me, and I in him."—Selected.

THE PREACHING MISSION---AN EXPERIMENT IN MISSIONARY PROPAGANDA

Rt. Rev. William P. Remington, D. D., Suffrigan-Bishop of South Dakota

When the call of the central authorities of the Episcopal Church came for a Nation-Wide Preaching Mission to be observed in every Diocese and Missionary District, we in South Dakota accepted the idea with eagerness, and laid hold upon it as a splendid opportunity for an experiment in missionary propaganda. It was no new thing, but simply a revival of the apostolic method first used by our Lord in gathering the seventy about Him and then sending them into every city and place, whither He Himself would come. We did not quite expect to see Satan as lightning fall from heaven, but we did hope for rays of light to illuminate some dark places, and we did believe that in answer to our faith God's Holy Spirit would bear witness to our desire to have His ways known upon earth and His saving health among our people.

As from the perspective of this time we look back upon that venture, we can rejoice over the measure of success God had given us in this method of missionary propaganda.

We found ourselves handicapped at the outset from the inability of the Central authorities to send us an experienced missioner to show us how. Also, we had no "outstanding preacher of nation-wide reputation" among us; in fact, we had only half a dozen men who had ever conducted a mission before, two of whom were the Bishops who held eleven of the twenty-two missions preached. In spite of these difficulties, we practically covered the entire State, holding missions in every parish and important mission where there was a resident rector or missionary, with twelve missioners, eleven of them drawn from within South Dakota. We passed up those places where adequate preparation and follow-up could not be made on account of a vacancy in the post. We realized that these may have been the very fields which needed us most, but we feared to plough a field which could not be planted and watered afterwards.

The Bishop had appointed the Suffragan as chairman to make arrangements, and he associated with himself the Rev. Clyde B. Blakeslee, of Madison, and Dean F. B. Bartlett, of Aberdeen. We arranged a schedule, agreeing that each missioner would accept his appointment and do his best without urging or question, and though it was most difficult to fit men to places and meant not a little sacrifice and hard work for some of the missioners, we received few complaints, except that the mission was too short. We have a way of all pulling together in South Dakota, and we have faithful soldiers and servants who will accept appointments without question and do their best.

We had three very simple but definite objectives:

1. To preach Christ as a living Person capable of imparting Himself, His strength and virtue, to those willing to receive Him. We insisted that the preaching power of the mission would be in proportion to our effort to visualize the Christ as the Lord of Life. We would enter into no theological definitions, nor the advocacy of any social or economic programs.

2. We were to instruct the people in the way of Christ as this Church has received it. The services were to be very simple and short, with an instruction and opportunity made to answer questions and offer intercessory prayers. Whatever else we wanted to accomplish, we desired to make the Episcopal Church and her ways known in that community.

3. Finally it was to be the Church's call to service. The chief objective and the driving spirit was enlistment in the various agencies the Church had set up to propagate her work.

As by-products of the Preaching Mission, we developed Christian healing as a strong adjunct to the message of evangelization and instruction, and in some places these services became the most helpful part of the mission. Also the Nation-Wide Campaign received a strong impetus from the missions, though in most cases the campaign had been undertaken in advance. The Church papers and tracts on many subjects were used as aids in the work.

Now as to results: The following are taken from a number of reports which were sent in by the rector or missionary after the mission was held. We shall not be interested in the place nor even in the names of missioners, but just simply in the report.

"The Preaching Mission marked a real advance, because it has left something permanent. Many people had thought it impossible to have a mission in the Cathedral; but now they say: 'Wasn't it splendid; we really had congregations.' The Healing Mission is a fixed order, and will continue quietly and reasonably, giving a new meaning to intercessory prayer, and bringing the full gospel into many lives."

"The final Guild meeting was the largest we have ever had, and its tone was entirely spiritual and real. Afterward we had the best parish meeting which the oldest inhabitants can remember. I attribute the spirit and enthusiasm and the numbers to the mission."

"The mission held at St. Mark's was a decided success. Our people were stirred and stimulated. During the six days 600 people attended the services. It is encouraging to know that we can carry on a Preaching Mission without help from outside. Returns from canvass for Personal Service Pledges show that many are definitely committing themselves to some form of service. We have six volunteers for life service."

"The mission at Springfield was splendidly conducted. The other ministers of the community attended themselves and invited their people to do so. On Monday morning the missioner addressed the students and faculty of the State Normal School, and on Tuesday all the classes of the Springfield public school were visited and invited to attend the children's service in the church that afternoon at 4 o'clock; seventy-five children, ten teachers and other adults were present. On Wednesday a visit was paid to the Indian Church at Santee, Neb. The Indian Women's Guild was in session; dinner was served to those present and the missioner addressed them."

"Armour had a very successful Preaching Mission. The Christian Healing Missions were greatly appreciated by all who attended them. Eight services were held, with an average attendance of forty-seven persons. The people of Armour voted the mission a great success and expressed themselves as in favor of an annual Preaching Mission."

"The mission did a heap of good, and was one of the most worth-while things we have ever done here. It certainly made people think, and we are beginning to see the results of it. The attendance at the mission grew. It started out at thirty and increased to over sixty. There was a very great interest in it."

"The spiritual character of the mission made it very helpful, and the results will be lasting. Average attendance, thirty-four. In addition the Bishop addressed groups of students, faculty, townspeople and Rotary. Many pledges of service made."

"A very successful eight-day mission. The question-box was freely used by the congregation, including some of the young Church school scholars. The sermons led up to a call for personal service which was answered by a goodly number of the people of the parish. The mission closed with a consecration service of unusual impressiveness."

It is impossible, of course, to tabulate spiritual results, and in many cases we shall have to wait almost a year to discover what abiding fruit came from the Preaching Mission. Most of the places where it was undertaken were small towns where the average attendances, even on Sundays, were not great and where our Church, unfortunately, was not very well known. The whole of South Dakota has been burned over with the fires of pentecostal revivals. A good deal of the religion is of the negative, rather than of the positive and constructive type. The Episcopal Church has a decided mission in presenting the Christian life in all of its fullness and its beauty. Our average missionary goes on trying to present this ideal Sunday after Sunday, and he is succeeding in a splendid way. The advantages of the Preaching Mission are many. The publicity used attracts a larger number of persons to the services of the mission. A fresh voice presenting the gospel is appreciated, and it is not necessary that a man of great preaching ability should bring the message. We sometimes wonder what "an outstanding, compelling preacher" is. Any one who is deeply in earnest and is trying to live a Christ-like life and has some decent gifts in speaking can preach a good mission—at least, that has been our experience.

As a means of propagating the gospel in a missionary district, the inspirartion given at the mission is a splendid feature. Finally, the call to service leaves every one with a feeling that he or she is a part in the work of the Church. We are all determined in South Dakota to profit by the mistakes of the past effort and to carry on another Preaching Mission this coming year in those places where it will be most welcomed. We are going to expect great things from God, and we are sure we shall not be disappointed.

PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY

By James H. Dillard

[One of the most valuable consequences of the Nation-Wide Campaign has been the larger entrance of the laity into the service, both prophetic and practical, of the Church. The value of the message which laymen can bring is illustrated in the following address, which was delivered in Christ Church, Charlottesville, Va., on the Sunday after Easter upon the thirty-first verse of the twelfth chapter of St. Mark, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."]

The text is one that is of utmost importance to every human soul at every season of the Christian year, and we should endeavor to consider its everlasting significance with sincerity and candor. If there be one thought that belongs to every festival of the Church, it is Christian charity.

Before coming to the main theme it would be well to make a brief but important digression. The text deals with the practical side of life. It contemplates the religious life as manifested in practical relationships. While this must of course ever be the ultimate test of religion, we should not understand that it is all of religion. We may judge religion by its fruits, but we may not thereby deny the mysterious processes that are going on at its roots. We cannot detach religion from its mysterious sources. There are secret springs of inspiration that are known in every human soul, and yet they cannot be fully defined and described.

As torrents in summer
Half dried in their channels,
Suddenly rise, though the Sky is still cloudless,
For rain has been falling
Far off at their fountains;
So hearts that are fainting
Grow full to o'erflowing,
And they that behold it
Marvel, and know not
That God at their fountains
Far off has been raining!

These simple lines tell a truth that human hearts are conscious of, though we do not often speak of it in plain, cold words.

There is a false scientific spirit which would abolish all mystery from the universe. Because science has dealt so successfully with secondary causes it has become, in its turn, dogmatic. Because it has explained and applied so much, it has forgot what lies beyond and behind. Because it has removed so much mystery, it thinks it has removed all mystery, whereas the great primal facts of the universe are just as mysterious as ever. This conceit of removing the mystery from things has reached the realm of religion. Some think that the modern world has succeeded in removing the mysterious part from religion, as they suppose that the mysterious has been eliminated from nature. The fact is that true science becomes the more humble the more deeply it looks. It sees the more mystery the more completely it removes the outer veils. So the more deeply we contemplate the outward manifestations of true religion, the more fully convinced we shall become of a mysterious source back of these outward manifestations.

But our theme today deals with the practical side of religion. In touching on the other side the purpose was simply to call attention to the fact that the two sides cannot be divorced. Our purpose today is a very definite one; it is to ask what is the Christian mind, what is its spirit, whether at its Christmas birth or at its Easter glory.

In considering this spirit we shall gain clearness by considering at the same time the opposite, which may be called the pharisaic spirit. These two views have been always opposed to each other; they form even today a central point of opposition in modern thought.

The Christian mind is the mind that recognizes the value and dignity of man as man. It emphasizes humanity; the real touchstone of Christianity is to be found in the phrase, "the value of man as man." The incarnation of Christ is the glorification of all humanity. This idea of man as man, not as president, king, lawyer, millionaire, senator, governor, or what not, but just as man, lies at the bottom of the whole Christian ideal. It is, we may say in passing, the foundation of democracy.

The pharisaic mind still loves to be greeted as rabbi, loves the principal seats, loves all those distinctions which were the special mark of displeasure in the mind and speech of Jesus. It is essentially the diametric opposite of the spirit of Jesus, which is the spirit of neighborliness and brotherhood. The pharisaic mind may work for human betterment honestly and sincerely, but it is always in the spirit of superiority. It may give liberally in all benevolent enterprises, it may head subscription lists, it may give millions to feed the poor, and yet be as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal so far as the true fraternal spirit is concerned.

No one who reads the gospels with open eyes can fail to see that the religion of Jesus, as it touches the relation of man to man, as it influences man's attitude to his fellowman, is the religion of friendliness and co-operation. What were the rabbis, the Sadduces, the Pharisees—the scholars and intellectuals—to Jesus? These were they who rated man on other grounds than the ideal of justice and brotherhood. They did not put first things first, but valued primarily learning, or wealth, or political and social position. Did not Jesus ignore all such valuations? In His eyes all of us are alike sinners and all of us alike children of God.

Some have thought of practical Christianity as a series of don'ts. Don't drink intoxicating liquors, don't play cards, don't go to the theatre, don't play golf on Sunday, and a multitude of other don'ts. These don'ts may be very well, but they do not go to the essence of the teaching of the Christianity of Jesus.

Others have thought of the practical side of Christianity as synonymous with charity in the sense of giving to the poor, by direct gifts or by way of asylums and hospitals. Such giving to the poor and giving to asylums and hospitals may be practical Christianity. But it depends. No beautiful word has been so unconsciously but ruthlessly dragged in the dust as the beautiful word "charity." Giving money is the least particle of possible element in it. St. Paul settled this for all time when he said: "Though I best w all my goods to feed the poor and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing."

What is charity—charity as St. Paul understood the word? We may be willing to accept the word as the ultimate of practical Christianity. Charity is good will to our fellows, which is essentially the Christian ideal. It means that we shall have no desire to have advantage of our fellowmen, for our best must essentially mean the best for all. This is the true spirit of charity.

Permit me to say just a word about the attitude of the Church. What I have said, it would seem, is the spirit to which the Church must be committed, if she would be the Church of the people, if she would have her social work count, if she wishes her giving to have no cause to complain of the ingratitude of the poor. Giving and doing, no matter how honest and sincere, if they be in the spirit of condescension, are pharisaism and not charity. True philanthropy is true fraternity.

We all know that the Church today is not the Church of all the people. It has been often stated that not more than 3 per cent. of our working men ever go inside a church. There has been much written and said as to the cause of this. Back of external manifestations there, of course, lies a cause, and that cause depends upon some inherent spirit or idea. In the relation of the Church to the industrial problem, and in her divorce from the masses of the people, I believe the trouble lies in the fact that the Church has not yet sympathized with and absorbed as she should the true spirit of charity. Of course, the ultimate triumph of this spirit is, in the process of human development, inevitable; inevitable because it is founded in the truth of human fraternity, which Jesus so clearly taught and manifested to the world.

The point is that Christianity manifests itself emphatically and entirely in good will, in right feelings toward our fellowmen, for this attitude leads to good deeds. This is the whole gist of the matter; this is the law and the prophets—this Golden Rule of good will. Without good will one may be a Methodist, or a Unitarian, or an Episcopalian; but without good will one cannot be a Christian. In other words, genuine charity toward our fellowmen is the very alpha and omega of the Christianity taught by Christ. It is the spirit, not of privilege, not of favoritism, not of condescension, not of superiority, not of pharisiasm; it is the spirit of kindness, unselfishness, consideration of others, in the home, in the street, in business; it is the spirit of friendship and co-operation between the individuals and between nations. Is it not just this that the world needs today for the true life of each one of us individually, and for peace among the nations? It is so simple that we fail to see it, and seek after other methods; and there is no method but the method of Jesus. There is no other name given unto men or nations whereby they can be saved except the name of Jesus Christ. The last words of the hymn we have just sung are—

Christ is risen
O'er the universe to reign, and the glorious watchword of His reign that rings to us throughout the Christian year is peace on earth, good will to men.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

CHINA RELIEF.

Mr. Editor: A letter today from Secretary J. W. Wood, Department of Missions, says: "A cable signed by the Bishops in China we received not long ago, stating that the situation is desperate, and asking us to make the need known as widely as possible."

From now till the harvest incoming can be available is the most crucial time, for the reason that all reserve food has been consumed, all the roots and bark of trees and chaff and even stubble, to which these pitiful starving people have been appealing in their effort to keep the flickering flame of life alive, hoping for help from some quarter, all those poor substitutes have been exhausted, and now it is either death or relief which must come from us of America. Which shall it be? God says, "Whoso hath this world's goods and seeth his brother have need and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" Pray over it, then send to your minister your offering to help these dying Chinese, and you will hear from your gift; if not here, then in that great day. A poor invalid woman sent $2 to help support a missionary, after praying to the Lord, and that, too, before the missionary was found and appointed; and that act resulted in the sending and supporting of more than a dozen missionaries. I mention this to encourage those who can give but little. But what is done must be done at once. Delay means additional death in China. On the roadsides in Northern China lie the corpses of men, women and children who, in their search for relief, fell and died of starvation. It is up to our conscience.

JOHN McGILL.

Cumberland, Md., April 11, 1921.

DANCING.

Mr. Editor: It is heartening indeed to find women coming boldly to the front regarding the matter of morality in dancing. Once in conversation with a woman who belonged to one of the best families of New York, I spoke disapprovingly of dancing. She finally caught my meaning. "O, I know what you are aiming at, Mr. ———, but I want you distinctly to understand that when I was a girl I danced with gentlemen, and I asked them not to hold me so tightly, since it inconvenienced me in my movements. It was simply a matter of inconvenience; I never had a wrong thought." She had said all that was necessary. No man with a thimble full of brains that does not know that there are and always have been scores of women who thus danced, and do still so dance, with the purest feelings, nor is it intended indiscriminately to impugn the integrity of men; but that is not the point. The point is that such a thing is nothing but an abominable piece of infamous familiarity, and no gentleman, especially a Christian, would offer any woman such an insult. This was the kind of dancing as practiced forty or fifty years ago in apparently the best circles. The fact is, respectable women give, as in the case of the moderate drinker anent the using of spirituous liquors, tone to that which is manifestly disgraceful. No form of dancing, except where there is absolute separation of the sexes (of course this does not include the swinging of one's partner, say, around by the hand) ought to be countenanced. It is the height of insolence and vulgarity to lay one's hand on a woman to draw her attention even, and by what law or magic the most loathsome familiarity may be indulged in when dancing is certainly an unsolved mystery. God bless every good and sincere woman, and especially mothers, in the effort to remove this gross piece of inconsistency from Christian society. There is one hope (adding one word more) that, when the devil gets to the top rung of the ladder in deviltry, then religious people arise to the exigency. This is the hope of Christianity and the Church in the world.

MARTIN DAMER.

Nampa, Idaho.

NEGRO EDUCATION.

Mr. Editor: Please allow me to express my strong approval of Rev. Robert W. Patton's article, "The Church's Responsibility for the Negro," in your issue of April 9.

As now "educated" in the public schools, the Negro has no development of Christian character, and but little of moral; it is mainly of the mind, not of the heart and soul; and such incomplete education can lead only to greater rivalry and envy of the white race, so conspicuous now. Some years ago Thomas Nelson Page stated this very concisely and forcibly. "If all the Negroes were educated up to the level of Booker Washington, there would be still a Negro problem to solve." And to this writer it would seem a more difficult problem then than now; for would not the Negro then claim and insist on, and with some show of justice, full equality, political and social, with the white man? Let us aim at the goal Mr. Patton holds up to us; "multiply our present efforts 400 per cent. to guarantee intelligent Christian leadership to our Negro people," that our Church may "play its part in capturing for God and country the spiritual leadership of a race of twelve million people in America, steadily now increasing in numbers, and more and more, under present conditions, becoming alienated from, and in parts even hostile to, the whites."

Think of how the late tragedy in Georgia must affect the more intelligent Negroes! Only the grace of God can restrain the feelings that would naturally arise in their hearts.

BERKELEY MINOR.

Charlottesville, Va., April 10, 1921.

N. W. C. Supplementary Statement

1920 Quota Payments.

In submitting the supplementary statement of receipts to March 31, 1921, to apply on the 1920 quota, we would call attention to the fact that since the close of the books, as of December 31, 1920, the sum of $50,484.38 has been received to apply on that year, making the total contributions to March 31, 1921, from the dioceses and districts, to apply on the 1920 quota, $3,071,401. This does not include contributions which were specifically requested not to credit to any diocese. The amount of such contributions was $13,601, making the grand total for the year $3,085,002.

The principal changes in this statement since the early report are as follows:

Southwestern Virginia makes a decided advance and shows 115 per cent. of its quota paid, which, with the exception of the little Missionary District of Porto Rico, is the banner percentage. Southern Virginia also shows a fine increase from 88 per cent. to 108 per cent.

North Carolina joins the ranks of those dioceses which have completed 100 per cent. of their quota.

South Carolina, shown in the last report as having paid only 53 per cent. of its quota, now has 79 per cent. of its quota paid.

Delaware makes a strong advance from 60 per cent. to 73 per cent. paid.

Georgia, while showing only 76 per cent. of its quota, joins the Missionary District of San Joaquin in the leadership for percentage of increase over what was given to the General Church in 1919, each now showing 404 per cent. increase.

Maryland retains its lead for the actual increase in dollars over the amount of last year, namely, $107,018.48.

The dioceses which have paid 100 per cent. of the 1920 quota are now as follows:

Porto Rico,
Southwestern Virginia,
Southern Virginia,
West Virginia,
Virginia,
East Carolina,
North Carolina,
Maryland.

How many will there be in the 100 per cent. class in 1921?

LEWIS B. FRANKLIN, Treasurer.

Prayer is conscious fellowship with God—not merely communion with God, but co-operation with God. In the neglect of this truth lies the origin of most of our difficulties about prayer. Co-operation, not compulsion, is the secret of our true prayer. Often our first idea about prayer is that it means our strenuous effort to alter and change the direction of the Divine will. We see what we need. We would impress that need upon the mind of God, and the intensity of our prayer is in proportion to our determination to bend God's will. But prayer calls us not to compel God, but to co-operate with Him, calls us into fellowship of will with Him. The proper understanding of the relation of the Divine will to the will of man is the first condition of true and faithful prayer.—F. W. Drake.

The Great Commission.

"TWENTY-ONE YEARS IN THE MOUNTAINS OF TENNESSEE."

The Rev. William S. Claiborne, formerly Archdeacon of Sewanee and East Tennessee, and soon to be Archdeacon of Haiti under Bishop James Craik Morris, of that Diocese, has recently published an excellent and characteristically modest little record of his work for twenty-one years, under the title, "Twenty-one Years in the Mountains of Tennessee."

The little book, a tribute to those who have contributed, both in money and work under his direction, is full of deserved commendation of this aid. It praises the devotion and unselfishness of those who have striven through long years to ameliorate the always poor, and sometimes tragic, condition of those mountain people among whom Mr. Claiborne's name will remain as an example of untiring devotion and unselfishness. He seldom mentions himself except to follow with acknowledgement of service rendered his work by others.

While the world is agitated over the question of the education and assimilation of the immigrant (and too much cannot be done, if we are to allow and encourage discriminate immigration), we must not forget the needs of the people of the mountains, for they are, after all, of the original Anglo-Saxon and Scotch-Irish stock, from whence came our ideals of government and democracy. We have no right to allow these people, caught in the cul-de-sac of the mountain district, with no opportunities for education, or even Christianity in its best sense, to die out for lack of the things they cannot, in their remote homes, get or make for themselves. Essentially proud and independent as they are, it is only necessary to show them the way, and a chance, as Mr. Claiborne has so earnestly tried to do, to have them take advantage of it, and improve a little in the present generation, and wonderfully in the next.

It is to be hoped that the Southern States will become most thoroughly aware of the necessity of looking after these people, as some districts are opening up somewhat to mines, etc., and these uncultivated people will be perverted by the usual wickedness of mining communities, unless they are supplied beforehand with a shield in the way of some health and learning, to help them combat the world.

We can make an asset out of what, with neglect, will become a distinct liability. That is the economic view of it. Think what the personal view reveals—little children cured, habits of sobriety inculcated, Christianity instilled into the hearts of the children, and even into the hearts of their elders; and many fine and a few really brilliant minds given an opportunity to serve the world they otherwise would never have found.

So that this little book is an earnest plea, between the lines, for more men to remain in the rural districts and do the work that is crying to be done; do it faithfully and perseveringly. Loving the country and its people, a clergyman who reads this book will feel the call to help this rural work, and the layman who peruses its simple pages will feel himself impelled to do all he can, in work and money, for these people. And all they can do together—good layman and faithful priest—will not be too much.

Bishop Gailor's foreword to the book is a richly deserved tribute to a man whose "unselfish and unwearied ministry" points the way to all men of like sympathies, or of country origin, who feel a call to take up the work of the Church.

"From the beginning of his ministry, Mr. Claiborne has been especially interested in the work among the mountain people, and they have heartily responded to his untiring efforts for their advancement. His name is held in affectionate respect by the country folk all over East Tennessee, and he has made an enduring place for himself in the hearts of all classes.

"His wide acquaintance and peculiar fitness for the work so awakened his concern for all the country missionary work that he resigned his parish and was appointed Archdeacon, or general missionary, for the whole of East Tennessee.

"In that position he served faithfully for seven years, and has raised money to supplement the salaries of missionaries, to build rectories and schools, and to endow the hospital—but no record of building and solicitation of funds will do justice to the unselfish and unwearied ministry that he has given to the poor and sick, and the children of the country districts, and that has endeared him to the people on every side." E. M. G.

Chattanooga, Tenn., April, 1921.

The W. P. DuBose Church Training School.

The concluding paragraph of Archdeacon Claiborne's booklet mentioned above stresses the need of "developing a ministry for the mountain and rural work," and expresses his hope for "a missionary college, to take men who have not had the opportunity of college and seminary and give them intensive work along lines that will fit them to our rural problems." His plans have prospered, as witness the following news item:

At a meeting of the Board of Trustees of the W. P. DuBose Church Training School, a missionary college, which was held in Chattanooga, Tenn., March 30, Archdeacon W. S. Claiborne was elected Field Secretary and Rev. Walter Mitchell, D. D., was elected Warden.

The trustees are Bishop Thomas F. Gailor, S. T. D., president; Bishops F. F. Reese, D. D., William M. Green, D. D., H. J. Mikell, D. D.; Messrs. W. A. Sadd, E. M. Ellsworth, Morrow Chamberlain, Silas Williams (secretary), Francis Lynde.

The college is located at Monteagle, Tenn., and is to provide training for adults only, such men as the General Convention had in mind and provided for by Canon 5, Section IV. This work the Board feels will in a large measure provide for our rural work. Archdeacon Claiborne has had this work in mind for several years, and has from time to time gotten contributions sufficiently large to buy and pay for the necessary land and buildings, and it is hoped to open the college in September.

The prospectus of the school emphasizes the situation of the Church in the South, which has few large institutional parishes calling for workers in the slums of great cities. "The supreme problem of the South is the rural problem, intensified in the mountains and in the communities of mill workers. It is to meet these specific needs that the school addresses itself." The curriculum outlined seems an excellent and practical one.

The name of the school is given in recognition of the life work of the late Rev. Dr. William Porcher DuBose, for many years associated with the faculty of the University of the South, and who conducted a girls' school at Fairmount. Because of his position as a leader of religious thought, and his lifelong interest in missions, especially among the mountain people, the school is named after him.

The Board of Directors have authorized the purchase of the property of the old Fairmount Girls' School, six miles from Sewanee, Tenn., the plant consisting of school buildings and all equipment, sixty acres of land, and a good farm and its appurtenances.

One reason for locating the school near Sewanee is the fact that it can draw on the University for lectures and other parts of its course, taking advantage both of talent there and visiting lecturers who may from time to time be at Sewanee.

A complete prospectus may be had from the Rev. Dr. W. H. DuBose, at Sewanee, Tenn., and is gladly sent to any priest or layman interested in the school and the work it is planned to do.

An Appeal to the Church.

(This appeal, drawn up by seven of the most earnest and experienced workers in the District of Hankow, is heartily endorsed, and sent to us by Bishop Roots.)

We, seven women of the American Church Mission in the Wuhan cities (Hankow, Hanyang, Wuchang), desire to call the attention of the Church at home to the great need now existing in our centre for women evangelists. Boone University, St. Hilda's School, St. Phoebe's and St. Lois' School, as well as the Church General Hospital, make large demands upon the missionary body, greatly limiting the number of those who are free for distinctively evangelistic work.

While it is true that evangelistic work is done in all our institutions, still there are vast areas untouched by these agencies. We are pleading for the Y. W. C. A. to come and work among the young women in the government schools of Wuchang because the various missions feel that their staff is not sufficient for this opening. This proves that there is need for workers among the girl students in these schools, and there are many other openings where an evangelistic worker would find a great opportunity. Beside the Model Prison and the Widows' Home, there are two new cotton mills and thousands of children that could be brought into Sunday schools.

On every side we see the need, and we have very few women with time for this work. We therefore hope that those who see this appeal will try to come themselves or will help others to come, for the distinctively evangelistic work is being sadly neglected in this, one of the largest and most importaant centres of China.

(Signed)

Miss M. E. Wood,
Gertrude C. Gilman,
Grace Ashton Crosby,
Martha Levering Sherman,
Marian DeC. Ward,
Alice M. Clark,
Venetia Cox.

Church Intelligence

Plea for Armenia.

A cablegram from "American Christians, urging "Armenia's preservation, and deliverance of Constantinople and Asiatic Christians from murder and misrule," has been sent to Premiers Lloyd-George and Briand, M. Viviani, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the American President and Secretary of State, and the Patriarchs of the Armenian and Greek Churches in Constantinople. It is signed by twenty leading ministers of our American churches, including Bishop Darlington and Bishop-elect Manning.

(It will be remembered, or ought to be, that a little more than a year ago America was urged by the European Allies and her own then President to undertake a mandate for Armenia and to make this job of the preservation of that unhappy people her own. But our vaunted watchword, "America first," was found not to apply in this case.)

Disarmament.

The Philadelphia Year Meeting of the Society of Friends makes a solemn appeal to Christian people to use their full influence in favor of international disarmament. They remind us that—

"Since the armistice our government has spent largely for war costs almost $1,000 for every family in the United States. More than four billion dollars have been appropriated for this year. Of this amount 68 per cent. pays the expenses of past wars, 20 per cent. prepares for future wars, and 12 per cent. remains for constructive work.

"The building up of huge armaments means two things—that we regard other nations as potential enemies, and that we expect to train the youth of this and coming generations to destroy their fellowmen. These ends cannot be reconciled with the Spirit, the life or the teaching of Jesus. If we were blind to the international situations and tendencies that brought on the great war, our eyes should be wide open now for the present and the future. If we Christians do not walk by the light given us, the responsibility for the failure of Christian ideals rests upon us. On one hand lies the road to international suspicion, antagonism, warfare and ruin; on the other to mutual interest, good-will and cooperation. The emergency is upon us. It must not be evaded. No more real and pressing enterprise challenges the loyalty of the Church of Christ."

ERIE.

The Rev. John C. Ward Elected Bishop.

The special convention of this Diocese to elect a successor to the late Bishop Rogers Israel took place at St. Paul's Cathedral, Erie, on Tuesday, April 12. There was an early celebration at 7:30, the Rev. George F. Potter officiating. At 10 o'clock the formal opening of the convention took place, Archdeacon Martin Aigner, D. D., celebrating the Holy Communion, no one but delegates to the convention receiving. At its conclusion a meeting was held in the Chapter House, sitting as "a committee of the whole," when eight nominations were made, most of which were complimentary. The names of the Rev. Dr. Wyatt Brown, of Baltimore; the Rev. Dr. Aigner, of Franklin, Pa., and the Rev. Edward J. Owen, of Sharon, Pa., were all well supported. After the seventeenth ballot it was plain, although the laity had elected Dr. Brown six times, that he would not be elected by the clergy, most of whom voted for Archdeacon Aigner. At this crisis the convention left the cathedral and went into a committee of the whole again. During this period, after Turner W. Shacklett had withdrawn Dr. Brown's name, the Rev. W. E. Van Dyke nominated the Rev. John Chamberlain Ward, of Grace Church, Buffalo, N. Y. After some speeches from those who knew Mr. Ward in person, and also from others who knew of him, the delegates returned to the cathedral. After five more ballots, the Rev. Mr. Ward received a majority of both orders, which later on was made unanimous by Archdeacon Aigner's resolution, seconded by the Rev. E. J. Owen. A telegram was sent off at once to the Bishop-elect, but at this writing nothing has been heard in answer.

John Chamberlain Ward was born in Elmira, N. Y., August 27, 1873. He is a graduate of Harvard, and an S. T. B. of the General Theological Seminary, New York City. He was ordered deacon in 1899 and priest in 1900, and was in charge of St. Stephen's Church, Buffalo, N. Y., from 1899 to 1902. He has been rector of Grace Church, Buffalo, N. Y., from 1902 to the present time, except the two years he served as chaplain with the One Hundred and Eighth Infantry in France, where he was wounded. He won during this time the Distinguished Service Cross and "the British Military Medal." Grace Church, under Mr. Ward, has become a congregation of eight hundred communicants. Some few months ago Mr. Ward's name came up in his own Diocese for the office of Suffragan-Bishop, and he came within two votes from the clergy of being elected.

R. S. R.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Opening of Emmanuel Parish Hall, Boyce.

Three beautiful days lent greatly to the success and enjoyment of the formal opening and dedication of Emmanuel Parish Hall, Boyce, Clarke County. Bishop Brown read the service of dedication, assisted by the Rev. Page Dame, of Memorial Church, Baltimore, and Bishop Jett, of Southwestern Virginia. The Rt. Rev. John G. Murray, Bishop of Maryland, made the address. The vested choirs of Berryville, Millwood, White Post and Winchester assisted the Boyce choir with the music. In the procession with the choirs and bishops were the Rev. Messrs. Dame, of Maryland; Goodwin and Mitchell, of West Virginia; Everett, Palmer, Woodward, Taylor and Chambers, of Virginia.

The reception and inspection of the building at night was a brilliant affair. Several hundred people wandered through the three stories (including the gallery), making the general comment, "A most complete building." After the inspection the entire company assembled in the auditorium, where an attractive musical program was carried out. Tokens of appreciation were presented to Mr. C. Morgan Marshall, builder, of Baltimore; the mason, Mr. G. W. Willey, and head carpenter, Mr. Clarence Glasscock. The evening was enlivened by impromptu talks by the Rev. Page Dame and Bishops Jett, Murray and Brown.

The Community Rally on Thursday afternoon brought out a large crowd. After the singing of the national anthem, the Rev. G. B. Palmer offered prayer. Addresses by Governor Westmoreland Davis, Mr. William J. Manning, of Charles Town, W. Va., and Dr. Thomas E. Green, of the American Red Cross, were of an exceptionally high order, and dealt very intelligently with rural problems and community life.

The night meeting was for the Farmers' Club of Clarke. Every "local" was represented by a large delegation, and they heard with great interest addresses by Mr. B. Morgan Shepherd, of the "Southern Planter"; Governor Davis and Mr. William Knowles Cooper, General Secretary of the National Y. M. C. A.

The Rev. M. S. Taylor opened this meeting with prayer, and the Rev. John Williams, of the Boyce Baptist Church, pronounced the benediction.

At both the afternoon and evening meetings community singing was quite an enjoyable feature. The livest gathering and most noisy demonstration of the three days came Friday night, when a special program was arranged for the young people. This program called for the "tiny tots" at seven and the older ones at nine, but this order was violated by everybody coming early and staying late. Five large reels depicting the antics of several movie idols furnished much amusement, evidenced by continuous and hilarious applause. While the reels were being shifted the words of familiar songs were thrown on the screen, and whatever energy and enthusiasm remained was put into joyous and lusty singing.

This function was the last of the opening exercises. Nearly two thousand people were in attendance in the three days, and from the keen enthusiasm and popular approval a successful future for this new venture for work in the Master's vineyard seems assured.

B. D. C.

The Richmond Convocation will meet May 3 to 5 in Emmanuel Church, Brook Hill, the Rev. E. E. Osgood, rector.

A large class was confirmed at St. Thomas' Church, Ginter Park, Sunday, April 17, when Bishop Brown confirmed a class of twenty-seven, presented by the rector, the Rev. E. C. Pedrick.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robt. C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

Recruiting for the Ministry.

The conference planned by the Bishop for the boys of the Virginia Episcopal School, who were thinking of giving themselves to the ministry, was held in St. John's Church, Roanoke, on Monday, April 11.

Owing to a conflict in connection with a track meet, only eighteen boys attended. These were joined by ten or twelve local boys.

After the celebration of the Holy Communion informal addresses were made to the boys by the Rev. Mr. Block, the Rev. Mr. Mead, and the Bishop Following the conference, the ladies served a delicious luncheon.

It was generally conceded that the conference more than met the expectations of all concerned. This will now become an annual custom. The boys in all the parishes of the Diocese who are thinking of giving themselves to the ministry will be invited to assemble in Roanoke to spend the day with the Bishop.

Executive Board Transacts Important Business.

The Executive Board held its monthly meeting April 15 at the Y. M. C. A. The meeting was a most interesting one, and much business was transacted. Action was taken looking to the proper safeguarding of all the diocesan subscribers to the Nation-Wide Campaign. The Board feels it to be its duty to co-operate in this matter with a view to having these funds meet the needs for which they were subscribed.

A sum not to exceed seven thousand dollars, in addition to certain amounts already appropriated, was set apart to be expended under the direction of the Bishop to further the work within the bounds of the Archdeaconry. An aggressive campaign is planned for that field.

It wa sdecided to co-operate by an appropriation with the rector and vestry at Blacksburg in the purchase of a suitable property for a parish house. This is to be used especially in connection with the cadets of the V. P. I.

St. John's Church, Lynchburg, whose subscriptions to the Nation-Wide Campaign were especially large, will be assisted in its plans for improvements in its parish house. It is believed that this will enable the rector to minister more efficiently to the large representation of girls now in attendance upon Randolph-Macon College. Many other activities cannot be reported for want of space.

A number of theological students and other workers will fill the vacant points during the summer.

On Sunday morning, April 10, the Bishop preached in Christ Church, Roanoke, and confirmed thirty-six persons. This makes a total of one hundred and twelve during the past twelve months.

NEW YORK.

Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop-Elect.

Dr. Drury Elected Rector of Trinity.

The Rev. Dr. Samuel Smith Drury, of St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H., has been elected rector of Trinity Church, New York, in succession to Bishop-elect William T. Manning.

Dr. Manning's Consecration to Be a Part of Diocesan Convention.

The consecration of the Rev. Dr. William T. Manning as Bishop of New York, on May 11, is to be part of the Diocesan Convention, which is to sit May 11, 12 and 13. Reports current now are that Dr. Manning as Bishop will ask the convention at this time or later to elect two suffragans, perhaps to do the work of archdeacons in addition to their own work, the idea being larger and better service. New York led by electing the first suffragan, and if now it elect two, and assign missionary work to them instead of providing archdeacons, it will take another step in advance of other dioceses.

Churches, Colleges and Other Worthy Causes Benefit by Recent Wills.

Edmund C. Converse, a banker, has died and has left $2,000,000 in charities and Christian gifts. To the United Hospital Fund, of which St. Luke's Hospital is a large beneficiary, he gave $500,000. His gift to St. Thomas' Church, the Rev. Dr. Stires, of which he was a communicant, was $50,000, to be used for missionary work. To Christ Church, Greenwich, Conn., which he attended in summer, he gave $100,000 for endowment. To ten small colleges he gave $50,000 each to create scholarship funds. Among the number was Trinity at Hartford. So also was Tuskegee. To a number of social welfare charities in banks in Wall Street he gave $100,000 for endowment and equipment. These societies are made up of clerks, usually organized men and women separately. At first they were merely social. Later they took up education in banking, and within the year some have entered upon training of volunteers among their number to do such civic and church work as they elected. The Converse estate is said to be $20,000,000.

Miss Emily Southmayd and Miss Elizabeth A. Osgood give by will almost $2,000,000 to worthy causes. Grace Parish, the Rev. Dr. Charles L. Slattery, is beneficiary of both of them. Miss Southmayd in her life was interested in the Church of the Resurrection. She gives to the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, the Home for Incurables, and the Home for Old Men and Aged Couples, $50,000 each; to the Seamen's Church Institute, St. Luke's Home for the Aged, and the Sheltering Arms, $25,000 each, and makes Grace Parish, the Rev. Dr. Slattery, the residuary legatee. Miss Osgood gives to the Rev. Dr. Slattery and to the Rev. Melville K. Bailey, long assistant there, $1,000 each. From Miss Southmayd St. Luke's Hospital gets $100,000.

C.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

National Cathedral Association Holds Annual Meeting.

The regular annual meeting of the National Cathedral Association was held on Wednesday, April 12, at the cathedral close, the Holy Communion service being held in the Bethlehem Chapel, the business sessions in the Guild Hall of St. Alban's, and the luncheon in St. Alban's School for Boys. At the service of Holy Communion, the Bishop of Washington was the celebrant, with Bishops Perry and Rhinelander assisting. At the business session in St. Alban's Guild Hall every seat was taken, and all seemed to agree that it was the most inspiring meeting ever held by the Association. The Very Rev. G. C. F. Bratenahl, dean of the cathedral, in his address showed the present financial condition of the cathedral and what is needed for its completion. Sufficient funds are in hand to begin the building of the choir, but this money cannot be used for the foundation, and the architect's plans call for the completion of the entire foundation before the building of any of the parts may be started. Of the $338,000 which will be the cost of the foundation, $150,000 is already available, so that it is urgent now to raise the remainder of this sum, so that work on the foundation may begin at once. Bishop Perry, of Rhode Island, gave a strong and splendid address, making a plea for the support of the people in this cathedral undertaking. It was shown that the development of committees of the National Cathedral Association throughout the country is meeting with great success, there being now fifteen such committees actively at work, as against six this time last year. In addition, preliminary steps are being taken for the establishment of committees in nine of our largest cities and some of the summer resorts of the country.

Bishop Rhinelander, in a stirring address, stressed the necessity of the completion of the cathedral, characterizing it as a nation-wide deed, in order that the nation-wide Church might function, and said that Washington was the logical place for such a "house of prayer for all people." It was voted that the address of Bishop Rhinelander be printed and distributed as a means of arousing interest in the cathedral. Dr. Freeman, rector of Epiphany Church, sounded a new note and aroused great enthusiasm when he urged that the business men of the Church in Washington be enlisted in this great project and an effort made through them to start the work at once.

The meeting was concluded by a service in the Bethlehem Chapel at 4 o'clock.

Meeting of Sunday School Institute: The April meeting of the Sunday School Institute of the Diocese of Washington was held at Epiphany Parish Hall on Tuesday evening, April 19, when the special speakers were the Rev. C. S. Abbott, whose subject was the "Home Department of the Sunday School," and Rev. Ronalds Taylor, who told of "Our Church's Work at Maryland University." Certificates were presented to successful students in the recent Diocesan teacher training class.

St. Stephen's Church Cancels Debt: The Men's Club of St. Stephen's Church celebrated the cancellation of the final debt of the parish on Thursday, April 14, by a dinner to which all of the men of the parish were invited. The members of the Men's Club very recently assumed the task of disposing of this debt, and as a result, pledges amounting to $34,000 have been made to cover the debt of $27,000.

The Rev. George F. Dudley is rector of the parish, and in the twenty-eight years that he has served as rector, the communicant list has grown from 40 to 1,126, the Sunday school from 25 to 511, and the parish is reported to be in a splendid condition in every branch of its work.

M. M. W.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay, D. D., Coadjutor.

Death of the Rev. Dr. John Kershaw.

News of the death of the Rev. Dr. John Kershaw, on April 7, at North Augusta, where he had sought restoration to health some weeks ago, was received with deep regret and sorrow, not only in Charleston, but throughout the Diocese.

Funeral services were held from St. Michael's Church, interment being in the family lot at Camden.

The Rev. John Kershaw, D. D., was born in Camden, S. C., January 3, 1847, the son of General John B. Kershaw, a distinguished Confederate, and one of the ablest judges of the South Carolina bench. He was ordained deacon in 1875 and priest one year later by Bishop Howe. His first charges were at Abbeville, Beaufort, S. C., and at Rome, Ga. In 1885 he took charge of the Church of the Holy Comforter, Sumter, where he remained until 1895, when he took charge of St. Michael's Church, Charleston, of which he was rector until early this year, when he resigned on account of ill health.

Dr. Kershaw served with distinguished success as rector of St. Michael's Church, and was deeply beloved by his congregation. Services commemorating the completion of his rectorship for a quarter of a century were held at the church on December 12 last year, at which time he delivered at eloquent sermon that was permeated by his high ideals as a clergyman. In the course of his address on that occasion he recited many interesting facts as to the activities of his parish during his rectorship.

Since the death of the Rev. Dr. P. H. Whaley some years ago Dr. Kershaw had been engaged in compiling and writing the history of the Episcopal Church in South Carolina from the beginning, and had brought this history down almost to the present time.

He is survived by his widow, a son, Theodore Kershaw, M. D., of North Augusta; a daughter, Mrs. H. G. Leiding, of Charleston, and by several grandchildren.

In writing editorially of the death of Dr. Kershaw, the Charleston News and Courier has this to say of his ministry in Charleston:

"Although he was nearing fifty when he came to St. Michael's as rector twenty-five years ago, no man has been more of a Charlestonian than the Rev. John Kershaw, D. D. He loved this city and he was saturated with its traditions. Its people loved him. His character and his bearing were always such as to command respect everywhere, and he had besides the gift of friendliness, winning and holding the affection and the confidence of those with whom he was thrown. Loss of health did not alter the brave and uncomplaining serenity of his life and at the last he awaited the end in the same quiet faith which he had exemplified through all his ministry. His influence was not confined to his own parish or to his own church. He was a community figure, and it is as a community figure that he will be remembered."

EAST CAROLINA

Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop.

Thirty-eighth Council Largely Attended.

The remark of Bishop Darst in his annual address to the Council of the Diocese of East Carolina, that "in many ways the year 1920 was the most remarkable and fruitful year in the history of the Diocese," was borne out by the statistical summary of the year's activity and by every report submitted to the delegates. That East Carolina has in large measure merited the reputation which she has acquired as one of the leading dioceses of the Church was evident to the delegates who heard the address of the Bishop and listened to the reports of the diocesan officers.

The thirty-eighth Counil of the Diocese, which met this year in old St. Paul's Church, Edenton, was unusually well attended. The two-day session, April 5-6, was marked by inspirational addresses and a strict attention to the transaction of the business before it. The Woman's Auxiliary and Parochial Society, which held their business sessions in the Edenton Methodist Church, was well attended. The women of East Carolina did by far the best year's work in their history. Mrs. James Grist Staton presided over the meetings held by the women.

On Monday evening preceding the Council there was held in St. Paul's Church a service in the interest of Christian Social Service. This was featured by an address by the Rev. Charles N. Lathrop. On Tuesday morning Council convened, organizing by re-electing the Rev. R. B. Drane, D. D., as president, and the Ven. W. R. Noe as secretary. At the service of Holy Communion the Bishop delivered his annual address. The remainder of the day was given to business sessions. The report of the Diocesan Treasurer was given careful consideration. Note was taken of the fact that in 1920 the Diocese contributed $88,895.57 for the general work of the Church, as over against $34,415.21 during 1919. The statement of the Treasurer that many clergymen of the Diocese are unprotected by reason of the unsatisfactory way in which Pension Fund premiums are paid resulted in legislation that will in future protect them. Reports of the various diocesan institutions and those in which the Diocese is interested, were of an encouraging nature. The Council went on record as giving further endorsement to the Sewanee Endowment Fund.

The service Tuesday night was featured by an address delivered by the Rev. Dr. Milton, an East Carolina clergyman loaned to the New York office. Other addresses were made by Mrs. K. C. B. Wade, of New York, and by the Rev. W. W. Way, rector of St. Mary's School, Raleigh.

Wednesday was given over largely to a consideration of business. A resolution offered on the floor of the Council that the women be given seats in Council was counteracted by a message from the women that they did not desire such representation. A committee appointed to make a study of the recommendations of the Bishop's address, recommended the employment of a secretary to relieve the Bishop of much work, and gave its cordial endorsement of the work of the Archdeaconry of Wilmington.

The closing service on Wednesday night was featured by addresses by a representative of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew and a number of the fine laymen of this Diocese.

Election results are as follows: Standing Committee—The Rev. Messrs. R. B. Drane, F. J. H. Coffin and Archer Boogher, Messrs. Frank Wood and J. G. Bragaw, Jr. Bishop and Executive Council—The Rev. Messrs. W. H. Milton, G. W. Lay, J. N. Bynum, R. E. Gribben, Archer Boogher and Howard Alligood; Messrs. B. R. Huske, George B. Elliot, T. B. Smith, J. R. Tolar, Jr., and J. G. Bragaw, Jr.; Mesdames J. G. Staton, Richard Williams and W. D. McMillan, Jr. The Rev. Theodore Partrick, Jr., was re-elected editor of the Mission Herald, and Mr. T. D. Meares was re-elected Diocesan Treasurer.

T. P., Jr.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Diocese to Have Executive Council.

Unanimous adoption of a new canon providing for an Executive Council to take effect the first of June, the passing of a resolution to hold a Diocesan Conference on Religious Education and Christian Social Service, the day before the next Diocesan Convention, which will meet in Christ Church, Savannah, May 10, 1922, a fine address from the Bishop, and eloquent addresses from the Rev. W. H. Milton, D. D., and the Rev. Charles N. Lathrop, D. D., were notable events of the ninety-ninth annual convention of the Diocese of Georgia, which was held in St. Thomas' Church, Thomasville, April 13 and 14.

The convention opened Wednesday morning with a celebration of the Holy Communion and confirmation of four candidates. The Bishop was the celebrant, assisted by the Rev. W. H. Higgins, rector of the parish; the Rev. G. S. Whitney and the Rev. S. J. French.

Discussion of the new canon came the morning of the second day, when the Committee on Constitution and Canons, appointed at the last convention, brought in its report. There was little debate on the question, and the canon was passed almost without change as presented. The canon provides for a council of six clergymen and six laymen, the Treasurer of the Diocese and the Treasurer of the Council to be elected at each annual convention, the Bishop to be President of the Council. Those elected later to be members of the Council are the Rev. John D. Wing, D. D., rector of Christ Church, and the Rev. William T. Dakin, rector of St. John's Church, Savannah; the Rev. James B. Lawrence, rector of Calvary Church, Americus; the Rev. William Johnson, rector of St. Mark's Church, Brunswick; the Rev. John Moore Walker, rector of St. Paul's Church, Albany, and the Rev. W. H. Higgins, rector of St. Thomas' Church, Thomasville; laymen, Messrs. J. R. Anderson, W. W. Williamson and O. T. McIntosh, of Savannah; F. D. Aiken, of Brunswick; O. T. Waring, of Waycross, and John D. Twiggs, of Augusta. Mr. B. B. Russell, Jr., was re-elected Treasurer of the Diocese. The Treasurer of the Council will be elected by the Council, which will hold its first meeting in May.

The Bishop, in his address, spoke most forcefully on the question of law and order, especially in connection with prohibition and mob violence, and asked the convention to adopt and to publish its condemnation of all mob violence, of all acts of injustice against the negro, and to declare its opinion that "the organization of the Ku Klux Klan is more than a mistake. It is an unwarranted and dangerous folly." This was later done by a resolution offered by a special committee and passed, approving all that was said by the Bishop as expressive of its sentiment on the subject, and recommending that the clergy read that part of the address to their congregations.

Wednesday evening reports were read by the Secretary of the Board of Missions and the Nation-Wide Campaign. $13,268.38 was the total amount of receipts from all sources received by the Board of Missions during the year. The work is now almost entirely absorbed by the Nation-Wide Campaign, and the function of the Board is confined to advising the Bishop on the missions in the Diocese. $1,700 is the average amount of salary paid where rectories are provided, and $2,000 where they are not. The total amount pledged for 1921 for the Nation-Wide Campaign is $37,259.01. Of the sum of $38,025.91 paid in last year, $25,429.83 was sent to the Treasurer of the Presiding Bishop and Council, and $12,597.08 was used for diocesan purposes. This shows an increase of 146 per cent. over the previous year.

Dean Lathrop, in his address Wednesday evening, told of the program of his department in having a uniform diocesan program, and Dr. Milton, first thanking the Diocese for the gift of its Bishop in giving his time and services to the Church, said, "If the Nation-Wide Campaign has any success it will be from men from the field like Bishop Reese."

The Rev. Mercer P. Logan, Secretary of the Provincial Board of Religious Education, addressed the convention the first day, on the Summer School for Church Workers at Sewanee, and made a plea for a larger attendance from the Diocese of Georgia.

A resolution to change the constitution allowing for women delegates at the convention was brought in too late to be discussed, and was referred to the Committee on Constitution and Canons, to be considered next year. The convention went on record as wishing to co-operate with the proper authorities in this country of the Greek Orthodox Church in seeing that the religious welfare of her numerous communicants be more diligently looked to, and that the Bishop be requested to carry the foregoing suggestion into effect.

Elections resulted as follows:

Members of the Standing Committee—The Rev. Messrs. G. S. Whitney, J. D. Wing, D. D., J. B. Lawrence, S. B. McGlohon; Messrs. George T. Cann, J. R. Anderson, Thomas Purse and A. B. Moore.

Delegates to the Provincial Synod, which will meet in Savannah October 25—The Rev. Messrs. H. H. Barber, W. H. Higgins, J. J. Cornish, W. B. Sams, William Johnson, R. G. Shannonhouse, and the Messrs. F. D. Aiken, Marion Ridgely, J. H. Merrill, N. A. Teague, R. C. Balfour, Sr., and S. N. Conner.

The Bishop consecrated the Chapel of the Good Shepherd at the Episcopal Orphans' Home in Savannah on Friday morning, April 1. Eighteen months ago the Board of Managers bought property in the southeastern section of the city and moved the home to a more desirable location.

E. D. J.

FLORIDA.

Rt. Rev. E. G. Weed, D. D., Bishop.

Centennial of Trinity Parish, St. Augustine, and the Coming of the Church to Florida.

The hundredth anniversary of the founding of Trinity Parish, St. Augustine, and the coming of the Church to Florida was celebrated in Trinity Church on Sunday, April 10, in connection with the seventy-eighth Council of the Diocese of Florida, which was in session on the following Monday and Tuesday. The Woman's Auxiliary and the Daughters of the King also met at the same time.

As this was an extraordinary epoch in the life of the Church in Florida, and concerned the missionary jurisdiction as well as the Diocese, invitations were extended by Trinity Parish to the clergy and many prominent laymen throughout the State, many of whom were able to be present. The Bishop of Southern Florida, the Rt. Rev. Cameron Mann, D. D., unfortunately had an engagement which he found it impossible to postpone.

The Thanksgiving celebration service was held on Sunday morning. Memorials, consisting of a bronze tablet commemorating the event and a silver communion set were to have been dedicated at this service, but were not completed in time. The church was most beautifully decorated by the Altar Guild. The Holy Communion was celebrated by the Rev. L. Fitz-James Hindry, rector of the parish, and the Bishop of the Diocese, and the Rev. Melville E. Johnson, the Bishop's chaplain, assisted in the service. Upwards of three hundred persons communicated, the largest number at one service in the history of the parish. The historical sermon was preached by the Rt. Rev. Edwin Gardner Weed, D. D., and dealt with his experiences in the early days of the Diocese. At the close of the communion service, the Festival Te Deum, by Dudley Buck, was splendidly sung by the large vested choir under the direction of F. A. Henderich, the choir director. The church was packed to capacity, and many were turned away.

In the evening another service was held, at which the preacher was the Rev. Van Winder Shields, D. D., rector of St. John's Parish, Jacksonville, and president of the Standing Committee. Again the church was filled with a great throng of parishioners and visitors.

On Monday morning was held the opening service of the Council. The Bishop of the Diocese was the celebrant at the Holy Communion, and the sermon was preached by the rector of the parish, dealing with the history of the parish during the hundred years of its existence. At 8 o'clock in the evening a missionary meeting was held in the auditorium of the Parish House, when most interesting addresses were given by Hon. W. W. Hampton, Chancellor of the Diocese; H. L. Grady, of Apalachicola; Reginald White, senior warden of Trinity Parish, and Frederick Sturdivant Vaill, of Portland, Me., who spoke for the winter visitors. The historical sermons and addresses will be published in pamphlet form. At the opening session of the Council the Rev. Melville E. Johnson, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Jacksonville, was unanimously elected Secretary of the Diocese, to succeed the Ven. John H. Brown, late of Christ Church, Pensacola.

During the sessions of the Council most illuminating and helpful addresses were given by Rev. Dr. Milton, and Rev. Charles N. Lathrop, representing the Presiding Bishop and Council, and the Rev. Dr. Mercer P. Logan, of Charleston, S. C., representing the Province of Sewanee.

A feature of the Centennial Celebration was the serving of a buffet luncheon at the Parish House on Monday and Tuesday by the Trinity Service League. The Woman's Auxiliary and the Woman's Guild of the parish also gave a reception at the rectory on Monday afternoon, which was largely attended.

L. F. H.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Better and Bigger Sunday School Campaign Planned.

Plans for enlarging the membership of Sunday schools of all Protestant denominations were outlined at a rally of superintendents Friday night, April 15, in Holy Trinity Parish House.

The seven hundred and fourteen Sunday schools, which were represented by nearly one hundred superintendents, have a membership of 290,000. It was asserted there are about 1,000,000 persons in this city who might be enrolled.

Samuel B. Fares, general secretary of the Philadelphia Sunday School Association, said there was a lack of trained teachers, and Sunday schools would be seriously embarrassed by a sudden influx of new members.

Theodore Brown Williams, who presided, said the meeting was called as a result of the community mass meeting in the Academy of Music on March 31, at which resolutions were adopted challenging the Philadelphia Sunday School Association to prepare plans for a great forward movement by the Sunday schools of this city. He said the plan had been prepared and Mr. Fares would present it.

The "Better and Bigger Sunday School Campaign," which was adopted by the superintendents, embraces two aims:

First. To help the Sunday schools become better in organization, supervision, worship, instruction and service.

Second. To increase both the permanent enrollment and the average attendance, thus moving toward the goal of religious instruction for all the people by the churches of Philadelphia.

Of the 1,800,000 persons in Philadelphia fully 40 per cent. are Jews and Catholics, Mr. Fares said. That leaves 60 per cent., or 1,000,000 persons for the Protestant Sunday schools to look after.

Offices of the Diocese were moved April 19 from the Church House, Twelfth and Walnut Streets, to the new headquarters, 202 South Nineteenth Street. The Church House has been sold to the Chamber of Commerce.

Among the offices that will be located in the new building are those of Bishop Rhinelander and Bishop Garland, the executive officers, women's work, the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, and the Church Club.

R. R. W.

ASHEVILLE

Rt. Rev. J. M. Horner, D. D., Bishop.

District to Apply for Admission as Diocese.

Meeting in St. Mark's Parish, Gastonia, the Rev. J. W. C. Johnson, rector, the twenty-seventh annual convention of the District of Asheville, Bishop Horner presiding, assembled Wednesday, April 13, and continued through Thursday, the Woman's Auxiliary being in session at the same time and place.

The Bishop's announcement that the District was now ready to apply for admission as a diocese, and his formal issuance of a call for a special convocation for this purpose to be held in conjunction with the convention of 1922, were the matters of conspicuous note and development. This and earnest support of the mind of the Lambeth Conference on Christian Unity were the outstanding features of the annual address.

Visitors of prominence were the Rev. Ashton Oldham, of St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn, who spoke to the Woman's Auxiliary. The second evening, with the Rev. Warren W. Way, of St. Mary's School, Raleigh, Mr. Oldham addressed a large gathering of the convention and visitors in the First Presbyterian Church, a large church where a membership of over twelve hundred Presbyterians worship. Methodist and Baptist churches closed their prayer meetings and assembled with the convention. The two addresses on Christian Education and the Organized Advance of Christians for the Coming or the Kingdom were inspiring and timely.

The Rev. Louis G. Wood, for the Board of Missions, commented most favorably upon the earnest response of Asheville to the call of the nation-wide work, and the new day that it had created both within the district and in the attitude of the Church towards Asheville. All pledges to the Nation-Wide Campaign had been paid within 2 per cent. of the whole.

Reports were made by Archdeacon J. H. Griffith and Dean S. B. Stroup and H. N. Bowne, and from Christ School,

(Continued on page 21)

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

WISDOM FROM CHILDISH LIPS.

The following conversation took place not long ago between a four-year-old youngster and his grandfather. The latter, looking at him benignly, said:

"John, do you love your grandpa?"

"Yes, grandpa, I love you," came the prompt and hearty response.

"Well, John," said the old gentleman, "how much do you love me?"

The little fellow looked up confidingly and said:

"Grandpa, I love you with a love that's as big as I am."

Sometimes we get wonderful inspiration from the remarks of children. Here, for instance, we have a mere infant suggesting to us a measure of love that in a few words expresses the superlative amount of which any being is capable.

If we think of God as loving us with a love that is as big as He is, to what glorious infinities do we find ourselves carried?

In order to get anything like a true conception of a love that is as big as God, we must transfer our attention from the little four-year-old child to the great arch of heaven on a clear night. Here we see twinkling above us stars and stars and stars—to a number almost beyond counting. The naked eye finds thousands of them; the telescope discovers hundreds of thousands of them, and the camera shows us millions. They are suns. About them are revolving planets, as our earth revolves around the sun. Each of the forty million stars may be the centre of a solar system of its own.

There is the little constellation of the Pliades sparkling like a group of fireflies in a mist. It is millions of times further from us than the sun; many of the stars which compose it are hundreds of times larger than the sun. The spaces between these stars are billions of miles long.

The yard-stick of the sky is a light year. It is the distance that a ray of light traveling at the rate of 186,000 miles a second will accomplish in twelve months. The nearest of the fixed stars is more than four light years' distance from the earth. Some of them are so remote that their light must travel more than one hundred years before it meets our eyes, so they are more than six hundred trillion miles away.

These worlds and suns and planets are the symbols of infinity. They are merely parts of God's great machine. They make the claim of man to the ownership of the world seem ridiculous.

It is a far cry from the incalculable spaces of the heavens to the small stature of a four-year-old child, and yet from the lips of that infant God speaks to us, with the statement, "I love you, with a love that is as big as I am."

We know that He does, because the Good Book says, "God is Love."

It must have been some such gem of infantile wisdom that caused our Saviour to turn to the Pharisees, in the temple court, on the afternoon of Monday of the first Holy Week, with the exclamation, "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise."

Could anything be more perfect or concise than to think of God as loving us with a love that is as big as He is?

(The grandfather in the conversation above recorded is the Rev. William Byrd Lee, who has been for nearly forty years the rector of Ware Parish, and the beloved pastor of the whole of Gloucester County, Va.)

CAUSE BEFORE EFFECT.

It is almost as dangerous to play with old proverbs as it is to handle a pistol that is "never loaded."

Some years ago, when arguments on prohibition were still in vogue, an eloquent dry orator, appealing to the parents for proper training of the young, exclaimed emphatically, "Train up a child to hate the jug, and when he is old he will never depart from it."

Analogous to this is the case of the vendor of a remedy which he had recently discovered, which he felt went so to the root of the trouble that he said earnestly, "Remove the cause and the disease will follow."

In spite of this slip, it is true that if we can but get at the cause of many of our modern evils, we would make better progress than we do at present by dealing entirely with the effects.

A speaker at a recent Conference on Charities and Corrections, in defining the functions of the Church, after referring to the fact that the modern trend was for the State more and more to take over charitable institutions, and for other social agencies to deal with delinquency, poverty and defectiveness, said that he looked forward to the time when we should have "a religion of causes."

In amplifying this, he went on to say that if the Church would only discover and remedy the cause of the evil, it could safely be left to the State and to welfare organizations to do the rest. At this same conference almost every speaker went back to the origin of the evil under discussion, and it is a healthy sign that this is the direction taken by all uplifting efforts of the day.

The Juvenile Court has come into existence to get hold of the criminal in childhood, and so apply the corrective measures necessary to prevent the wayward child from becoming the confirmed adult law-breaker.

But the wayward child too often is only the result of the squalid unhappy and unattractive home, and here is a field where the Church can render a great service by encouraging the importance of home-making.

It was stated at this same conference that last year in the United States more than a million marriage licenses were issued, and that only about seventy thousand dwelling houses were built.

This means that 930,000 couples were starting out in life together in boarding houses, hotels or apartment houses. In such places it is almost impossible to create the environment that will keep children off the streets, or offer any adequate counter attraction to moving picture shows, traveling carnivals or street corner loafing. Even in a few rooms, however, a home life atmosphere can be secured, if the parents are willing to give some of their time and thought to this all-important question. Encouragement in the playing of all sorts of games, like checkers, dominoes and carrums, and even cards, is an excellent thing. If parents would organize into groups, arranging to have their children at successive homes from evening to evening, no one place need become such a continual rendezvous as to be too great a strain upon any one set of parents, and at the same time all would know where their children were and what they were doing.

Of course, when children see their elders on a perpetual drive for excitement, they will naturally follow their example, and no home life can be expected when the parents are never present or trying to make things pleasant for the children.

Let our churches do everything possible to encourage and cultivate happy homes in which children will be glad to stay and so avoid the temptations which beset them in so much of their seeking after amusement. In this way a great service can be rendered, which will go far in reducing the amount of juvenile delinquency.

The word written across the Book is "sacrifice." Life is built up of sacrifice. It is the law of motherhood and of love, the soul of heroism, the essence of nobleness. Ages sacrifice themselves for the race that follows. There is nothing diviner than for a man to die for sins not His own. The world will never be redeemed until men are ready to die for it. Caiaphas defines the meaning of Christ in history. He is the Lamb of God.—W. J. Dawson.

made a plea for a larger attendance from the Diocese of Georgia.

A resolution to change the constitution allowing for women delegates at the convention was brought in too late to be discussed, and was referred to the Committee on Constitution and Canons, to be considered next year. The convention went on record as wishing to co-operate with the proper authorities in this country of the Greek Orthodox Church in seeing that the religious welfare of her numerous communicants be more diligently looked to, and that the Bishop be requested to carry the foregoing suggestion into effect.

Elections resulted as follows:

Members of the Standing Committee—The Rev. Messrs. G. S. Whitney, J. D. Wing, D. D., J. B. Lawrence, S. B. McGlohon; Messrs. George T. Cann, J. R. Anderson, Thomas Purse and A. B. Moore.

Delegates to the Provincial Synod, which will meet in Savannah October 25—The Rev. Messrs. H. H. Barber, W. H. Higgins, J. J. Cornish, W. B. Sams, William Johnson, R. G. Shannonhouse, and the Messrs. F. D. Aiken, Marion Ridgely, J. H. Merrill, N. A. Teague, R. C. Balfour, Sr., and S. N. Conner.

The Bishop consecrated the Chapel of the Good Shepherd at the Episcopal Orphans' Home in Savannah on Friday morning, April 1. Eighteen months ago the Board of Managers bought property in the southeastern section of the city and moved the home to a more desirable location.

E. D. J.

FLORIDA.

Rt. Rev. E. G. Weed, D. D., Bishop.

Centennial of Trinity Parish, St. Augustine, and the Coming of the Church to Florida.

The hundredth anniversary of the founding of Trinity Parish, St. Augustine, and the coming of the Church to Florida was celebrated in Trinity Church on Sunday, April 10, in connection with the seventy-eighth Council of the Diocese of Florida, which was in session on the following Monday and Tuesday. The Woman's Auxiliary and the Daughters of the King also met at the same time.

As this was an extraordinary epoch in the life of the Church in Florida, and concerned the missionary jurisdiction as well as the Diocese, invitations were extended by Trinity Parish to the clergy and many prominent laymen throughout the State, many of whom were able to be present. The Bishop of Southern Florida, the Rt. Rev. Cameron Mann, D. D., unfortunately had an engagement which he found it impossible to postpone.

The Thanksgiving celebration service was held on Sunday morning. Memorials, consisting of a bronze tablet commemorating the event and a silver communion set were to have been dedicated at this service, but were not completed in time. The church was most beautifully decorated by the Altar Guild. The Holy Communion was celebrated by the Rev. L. Fitz-James Hindry, rector of the parish, and the Bishop of the Diocese, and the Rev. Melville E. Johnson, the Bishop's chaplain, assisted in the service. Upwards of three hundred persons communicated, the largest number at one service in the history of the parish. The historical sermon was preached by the Rt. Rev. Edwin Gardner Weed, D. D., and dealt with his experiences in the early days of the Diocese. At the close of the communion service, the Festival Te Deum, by Dudley Buck, was splendidly sung by the large vested choir under the direction of F. A. Henderich, the choir director. The church was packed to capacity, and many were turned away.

In the evening another service was held, at which the preacher was the Rev. Van Winder Shields, D. D., rector of St. John's Parish, Jacksonville, and president of the Standing Committee. Again the church was filled with a great throng of parishioners and visitors.

On Monday morning was held the opening service of the Council. The Bishop of the Diocese was the celebrant at the Holy Communion, and the sermon was preached by the rector of the parish, dealing with the history of the parish during the hundred years of its existence. At 8 o'clock in the evening a missionary meeting was held in the auditorium of the Parish House, when most interesting addresses were given by Hon. W. W. Hampton, Chancellor of the Diocese; H. L. Grady, of Apalachicola; Reginald White, senior warden of Trinity Parish, and Frederick Sturdivant Vaill, of Portland, Me., who spoke for the winter visitors. The historical sermons and addresses will be published in pamphlet form. At the opening session of the Council the Rev. Melville E. Johnson, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Jacksonville, was unanimously elected Secretary of the Diocese, to succeed the Ven. John H. Brown, late of Christ Church, Pensacola.

During the sessions of the Council most illuminating and helpful addresses were given by Rev. Dr. Milton, and Rev. Charles N. Lathrop, representing the Presiding Bishop and Council, and the Rev. Dr. Mercer P. Logan, of Charleston, S. C., representing the Province of Sewanee.

A feature of the Centennial Celebration was the serving of a buffet luncheon at the Parish House on Monday and Tuesday by the Trinity Service League. The Woman's Auxiliary and the Woman's Guild of the parish also gave a reception at the rectory on Monday afternoon, which was largely attended.

L. F. H.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Better and Bigger Sunday School Campaign Planned.

Plans for enlarging the membership of Sunday schools of all Protestant denominations were outlined at a rally of superintendents Friday night, April 15, in Holy Trinity Parish House.

The seven hundred and fourteen Sunday schools, which were represented by nearly one hundred superintendents, have a membership of 290,000. It was asserted there are about 1,000,000 persons in this city who might be enrolled.

Samuel B. Fares, general secretary of the Philadelphia Sunday School Association, said there was a lack of trained teachers, and Sunday schools would be seriously embarrassed by a sudden influx of new members.

Theodore Brown Williams, who presided, said the meeting was called as a result of the community mass meeting in the Academy of Music on March 31, at which resolutions were adopted challenging the Philadelphia Sunday School Association to prepare plans for a great forward movement by the Sunday schools of this city. He said the plan had been prepared and Mr. Fares would present it.

The "Better and Bigger Sunday School Campaign," which was adopted by the superintendents, embraces two aims:

First. To help the Sunday schools become better in organization, supervision, worship, instruction and service.

Second. To increase both the permanent enrollment and the average attendance, thus moving toward the goal of religious instruction for all the people by the churches of Philadelphia.

Of the 1,800,000 persons in Philadelphia fully 40 per cent. are Jews and Catholics, Mr. Fares said. That leaves 60 per cent., or 1,000,000 persons for the Protestant Sunday schools to look after.

Offices of the Diocese were moved April 19 from the Church House, Twelfth and Walnut Streets, to the new headquarters, 202 South Nineteenth Street. The Church House has been sold to the Chamber of Commerce.

Among the offices that will be located in the new building are those of Bishop Rhinelander and Bishop Garland, the executive officers, women's work, the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, and the Church Club.

R. R. W.

ASHEVILLE

Rt. Rev. J. M. Horner, D. D., Bishop.

District to Apply for Admission as Diocese.

Meeting in St. Mark's Parish, Gastonia, the Rev. J. W. C. Johnson, rector, the twenty-seventh annual convention of the District of Asheville, Bishop Horner presiding, assembled Wednesday, April 13, and continued through Thursday, the Woman's Auxiliary being in session at the same time and place.

The Bishop's announcement that the District was now ready to apply for admission as a diocese, and his formal issuance of a call for a special convocation for this purpose to be held in conjunction with the convention of 1922, were the matters of conspicuous note and development. This and earnest support of the mind of the Lambeth Conference on Christian Unity were the outstanding features of the annual address.

Visitors of prominence were the Rev. Ashton Oldham, of St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn, who spoke to the Woman's Auxiliary. The second evening, with the Rev. Warren W. Way, of St. Mary's School, Raleigh, Mr. Oldham addressed a large gathering of the convention and visitors in the First Presbyterian Church, a large church where a membership of over twelve hundred Presbyterians worship. Methodist and Baptist churches closed their prayer meetings and assembled with the convention. The two addresses on Christian Education and the Organized Advance of Christians for the Coming of the Kingdom were inspiring and timely.

The Rev. Louis G. Wood, for the Board of Missions, commented most favorably upon the earnest response of Asheville to the call of the nation-wide work, and the new day that it had created both within the district and in the attitude of the Church towards Asheville. All pledges to the Nation-Wide Campaign had been paid within 2 per cent. of the whole.

Reports were made by Archdeacon J. H. Griffith and Dean S. B. Stroup and H. N. Bowne, and from Christ School,

(Continued on page 21)

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

WISDOM FROM CHILDISH LIPS.

The following conversation took place not long ago between a four-year-old youngster and his grandfather. The latter, looking at him benignly, said:

"John, do you love your grandpa?"

"Yes, grandpa, I love you," came the prompt and hearty response.

"Well, John," said the old gentleman, "how much do you love me?"

The little fellow looked up confidingly and said:

"Grandpa, I love you with a love that's as big as I am."

Sometimes we get wonderful inspiration from the remarks of children. Here, for instance, we have a mere infant suggesting to us a measure of love that in a few words expresses the superlative amount of which any being is capable.

If we think of God as loving us with a love that is as big as He is, to what glorious infinities do we find ourselves carried?

In order to get anything like a true conception of a love that is as big as God, we must transfer our attention from the little four-year-old child to the great arch of heaven on a clear night. Here we see twinkling above us stars and stars and stars—to a number almost beyond counting. The naked eye finds thousands of them; the telescope discovers hundreds of thousands of them, and the camera shows us millions. They are suns. About them are revolving planets, as our earth revolves around the sun. Each of the forty million stars may be the centre of a solar system of its own.

There is the little constellation of the Pliades sparkling like a group of fireflies in a mist. It is millions of times further from us than the sun; many of the stars which compose it are hundreds of times larger than the sun. The spaces between these stars are billions of miles long.

The yard-stick of the sky is a light year. It is the distance that a ray of light traveling at the rate of 186,000 miles a second will accomplish in twelve months. The nearest of the fixed stars is more than four light years' distance from the earth. Some of them are so remote that their light must travel more than one hundred years before it meets our eyes, so they are more than six hundred trillion miles away.

These worlds and suns and planets are the symbols of infinity. They are merely parts of God's great machine. They make the claim of man to the ownership of the world seem ridiculous.

It is a far cry from the incalculable spaces of the heavens to the small stature of a four-year-old child, and yet from the lips of that infant God speaks to us, with the statement, "I love you, with a love that is as big as I am."

We know that He does, because the Good Book says, "God is Love."

It must have been some such gem of infantile wisdom that caused our Saviour to turn to the Pharisees, in the temple court, on the afternoon of Monday of the first Holy Week, with the exclamation, "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise."

Could anything be more perfect or concise than to think of God as loving us with a love that is as big as He is?

(The grandfather in the conversation above recorded is the Rev. William Byrd Lee, who has been for nearly forty years the rector of Ware Parish, and the beloved pastor of the whole of Gloucester County, Va.)

CAUSE BEFORE EFFECT.

It is almost as dangerous to play with old proverbs as it is to handle a pistol that is "never loaded."

Some years ago, when arguments on prohibition were still in vogue, an eloquent dry orator, appealing to the parents for proper training of the young, exclaimed emphatically, "Train up a child to hate the jug, and when he is old he will never depart from it."

Analogous to this is the case of the vendor of a remedy which he had recently discovered, which he felt went so to the root of the trouble that he said earnestly, "Remove the cause and the disease will follow."

In spite of this slip, it is true that if we can but get at the cause of many of our modern evils, we would make better progress than we do at present by dealing entirely with the effects.

A speaker at a recent Conference on Charities and Corrections, in defining the functions of the Church, after referring to the fact that the modern trend was for the State more and more to take over charitable institutions, and for other social agencies to deal with delinquency, poverty and defectiveness, said that he looked forward to the time when we should have "a religion of causes."

In amplifying this, he went on to say that if the Church would only discover and remedy the cause of the evil, it could safely be left to the State and to welfare organizations to do the rest. At this same conference almost every speaker went back to the origin of the evil under discussion, and it is a healthy sign that this is the direction taken by all uplifting efforts of the day.

The Juvenile Court has come into existence to get hold of the criminal in childhood, and so apply the corrective measures necessary to prevent the wayward child from becoming the confirmed adult law-breaker.

But the wayward child too often is only the result of the squalid unhappy and unattractive home, and here is a field where the Church can render a great service by encouraging the importance of home-making.

It was stated at this same conference that last year in the United States more than a million marriage licenses were issued, and that only about seventy thousand dwelling houses were built.

This means that 930,000 couples were starting out in life together in boarding houses, hotels or apartment houses. In such places it is almost impossible to create the environment that will keep children off the streets, or offer any adequate counter attraction to moving picture shows, traveling carnivals or street corner loafing. Even in a few rooms, however, a home life atmosphere can be secured, if the parents are willing to give some of their time and thought to this all-important question. Encouragement in the playing of all sorts of games, like checkers, dominoes and carrums, and even cards, is an excellent thing. If parents would organize into groups, arranging to have their children at successive homes from evening to evening, no one place need become such a continual rendezvous as to be too great a strain upon any one set of parents, and at the same time all would know where their children were and what they were doing.

Of course, when children see their elders on a perpetual drive for excitement, they will naturally follow their example, and no home life can be expected when the parents are never present or trying to make things pleasant for the children.

Let our churches do everything possible to encourage and cultivate happy homes in which children will be glad to stay and so avoid the temptations which beset them in so much of their seeking after amusement. In this way a great service can be rendered, which will go far in reducing the amount of juvenile delinquency.

The word written across the Book is "sacrifice." Life is built up of sacrifice. It is the law of motherhood and of love, the soul of heroism, the essence of nobleness. Ages sacrifice themselves for the race that follows. There is nothing diviner than for a man to die for sins not His own. The world will never be redeemed until men are ready to die for it. Caiaphas defines the meaning of Christ in history. He is the Lamb of God.—W. J. Dawson.

Family Department

APRIL.

1. Friday.
3. First Sunday after Easter.
10. Second Sunday after Easter.
17. Third Sunday after Easter.
24. Fourth Sunday after Easter.
25. Monday. S. Mark.
30. Saturday.

Collect for the Fourth Sunday After Easter.

O Almighty God, Who alone canst order the unruly wills and affections of sinful men; Grant unto Thy people that they may love the thing which Thou commandest, and desire that which Thou dost promise; that so among the sundry and manifold changes of the world our hearts may surely there be fixed, where true Joys are to be found; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collect for St. Mark's Day.

O Almighty God, Who hast instructed Thy holy Church with the heavenly doctrine of the evangelist St. Mark; Give us grace that, being not like children carried away with every blast of vain doctrine, we may be established in the truth of Thy holy gospel; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

For the Southern Churchman.

Tired Sheep.

Erroll Hay Colcock.

Upon a rugged mountain steep
It chanced that once a little sheep
  Grew weary on its way;
The shepherd, with a tender smile,
Bore it within his arms awhile,
  Lest it from him might stray.

And when the tired sheep had rest,
The shepherd, knowing what was best,
  Returned it to the fold;
"Once more within the flock," said he,
"Refreshed and able you will be
  To follow as of old."

So on life's journey as we go,
Oppressed with various ills and woe,
  We weary grow the same;
But there's a Shepherd Who doth keep Us in His care, and knows each sheep
  Within His flock by name.

To all who heavy-laden be.
He bids them thus: "Come unto Me . . .
  And I will give you rest."
And in the Everlasting Arms
We find the Love that soothes and calms,
  Wherein each one is blest.

O tender Shepherd, then may we
With strength renewed forever be Upheld upon our way;
And like the little sheep of old,
Restored once more unto the fold,
  Oh, may we never stray!

Behold, I Stand At the Door.

Dr. Clarence D. Ussher, in his "An American Physician in Turkey," gives the following incident:

One day we were fifteen hours in the saddle. There was a cold October rain, and when the sun set it became so dark that I could not see my hand six inches from my face. The only way in which I could follow my guide (a zabtieh), was by laying my hand on his horse's flank as he rode along in the darkness.

Suddenly I felt the zabtieh's horse drop away, and, fearing something serious had happened, halted Nedjib. However, I heard the rattling of stones as the other horse walked on, so following, down a gully, through a small stream and up the other side, and then I heard the zabtieh dismount and grope along a wall till he found a door, on which he pounded vigorously. Soon there was a voice from within calling in Armenian, "Who is it?"

"Open," answered my zabtieh in Turkish. Three times this dialogue was repeated; the third time the zabtieh shouted, "It is a consulos (foreigner). Open the door and let him in."

"Go to my neighbor; he has a better house; my house is not fit."

"Open!"

"My house is not fit; go to my neighbor; he has a better house."

"Open!" yelled the zabtieh, and afraid to disobey any longer, the man opened the door about two inches, placing his foot firmly behind it, and against the light from within we could see the profile of a villager peering into the darkness. I addressed him in Armenian. "Open the door, brother, and let us in. It is cold and wet and dark; let us in that we may spend the night."

Surprised at hearing his own language spoken, he threw the door wide open and stood gazing while I dismounted, approached him, and again asked for admission.

"Oh, sir," said he, "my house is not fit. Go to my neighbor; he has a better house."

"That does not matter. You let us in and we will make the house 'fit,'" I replied.

With Oriental courtesy he then stepped out of the doorway, and waving his hand toward the interior, said, "Enter, the house is yours."

We passed into a large room, the roof of which was supported by posts; in the far right-hand corner it had fallen in—the unrepaired damage of massacre times. The rain was drizzling through, making a puddle on the earthen floor; close by a lot of poles were laid against the wall, thus forming a chicken coop; here, too, were a wooden harrow and a plow of the kind used in the time of Virgil—a little more than the forked branch of a tree. To the left was a large fireplace and an immense copper pot in which was stewing something which emitted a very unpleasant odor. A small jirak, or native lamp, made of a piece of clay which had been flattened and the edges turned up and then burned in the fire, was on the shelf over the fireplace. A dip wick hanging over its rim emitted a smoke that made us cough. Everything was black with smut.

"You see, sir; I said my house was not fit," said my host.

"Never mind, we will make it fit," again I replied, and calling my muleteers, I had them remove the farm implements and carry the foul-smelling pot to another part of the house. They swept the dusty earthen floor and spread my bright-colored Turkish rug at the right side of the fireplace; my folding cot-bed and camp-stools were set up on this; the provision-box was put on the other side of the hearth, the top of it forming a table; last of all I got out my American lantern with its crystal-clear chimney, lighted it, put it in place of the jirak, and lo, what a transformation!

These villagers were far from civilization and had probably never seen a lamp with a chimney before. They gazed open-mouthed, then ran to the back of the house to call the woman to come and see the wonderful light and the beautiful things the foreigner had brought. The woman in turn ran out to call the neighbors, and soon there were lined up against the wall about a dozen men, picturesque in their white felt caps and colored turbans, black and gold jackets, gaudy silk shirts and wide, straight trousers.

I invited my host to eat with me. In shocked surprise he replied, "Oh, sir, that would never do. In my house you must eat of my food, but, sir, I have nothing. Nothing but a little bread and some madzoon."

"Never mind," said I. "Bring your bread and madzoon, and I will eat of your food and you shall eat of mine."

So we sat around my provision-box, the zabtieh, my host, and I; and I questioned the young man about himself and his village. His name was Garabed and the name of the village was Kharaba.

He was about twenty-seven years of age, the head of a family of twenty, his elder kinsmen having been killed in the massacre. The village church had been destroyed and its priest slain. Once a year, at Easter, a monk from a distant monastery, would come to the village and celebrate mass. There was no school.

"Are you a friend of the Lord Jesus," I asked him.

His jaw dropped and a stupid, far-away look came over his face as he grunted interrogatively. I repeated the question with the same result, then changed the form of it, and asked, "Is the Lord Jesus a friend of yours?"

Quick as a flash he answered, "No, sir; He couldn't be."

"Why not?"

"My heart is too black. Jesus could not be a friend of mine."

"Why is your heart too black?"

Without hesitation, but with a look of sadness and shame, he lowered his voice and replied, "I swear and lie and steal. Jesus could not be a friend of mine."

I urged that he was just the kind of sinner to whom Jesus wanted to be a friend, but again came the stupid, far-away look, and he did not seem to understand. Discouraged, at last I proposed that we should have family prayers before retiring. He evidently did not know what I meant, but nodded acquiescence. Anxious to have some native do the reading, I asked for a Bible, but was told there was none in the village, and no one who could read it. I then got out my own Armenian Bible from my saddle-bags and prayed to be guided as to what to read. The book opened to Revelation 3:20, and I read, "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and sup with him, and he with me."

Instantly I saw the parable. I reminded the young man how I had come to his door and knocked, and he had said to me, "Go to my neighbor; my house is not fit," just as he was saying to Jesus, "My heart is too black." I reminded him that I had said, "Just let me in and I will make it fit." I had not asked him to clean up; as soon as he had said, "Enter, the house is yours," I had had my men remove his poor belongings, sweep the floor and bring in the handsome rug and the chairs and the wonderful light which he called the neighbors to see. "Just say the same to Jesus, 'Come in! My heart and life are yours,' and He will clear away all the lying and stealing and blasphemy and make the heart a fit place for Himself. He will bring in beautiful things and a wonderful light which will attract others."

As I explained it thus a light broke over his face.

We prayed together, and then I retired, my host standing about to serve me in any way he could. As I was about to get into bed he asked timidly, "Sir, wouldn't you let me read that book?"

"What! Can you read?"

"When I was a boy I wanted very much to learn, so I ran away to a monastery, and the monks taught me a little. I think I could read it."

So I marked some passages, turned down the corners of the pages and left the book with him. I awoke at midnight to find him sitting on the carpet with the Bible on the little camp-stool and the lantern hanging from the mantel-shelf. He was following each word with his finger and spelling out every syllable. I slept and awaked at 2 o'clock and he was still poring over the book just then spelling out John 3:16, "'For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." I slept again, and when I rose at 4 o'clock he was still reading, and there was a light on his face which was not the light of the lantern.

When I left that morning I offered him money for the accommodation of the night, but he would not accept it. As I was putting the Bible in my saddle-bag, he asked if I would give it to him. Since it was the only one I had with me, and I might need it somewhere else on the road, I promised to send him another copy. This I procured the next day in Mush from a colporteur of the American Bible Society.

Garabed died three years later of cholera, but he left his mark on the life of the village. I found there, when I passed through in August, 1914, a school and a church, the fruit of that night's experience, and a neat, two-story house was standing where the dingy, ruined hovel had been.

Anniversaries.

Little family celebrations do much to strengthen family affection. Take advantage of any occasion that may prompt a gathering of the family; let not one slip away unnoticed. Marriages, births, no event of special interest should be neglected. No anniversary is more personal than a birthday, be it in youth or old age. Everybody likes to know that people are glad he is here. In the companionship of their friends, young folks are forming ties that the coming years will strengthen. And when the young people help to celebrate the birthday of a parent or elder person, they learn thoughtfulness in making others happy. As the years go by and a life of joys or sorrows is left behind, the aged person looks eagerly forward to the celebration of each coming birthday. The fewer occasions like this one may look forward to the more each anniversary means. One who has lived many years has found how fleeting is the joy in material things and has learned to value more and more love, affection and the good will that comes from the heart. In these family celebrations expense need not and should not be considered. The simplest gifts, selected with care, a flower, a card or just a loving wish carries much that makes the day happy. A letter or a card to the absent one will be a sustaining power for good when lonely, homesick or forlorn. Let the absent one know he is thought of and cared for. Do not let the birthday of any loved one pass unnoticed.—Western Watchman.

For the Southern Churchman.

Lost Opportunities.

Eva Carrington Talcott.

Oh God, forgive us for the nights when we Shut close the outer door and drew the shade
And failed the moon and starry sky to see,
The glories which Thy firmament displayed.

Forgive those golden days when touched with frost
The trees stood forth in regal splendor dressed,
And we the joy and inspiration lost
Because some duty or some pleasure pressed.

Then, too, the sunsets, the day's new birth—
The stilly snow-storms—all the perfect book
Of nature's wonders written on the earth
And we too self-absorbed to even look.

Oh God, forgive us for our littleness,
Our blindness which does make us oft pass by
The beauty Thou hast made all paths to bless—
The wondrous beauty of earth, sea and sky!

"Safety First."

But not at all cost. Prudence is far from being the highest word in the vocabulary of the soul. Not a single great undertaking for humanity would ever have commenced on the principle of "safety first." Life's greatest achievements represent somebody's risk. The last thing that Jesus considered in His ministry of redemption was the threats of His foes. Indeed, those same foes paid Him the highest compliment possible when they said derisively, "He saved others, Himself He cannot save." "Safety first," as a caution to travelers by land or sea, is well conceived. But "safety first" as a rule for the thoroughfare of life itself may be altogether pernicicus.—George Clarke Peck.

One Result of Prayer.

Among the answers to our supplications, which we may surely expect, is clarity of mind. I once asked Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell, the famous missionary of the Labrador, what he got out of prayer. He seemed not to notice the question, but went on talking about some irrelevant matter. Suddenly, interrupting the conversation, he said: "I have asked the Lord to help me answer your question," and added: "I get wisdom out of prayer." Here is a man who builds hospitals, establishes co-operative stores, pilots a ship through icebergs, engineers a great philanthropic enterprise and therewith lifts a hapless people out of misery and want, and he tells us that he gets wisdom by praying; by which statement he seems to mean that his mental faculties are sharpened, his judgment made sounder and truer.—Selected.

Boy and Dog.

A boy is mostly lonesome when he's little; grown-up folks
Don't understand his notions or his silly little jokes,
They think he's sulky sometimes when he's only very shy,
And they think he's up to mischief when he doesn't meet their eye.

They smile when he is earnest, at his little loves and tears,
They wonder at his laughter and they wonder at his tears;
So a boy, who must have some one who will answer to his call,
Has a dog that he can talk to and can love the best of all.

Dogs don't laugh at you and tease you when you tell your secret hopes,
They don't ask you what you're doing with your barrel hoops and ropes;
But they gaze at you as if you are a hero from a book,
With a world of trust and loving and confiding in their look.

Oh! a boy is always lonesome when he's little; grown-up folks
Think boys are either terrors or just silly little jokes;
But a dog—a dog's a comfort and he makes their spirits rise,
When he looks at them with loving in his almost human eyes.

—M. E. Sangster, in Christian Herald.

A Real Easter Lesson.

Look not, then, wistfully or hopelessly backward—the old experience cannot return. Look expectantly onward and upward, and seek that life from the dead—"out of" or "away from" the dead—which is the free gift of Him who hath in His gospel brought to light and to human use and enjoyment life and immortality. Such is the real Easter lesson. Its logic is as blessed as it is simple: "Christ rose; we, too, shall rise." Christ is victor, and we are already conquerors through Him. Wealth of Easter decoration and beauty of feast-day music emphasize this thought. If they do not they are spiritless and vain.—Christian Intelligencer.

Morning Hymn.

"Let there be light!" the Eternal spoke,
And from the abyss where darkness rode
The earliest dawn of nature broke,
And light around creation flowed.
The glad earth smiled to see the day,
The first-born day, come blushing in;
The young day smiled to shed its ray
Upon a world untouch'd by sin.

"Let there be light!" O'er heaven and earth,
The God Who first the day-beam pour'd,
Utter'd again His fiat forth,
And shed the gospel's light abroad.
And, like the dawn, its cheering rays
On rich and poor were meant to fall,
Inspiring their Redeemer's praise,
In lowly cot and lordly hall.

Then come, when in the Orient first
Flushes the signal light of prayer;
Come with the earliest beams that burst
From God's bright throne of glory there.
Come, kneel to Him, Who through the night
Hath watch'd above thy sleeping soul,
To Him Whose mercies, like His light,
Are shed abroad from pole to pole.

—C. F. Hoffman.

For the Young Folks

A Child's Prayer.

Lord Jesus, Thou Who lovest
  Each little child like me,
Oh, take my life and use it
  And let it shine for Thee.
Oh, give me bits of work to do
To show how much I love Thee, too

I know in distant countries,
  Beyond the deep blue sea,
Are many little children
  Thou lovest just like me,
But they have never heard Thy name
And do not know that Jesus came.

Lord, let me send Thy message
  Across the deep blue sea
To tell these little children
  What Thou hast done for me.
Oh, show me, Lord, what I can do
That they may know and love Thee, too.

—The Round World.

St. Mary's Hall, Shanghai, China.

The following letter to the Junior Auxiliaries of America is published here through the courtesy of Mrs. J. J. Lloyd. We are sure all Juniors will find it interesting, and will want to do all in their power to help "The Belles of St. Mary's":

Jessfield, Oct. 15, 1920.

My Dear Juniors—Shall I Say Fellow-Soldiers?

I wonder how many of you have heard of this very efficient girls' school here in Shanghai, China? This wonderfully thrilling work under the name of St. Mary's Hall?

Not a great many, I'm sure, though I may as well confess I judge so because I'd never heard of it till I got out here on a mere tourist trip, so I don't blame any Junior for such ignorance. But, having learned and been thrilled and uplifted and amazed with the extent to which missions have grown, I feel I can do no less than write you all about it; and being a very egotistical person again, I must tell of missions from what I myself am interested in, i. e., education of girls in China. Of course, education of boys is an absorbing affair, but, again, I being a woman, I can see very plainly that the girls' education is the thing of things in China, can't you?

"Do they want to go to school?" did you say? Well, they want the education so badly that they study the same English lessons as you do—your preparatory and high school in English—if you please, and at the same time take a full course in Chinese, and compiete this course in the same number of years that you take. Could you do it? Fairly good students, aren't they? And over a third of these girls take music in addition! Oh, yes, they certainly like school; the trick is to get them to stop studying, not to stop playing Can you sympathize with them? "Are they awfully solemn and stiff?" did you ask? Well, I had an idea they were till I got out here, and then to my amazement and relief I found that my idea was just about fifteen years out of date; that their mothers might have been stiff and proper and solemn, but this generation is just about as full of fun and mischief and also of ideals and love for country as you girls at home.

They have nicknames for each other that are just perfectly killing, and I've heard incidentally that they also have them for us foreign teachers, and they fit, too!

The freshmen of the class of 1914 selected for their class colors white, black and green; and why? Because one of their English teachers was going home to America and they chose black to show they mourned her going away; and white was gratitude for what she had taught them; and green was for the hope she'd come back to St. Mary's again. Yes, indeed, that teacher went back. Would you be able to stay away if you had such love shown you?

When the cable came in October, 1916, telling us of the $100,000 for the new St. Mary's, and the girls heard of the splendid way in which you Juniors had helped to raise it, they straightway made up their minds that they would have at least one of those new buildings put up by money given by Chinese alone, so that the Chinese women's love might be represented, and so the alumnae organized and have something like $12,000 for the new auditorium; and the last two thousand dollars of that twelve thousand they have just raised by giving an entertainment in a public theatre in Shanghai.

This year's Seniors vetoed a Class Day and said it will be more helpful to our school if we put in our time preparing a play, etc., and they gave in English "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves," and "The Belles of St. Mary's," as the newspaper called them, made a wonderful success of it, and played to a packed theatre.

Did you know that the Chinese are the most dramatic people in all the world? They think nothing of giving a two or three-hour play, packed full of funny sayings and doings after just casually talking it over and merely suggesting the parts; they never write the parts out.

Last summer they prepared an original patriotic Chinese play, rehearsed it, prepared the costumes, and gave it in the Olympic Theatre and raised twelve hundred dollars, all in one week, to help establish a "ragged school," where, as they so beautifully said, "the children may learn to be patriotic and good citizens for China."

They have learned to love their country just as you Juniors love yours, but they realize as you need not that they—the educated—alone can save China, and that brings me to the point that I want especially to emphasize: Only the educated Christians can save China, and, therefore, the call for schools, and more and more schools, must be answered, and answered now.

Juniors, do you get that? Does it mean anything to you? Do you see clearly that money and lives put into schools in China now will win China for Christ? Think of it! Win one-quarter of the world's inhabitants for Him, your Captain, and mine. You worked so hard for the "great war." We all heard and read of it and just loved you for it. You didn't say, "Oh, it's such a big war; what can I do? It's no use my trying." You never dreamed of saying such a cowardly thing. Instead, you said, "It's such a big thing not one can afford to be out of it." That's the spirit which doesn't even think of defeat, and so of course it wins, and that is what you are going to do with this far greater war which is on in China—give life and money to China. Study at school with the aim in mind of just how you can use that study in great big ignorant China, to raise up splendid efficient Chinese leaders. For that is what our mission schools are here for, to raise up leaders, and St. Mary's is doing it; has been doing it for years and years; getting ready for this big fight. But the call for leaders is so much more urgent now than it has ever been that we just have to expand and put up new, up-to-date and larger buildings, and to do this requires just double what it would have done before the war. That's why we are writing you, praying and trusting that each single individual Junior in America will do her bit—her best bit—to put up the new St. Mary's this year. You will, won't you? You do care; of course you do. We are depending on you; there is no other way. Don't fail Him, will you?

Lovingly,
ELLA P. ELY.

This project is on the N.-W. C. budget.

Little Miss Tardygirl.

At bedtime she sat in the firelight's
  gleam,
And little Miss Tardygirl had a queer dream.
She dreamed that she'd turned to a wee flower-elf,
And was out in the meadow to live by herself.
Her breakfast was served in a big buttercup,
But she came there too late, and a bee ate it up!
She managed to miss every thistle-down car
That went to the knoll where the blueberries are,
And she was too late at the Toadstool
  Cafe,
And so she went hungry the long summer day.

At last it grew dark, and she looked for a bed.
"I'll sleep in that lily," she drowsily said.
To reach it she climbed up a grass-stalk
  so green;
How soft was its golden heart, a bed for a queen!
"Too late," said the lily, and shut her bed tight,
Leaving poor little Tardygirl out in the night.
At bedtime she sat in the firelight's
  gleam,
And little Miss Tardygirl woke from her
  dream;
She blinked her blue eyes as she rushed to her bed.
"Oh, don't shut it up—I am coming," she said.

—Mabel S. Merrill, in Youth's Companion.

On the Farm.

The first night that Donald and his sister Claire were on the farm they were homesick. They lived in a city, and when night came they said, "We didn't know it is so dark at night." They looked up at the stars and said, "Dear little stars, aren't you afraid 'way up in the big black sky?" Then they said their prayers, cried a little, and fell asleep.

Early next morning they heard a rooster crow. "Hurrah!" they cried. "Tomorrow has come." They dressed much quicker than they ever did at home and ran down stairs. Uncle Jim said, "Come, children, you must learn to feed the chickens."

They thought it would be good fun to name the chickens and teach them to come when they were called. They named one hen Specky and another

Becky, but the hens looked so much alike that the next day they were not sure which hen was Specky and which hen was Becky.

Then Donald said, "I'll tell you! I've read a great deal about the intelligence of animals. Maybe those hens remember their names. Let's get some corn and call them."

So they brought some corn and Claire held it in her hand, saying, "Come, Specky; come, Becky," and what do you think? Every hen came running as fast as she could run.

"Isn't that funny?" said Donald; "we only named two hens!"

"Perhaps they all wished they had those names," said Claire.

But Uncle Jim had heard it all and he said, "It isn't names that hens care about—it's corn."—Shepherd's Arms.

True St. Bernard Story.

This St. Bernard lived in Switzerland. His name was Santo and he belonged to an innkeeper up in the mountains. One wild, stormy night when he was lying by the hearth-fire apparently asleep, and his master and mistress were taking their ease because they knew no guests would come on such a night, Santo suddenly jumped up and insisted on going out. His master tried to dissuade him, saying: "No, Santo, you do not want to go out such a terrible night as this; see how the snow drifts and how the wind blows!" But Santo grew much excited, and in spite of all persuasion got out and started down the mountain road as fast as he could go and as if he knew exactly where he was going.

About two hours later he returned, almost exhausted, with a baby lashed to his back with a piece of harness. You can imagine how amazed the innkeeper and his wife were and how quickly she took the baby and warmed and fed him. The man roused the neighbors, who followed Santo, now restlessly waiting for them. With such things as they could carry to help those they knew they should find in dire need, they waded through the snow two miles to a gully road, where they came upon an overturned bus from which the frightened horses had run away. There they found, huddled together for warmth, seven people, including the baby's father and mother. You can imagine how happy they were to know that the baby was safe. The innkeeper and the neighbors succeeded in getting all the travelers back to the inn, and so Santo really saved all those lives.

Now how did Santo know, in the first place, that there was trouble somewhere? Shut your eyes and think, before you read the next line, and learn that what made him prick up his ears and insist on getting out was the sound of the pounding of the runaway horses' hoofs, which his keen hearing caught, above the roar of the storm. He had before associated that sound with trouble, and his instinct made him go to the rescue.—Our Dumb Animals.

Prince and the Pie.

Old Prince likes pie—oh, just as well
As I do! And he'll smell, and smell
All 'round my pockets, when I go
Into his stall, he's hoping so
That I've brought pie. And oh, one day
When he'd been working, hauling hay,
And afterward had been turned out
Just to cool off, and browse about,
He strolled up 'round the house—back side—
And he saw a window open wide—
The pantry window!—and, oh my!
On the sill, to cool, sat my saucer pie!
And when I went in after it,
Prince was eating the last wee bit!
And first I almost thought I'd cry,
For oh, I do like saucer pie!
But Prince just smiled, with his kind old eyes,
And then I wished for a bushel of pies—
Apple, and custard, and peach, and mince—
Every one for our dear old Prince!
—Our Dumb Animals.

Service Through Daily Tasks.

A task becomes of supreme value in itself and a stepping stone to something more worthy, only as we put into its performance our best of skill and devotion.

In one of our Western cities there sat one night several years ago a number of telephone girls. As they responded to the calls during the busy evening hours or talked together during the quieter hours it was not apparent that they were different from each other.

In an instant, however, everything was changed. In passing a window an operator discovered that a fire had broken out in the business section next to the telephone building.

"The whole town's on fire, girls! Run for your lives!" shouted the operator. And the girls did; deserting their posts, they started pell-mell down the stairs—all except Rose Coppinger.

A moment before Rose had been one of the group. Now she was in a class by herself. Calmly she sat at her post, called up the fire department and then began summoning aid from the country about.

No one thought of Rose Coppinger until the telephone building was in flames. Then some one remembered. Desperate efforts were made and the operarting-room was reached. Rose was found unconscious at her post with the telephone receiver strapped to her ear. Wet blankets and restorative measures brought her back to consciousness and saved her life.

When the fire had been brought under control with a part of the town still unburned the herorism of the telephone operator began to stand out. A committee of the citizens presented the brave girl a generous purse "for heroic service in saving the town from absolute destruction."

Better than any purse to Rose was the knowledge that she had taken her task seriously, and when the test came she had been faithful even at the risk of her own life.—Selected.

The South's Best Book Store

HUNTER & CO

105 E. Broad Street

Richmond, Va.

Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen

Prompt and Reliable Service

Spring Styles

NOW READY

Have Your Old Hat Fixed Like New

Many customers use their old hats by having them made over for their children. We specialize on children's hats.

PARCEL POST DEPARTMENT AT YOUR SERVICE.

VERRA HAT WORKS

211 NORTH FIRST STREET

RANDOLPH 90

NICK BULL'S MARKET,

Richmond's Leading Dealer in

FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME

512 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.

Phone Randolph 1680

WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

Jno. L. Williams & Sons

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565)

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds.

DISTANCE

Makes no difference to Berry patrons—our Mail Order Department can serve you anywhere; delivery free.

Write for our new catalogue of MEN'S and BOY'S CLOTHING.

The South's "Old Home" store with new blood and best values!

O. N. Berry Co.

ESTABLISHED 1879

Main and 11th Sts., Richmond, Va.

R. Geissler, Inc.

56 West Eighth Street, New York

Memorials

FOR THE CHURCH

Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

Leake Printing Co.

ENGRAVING, PRINTING, EMBOSSING.

Special attention to out-of-town orders.

Samples sent upon request.

615 East Main Street, Richmond, Va.

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

FAMINE RELIEF.

For the convenience of our readers we publish the addresses of the treasurers of the various Relief Funds whose appeals for the starving, and especially for starving children are so urgent and touching. The Southern Churchman will forward contributions to any of these, but to save time, postage and possibility of miscarriage, checks would better be sent directly to the treasurers as below:

Near East Relief (formerly "Armenian and Syrian Relief")—Cleveland H. Dodge, No. 1 Madison Ave., New York City.

European Relief (Central and Eastern Europe)—Franklin K. Lane, 42 Broadway, New York City; or locally for Virginia, DeSoto Fitzgerald, 218 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.

Chinese Famine Relief—Remit through Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer, Presiding Bishop and Council, 281 Fourth Ave., New York City.

PIPE ORGANS

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID in building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

DON'T TRY ON YOUR NEW DRESSES over your old corset. Let us help you select and fit to you the corset that does greatest justice to your figure. The Corset Shop, 317 N. Fifth St. Mrs. A. J. Pyle, Prop. Phone Ran. 3397.

Doll Skirts Accordion Pleated Free. ASHBY B. PYLE, 315 N. 5th St. Hemstitching, Pinking and Button Covering.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER

invites you to inspect her line of GAGE Tailored HATS. Also the ADVANCE Showing of Spring Hats in the most attractive shapes.

209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

NIAGARA METAL WEATHER STRIPS

Saves 25 per cent. Fuel, Prevents Rattling Windows, keeps out Dust, Dirt and Storm.

CINCINNATI REWIRABLE METAL AND WOOD FRAME SCREENS.

L. F. HEROLD,
2 N. 11th St., Richmond, Va.
Phone Randolph 3350.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

THE DAUGHTER OF A CLERGYMAN desires board in the country with a Church family. Address information to the Rev. Roger Atkinson Walke, Pikesville, Md.

A GENTLEMAN DESIRES WHOLESOME country board and pleasant room with open fire, in well-bred Virginia family. Piedmont or mountains. Kindly send terms, location, etc., to "B. R.," care of Southern Churchman

CATHEDRAL STUDIO, ENGLISH Church embroideries and materials. Stoles with crosses, $7; plain, $5.50; handsome gift stoles, $12 up; burse and veil, $15, $20. Surplices and exquisite altar linens. L. V. Mackrille, 2604 Thirty-sixth St., N. W., Washington, D. C. Tel. Chev. 1915.

HELP WANTED

YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCATION AND refinement wanted to enter the St. John's Hospital Training School for Nurses (Episcopal), Brooklyn, N. Y. Applicants required to have one year of high school or its equivalent. Course three years. A registered school of high standing. Nurses receive remuneration. Many social privileges. Home life pleasant. Graduates are now receiving $6.00 per day. Apply to St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

SITUATIONS WANTED.

REFINED, EDUCATED WOMAN DESIRES engagement as housekeeper, house mother in school, care of gentleman's home and children, or any position where executive ability is desired. References. Address "L. S. L.," care Southern Churchman.

WANTED POSITION AS (TRAVELING) companion to a lady, by a lady of pleasing personality. For information address Rev. R. R. Phelps, 105 Pine Street, Berkley (Norfolk), Va.

A PRIMARY TEACHER OF EXPERience wishes a position during the summer months as helper in school or orphanage. Address Grace Mellichamp, Congaree, S. C.

A LADY—CHURCHWOMAN WITH BEST references—wants position as traveling companion for all, or part of summer, on very reasonable terms. Address "T," Southern Churchman.

EPISCOPAL CLERGYMAN WILL SUPply during months of July and August. Address "4," care Southern Churchman.

LADY OF REFINEMENT AND EXPERience desires the care of country home, or club: best of references. Address "M. A. B.," care of Southern Churchman

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT.

Whereas it has pleased God in His mercy to call to his reward our most esteemed townsman and fellow-churchman, Mr. Beverly W. Stras, we, the members of the Auxiliary of Stras Memorial Church, wish to express to our beloved associates, Mrs. B. W. Stras and Mrs. B. W. Stras, Jr., who is also our President, as well as to the other members of his family, our heartfelt sympathy in their great bereavement.

Mr. Stras was a man of high character, so modest and retiring that only those who knew him well fully appreciated his great worth. He will be sadly missed in the church in whose welfare he took the keenest interest, as well as by the whole community.

Be it therefore, resolved, That our secretary be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the members of his family, to spread them upon the minutes of the Auxiliary and to have them published in the Southern Churchman.

By order of the Auxiliary of Stras Memorial Church.

ELIZABETH JACKSON,
Secretary.

BEVERLY W. STRAS.

The clergy and vestry of Tazewell Parish, in the Archdeaconry of Southwestern Virginia, desire to place on permanent record the esteem and veneration in which the late Beverly W. Stras was held, and to express the deepest appreciation and gratitude for the services he rendered the Church, both by the spirituality of his life and the wisdom and fitness of his counsel.

For years he served as member of the vestry, as delegate to the Diocesan Council and as a Sunday school worker in the church, which was erected by his family and friends to the memory of his mother. Many of these years were marked by anxiety and difficulty, but he never wavered in his devotion and loyalty and he never failed to render admirable support to the work of the Church.

In his personal life, his religion was the soul of his work. His high position in the community was beautified and dignified by the humility and loveliness of his spirit. To him, the personal relation to God in prayer and the worship of the Church were the important things in life; his interest in them was permanent and practical. Probably few laymen have ever had a better knowledge of the doctrine and history of the Church and the rich contents of his mind furnished material for the devotion of his soul.

He entered into life on Saturday, March 5, 1921, fortified by heavenly light and power shown in his noble character. We recognize thankfully the fine qualities of his Christian manhood. In his sudden death the Church and the community are conscious of a great personal loss.

By unanimous vote of the vestry, this memorial is to be spread upon its minutes, printed in the Southwestern Episcopalian and the Southern Churchman and sent to the bereaved family.

E. W. H.

However sinful, so we be sorry, we may pray at least, Jesus remember me when Thou comest into Thy kingdom. And it shall be with us as it was with the thief, according to the old and beautiful tale, which tells how the shadow of Christ's cross fell forthwith on the cross of the penitent, sheltering Him in His agony from the burning heat of the sun.—Bishop Bernard.

Perchance in heaven, one day to me
Some blessed soul will come and say,
"All hail, beloved! But for thee
My soul to death had been a prey."
Ah, then, what swewetness in the thought
One soul to glory to have brought.

—Selected.

Many pens have attempted to write a Life of Christ since Canon Farrar wrote his famous volume. The difficulty with most of them is that they give so much attention to technical details they do not hold the interest of the general reader. For some time there has been need of a book that would make its appeal through its clearness and charm of treatment.

This need has now been filled by

PATERSON-SMYTH'S
NEW BOOK

A PEOPLE'S LIFE OF CHRIST

Told in a way that will be read again and again for the solid enjoyment it affords.

The Churchman says: "A book which the average man will read for the pleasure of reading it—a new and popular version for the day and generation."

ONLY $3.50 NET

THE SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO.
RICHMOND, VA.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

(Continued from page 12)

Arden, and Valle Crucis and Patteson Schools and the Thompson Orphanage. The Committee on Constitution and Canons reported a proposed canon on a diocesan Board of the Bishop and Council. A special Committee on Provisional Revision of the Constitution and Canons was elected as an early step looking toward diocesan organization.

Delegates to the Synod of the Fourth Province to meet in Savannah were elected as follows: The Rev. Messrs. W. G. Clark, J. W. C. Johnson, H. N. Bowne, and Messrs. W. L. Balthis, Harmon Miller and W. T. Lindsay.

The Woman's Auxiliary was honored by a visit from Miss Grace Lindley, Executive Secretary, and under the presidency of Mrs. Charles I. Minor, of Asheville, held an interesting and successful meeting, taking steps for the development of the Church Service League.

EASTON

Rt. Rev. G. W. Davenport, D.D., Bishop.

The Southern Convocation met in St. Andrew's Church, Princess Anne, the Rev. Walter Archbold, D. D., rector, Monday and Tuesday, April 11 and 12. Evening Prayer was said Monday, at which service the sermon was preached by the Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop of Delaware, from Acts 9:6, powerfully illustrating the great success of the Nation-Wide Campaign.

At the business meeting Tuesday morning the officers for the ensuing year were re-elected as follows: Rev. S. A. Potter, dean; the Rev. W. D. Gould, vice-president, and the Rev. Louis L. Williams, secretary-treasurer. An essay was read by the Rev. Herbert D. Cone, of Salisbury, on "The Present Day Call of the Ministry," which was discussed by the Bishop and other clergymen present.

In the afternoon a conference on Church Finance was led by the Rev. J. F. Virgin, of St. Bartholomew's Parish, Crisfield. His address was so highly appreciated that the convocation requested the Bishop to arrange for its repetition during the Diocesan Convention next month.

This was followed by a conference, led by the Bishop of the Diocese and the dean, on Extending the Influence of the Church in the Convocation. During the discussion which followed it developed that all the vacancies in the convocation had been filled, and all in the Diocese save one.

At the evening service addresses were made on Diocesan Missions by the Rev. Louis L. Williams, of Pocomoke City, and the Rev. W. D. Gould, of Cambridge, after which an address was made by the Rev. Rubert B. Matthews on Church Conditions.

At invitation from St. Paul's, Marion, to hold the next convocation in that parish, was accepted.

The Rev. Rubert B. Matthews, formerly a Congregationalist clergyman, has been admitted a candidate for priest's orders. He has been appointed a lay reader, and will serve wherever he may be needed, under the direction of the Bishop.

The fifty-third annual convention will be held in St. Paul's, Berlin, beginning Monday afternoon, May 2, and continuing until Wednesday. Much business is on hand and a large attendance is expected.

L. L. W.

The air we breathe He breathed—the very air
That took the mold and music of His high
And God-like speech. Since then shall mortal dare
With base thought front the ever-sacred sky—
Soil with foul deed the ground whereon He laid
In holy death His pale, immortal head?

—R. W. Gilder.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Francis M. Adams has become rector of Coventry and Wicomico Parishes, Diocese of Easton, Md. For a number of years Mr. Adams was in the office of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, before taking orders some six years ago.

The Rev. C. R. Cody, of Duke, N. C., has been called to the work at Bersemer City and High Shoals, in the Diocese of Asheville. This is an important new work, being opened up around Gastonia.

The Rev. Henry D. Speakman has accepted an appointment to Laporte, Nordmont and Eaglesmere, Pa. He leaves Marietta on April 27, after which his address will be Laporte, Sullivan County, Pa.

The Rev. Alfred Lee Jones has become rector of All Hallows Parish, Snow Hill, Md. He was at one time rector of the Church in Elkton, Md.

The Rev. Sanders R. Guignard, formerly of Pleasantville, S. C., is rector of St. Stephen's and adjoining missions, Lincolnton, N. C.

The Rev. Gilbert E. Pember, rector of St. Michael's Church, Germantown, who was injured in an automobile accident March 18, is able to resume his work.

The Rev. J. Frederick Virgin has become rector at Crisfield and Marion, Md. For the last four years he has been engaged in general social service, as well as organization and financial campaign work.

JUST READY

More "FIVE-MINUTE TALKS"

By Walter R. Bowie, D.D.

SUNNY WINDOWS

Author of "The Children's Year"

AND OTHER SERMONS

Here is another volume of Dr. Bowie's talks to youngsters, all attractively suited to the child mind. The subjects are arresting themes, calculated to almost invariably catch the attention of boy or girl—while the treatment thereof is simplicity itself.

As the Record of Christian Work said: "Dr. Bowie's talks are capital—straight to the hearts of children, clever, interesting, helpful."

Cloth, $1.25 net

For Sale by

Southern Churchman Co., Richmond, Va.

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor

Richmond, Va.

The Rev. Cyril E. Bentley, for many years rector of Lincolnton, N. C., and its mission stations, has removed to Atlanta to take up campaign work under Bishop Mikell.

The Rev. Edmund N. Joyner, evangelist and former dean, has retired from charge of St. James' Parish, Lenoir, N. C., and the Rev. Basil M. Walton, formerly of Wadesboro, N. C., has become rector there.

The Rev. J. Wesley Twelves, rector of St. Thomas' Church, Bethel, Conn., has accepted a call to the Church of the Holy Apostles, Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Rev. Edwin E. Knight will work under the direction of the Rev. F. D. Lobdell, rector of St. Francis' Church, Rutherfordton, N. C. Mr. Lobdell has recently been appointed chaplain at the United States General Service Hospital near Asheville.

The Rev. Ian Robertson, curate at St. Paul's Cathedral, Cincinnati, has accepted a call to be rector of Holy Trinity Church, Hartwell, Cincinnati, and expects to take charge September 1.

Ordinations.

In the Cathedral of All Saints, Albany, N. Y., on Tuesday, April 5, the Rev. E. J. Walenta, Jr., minister in charge of the Church of the Messiah, Rensselaer, and St. Giles' Church, Castleton, N. Y., was ordained to the sacred priesthood by the Bishop of the Diocese of Albany. The candidate was presented by the Ven. R. H. Brooks. The Very Rev. A. C. Larned, dean of the cathedral, preached the sermon. The Rev. Mr. Walenta, in addition to his two charges, is secretary to the Bishop, and assists in the services in the cathedral.

Bishop Lawrence ordained the Rev. Donald B. Aldrich, one of the staff of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, Boston, to the priesthood. The Rev. Dr. Harry P. Nichols assisted. The Rev. Charles E. Jackson preached. Mr. Aldrich is a graduate of Dartmouth College, in '17, and will finish his course in the Episcopal Theological School this coming June.

Deaths.

The Rev. William Horsfall, pioneer missionary and senior presbyter of the Diocese of Oregon, died at his home in Bandon on March 31. Funeral services were conducted by Bishop Sumner.

The Best of the New Things for Springtime

In the enthusiastic seeking of "lower prices" which seems to have become so general during recent months, there is danger, we think, of overstepping the bounds of true economy and mistaking the cheap and tawdry for the low-in-price.

This is one reason why you will find a visit to this store particularly helpful at this time, in fulfilling your plans for the new season.

No unworthy goods may find a place among the stocks, and we think you may safely rely upon our taste and good judgment in selection.

And while everything here is of the same high, dependable quality that has always been characteristic at MILLER & RHOADS, prices are now materially lower.

To-day the store is gaily decked out in its spring-time dress, splendidly ready to serve your every need, whether for articles of apparel and personal adornment or for the home.

Miller & Rhoads

"The Shopping Center" Richmond, Va.

There's a Word

frequently used now-a-days that sometimes is meant and sometimes isn't.

The word is "SERVICE," and we leave it to you to determine whether we mean it.

The Union Bank of Richmond

1104 East Main Street

"The Store That Pleases"

FOR FURNITURE

JONES BROS. & CO.

INCORPORATED

1418 East Main St. :-: Richmond, Va

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS

Largest stock in the South
We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival

The Couper Marble Works

(Established 65 years)
264-268 Bank St., Norfolk, Va

The Evangelical Education Society
Of the Protestant Episcopal Church

Office: The Church House, Twelfth and Walnut Streets, Philadelphia

AIDS STUDENTS FOR THE MINISTRY AND DISTRIBUTES EVANGELICAL LITERATURE

President: WILLIAM S. HARVEY, ESQ.

Active Vice-President: The Rt. Rev. THOMAS J. GARLAND, D. D.

General Counsel HAROLD GOODWIN, Esq. Treasurer ALFRED LEE, Esq. General Secretary Rev. S. LORD GILBERSON, M. A.

FORM OF BEQUEST

I give and bequeath to "THE EVANGELICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH," incorporated by the legislature of Pennsylvania, the first Monday in November, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine, ———— dollars, or ———— real estate, to be used for the general purpose of the Society.

Johnson's Foot Soap

(On market for over fifty years)

Made of Borax, Iodine amd Bran, is a sure and safe relief for those tired, aching, tender swollen, burning that have been causing you so much pain. 25c, ALL DRUGGISTS. If unobtainable at your druggist, sent direct on receipt of price.

FEET

Thomas Gill Soap Co.

711-719 Kent Ave., Brocklyn, New York

Stevens Anti-Amebic Dentifrice

For Prevention and Treatment of PYORRHOEA OR RIGG'S DISEASE

Guaranteed to contain 3% fluid extract of Ipecac

Price, 50c per Tube, Postage Paid

Stevens Medical Mfg. Co.

e717 Knt Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health and, above all,

Provide yourself with Traveler Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank

Richmond, Virginia

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS

FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG

S. T. Beveridge & Co.

Office: 1217 East Cary Street

Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd

Richmond, Va.

HICKORY HILL DAHLIA FARM

QUALITY DAHLIA

Box 227-C, Richmond, Va

Send for a Catalogue

HOT WATER HEAT

For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars

ARCOLA SYSTEM

R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.

9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

WHEN WRITING OUR ADVERTISERS PLEASE MENTION THIS PUBLICATION

Not Merely

a counting house, but a people's bank and a useful servant in this community.

We believe that it is the duty of any company which serves the public to be a builder of good will in its community, and that its success depends upon the efficiency of its service.

3% interest on savings and dormant accounts. Interest figured on daily balances.

Irrespective of its size, we invite your account.

Richmond Trust Company

Capital and Surplus, $1,200,000

Main and 7th Streets

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President — E. B. Addison, Vice-President

B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary — J. C. Watson, Treasurer

J. M. Leake, General Agent — Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

You Can Send Your Boy or Girl to Any College in This State

At but small sacrifice to yourself through our "COLLEGE PLAN"

Ask or write for booklet

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK

Tenth and Main Sts. Richmond, Virginia

"The Bank with the Three Doors of Opportunity"

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson

Security Storage Company, Inc.

Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage

Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 843

Shave With Cuticura Soap The New Way Without Mug

O. Luetke's Art Works

Church Furnishings

IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.

Est. 1886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

Memorial and Mausoleum Windows

Grand Price Louisiana Purchase Exposition
Sent Free: Our 48-Page Book
Ecclesiastical Art in Memorial Windows

THE FLANAGAN & BIEDENWEG STUDIO
312-318 W. Illinois Street, -:- Chicago, Ill.
Established 1883

Central National Bank

Cor. 3d and Broad Sts., Richmond, Va.
Banking Hours-
Monday to Friday. ...9 A. M. to 2 P. M.
Saturday..... 9 A. M. to 2 P. M.
6 P. M. to 8 P. M.

3% Allowed on Savings Accounts

Young Men's Christian Association

Grace and Seventh Streets
Richmond, Va.

Information, Reading, Rest, Visitors Welcome

92 ROOMS FOR MEN 92

Hot and Cold Water
Shower Baths

Gymnasium, Swimming Pool, Bowling Alleys, Games, etc.
Gospel Meetings and Bible Study

For information, address
S. K. McKEE, Gen'l Sec'y
P. O. Drawer 1238

Renew your health by purifying your system with

Quick and delightful relief for biliousness, colds, constipation, headaches, and stomach, liver and blood troubles.

The genuine are sold only in 35c packages. Avoid imitations.

Service

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE
CARPETS DRAPERIES

R. L. Christian & Company

514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.

Leading Fancy Grocer

AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.

Catalogue mailed on application.

THE NEW HYMNAL

Third Edition With Music
Containing Music for the Holy Communion

The third edition of the New Hymnal with Music is announced. This edition contains the Music for the Holy Communion prepared by the Joint Commission of the General Convention.

The first two editions, although of great size, were exhausted with a rapidity probably unprecedented in hymnal production.

The official publishers of the New Hymnal are grateful for the cordial support given to the undertaking by the parishes. It is evident that the parishes agree in the reasons which persuaded the official publishers to accept the responsibility for the Hymnal from the General Convention.

These reasons were:

First: The effort to make the Episcopal Church a singing Church through the use of a musical hymnal by the congregation.

Second: The desirability of an essential element in public worship being handled by the Church without private benefit.

Single copies..... $1.20 per copy
In lots of 100 or more..... 1.05 extended payment
In lots of 100 or more..... 1.00 cash

CARRIAGE CHARGE EXTRA

THE CHURCH PENSION FUND

14 WALL STREET, - - - - NEW YORK

Southern Churchman

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., APRIL 30, 1921. No. 18.

"Give me a faithful heart,
Likeness to Thee,
That each departing day
Henceforth may see
Some work of love begun,
Some deed of kindness done,
Some wanderer sought and won,
Something for Thee."

EDUCATIONAL

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

Established A. D. 1823.

The ninety-seventh session will open on Wednesday, September 15th, 1920.

Special Students Admitted

For catalogue or other information, address the dean or Secretary.

Theological Seminary
Alexandria, Va.

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to
REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean
Petersburg, Va.

The Virginian Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-third year of this School for Boys opens September 15, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to

REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

Virginia, Chatham. Box 13.

The Chatham Episcopal Institute for Girls

Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Thorough preparation for all colleges. New buildings. Ten-acre campus. Athletics. Gymnasium. Terms moderate. Catalogue and views.

B. D. Tucker, D. D., President; Rev. C. O. Pruden, D. D., Rector; Miss Annie Marian Powell, A. B., Sweet Briar, A. M., Columbia, Prin.

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each.

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Love lies back of all creation.

Don't be good because you must, but because you should.—Selected.

Evening meditation is less important than morning preparation. "Well begun is half done."—Maltbie D. Babcock.

To what signifies wishing and hoping for better times? We may make these times better, if we bestir ourselves.—Franklin.

They are slaves most base whose thought is only for themselves and not for all the race.—Lowell.

Our faith is not a working force unless it supports the conviction that right will prevail.—Bishop Woodcock.

God is the soul's atmosphere. As we are made to live by the air we breathe, so we are made to live by appropriating God.

You cannot have too much of the yearning which we call aspiration, for, even though you do not attain your ideal, the efforts you make will bring nothing but blessing.—Marden.

The Church is the body of Christ, and it is only a living body if its members suffer with Him for the sins of the world, and in love and humility try to help others to bear their burdens.—Donald Hankey.

The Church's real progress anywhere is marked by evangelism alone. The Church's business, of course, is to build up believers, but there must be constantly new believers to build up, and these come through evangelism.—Paul Rader.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,

REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

St. Christopher's School

(Formerly the Chamberlayne School)

A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND VA.

Tenth session begins September 22, 1920 Tuition in boarding department limited to twenty-two boys—$700.

For catalogue, address

Rev. C. G. Chamberlayne, Ph. D., Headmaster

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.

A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. College preparatory. Boarding department 503 W. Franklin Street. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health; out-door life.

MISS ROSALIE H. NOLAND, Principal

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLES TOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

St. Paul's Girls' School

BALTIMORE

A church school where the usual Grammar and High School grades are taught; also classes in Domestic Science. Spacious building; grounds for athletics and outdoor life. Moderate tuition. A few scholarships. Address

MISS MARION MITCHELSON
2411 N. Charles St., Baltimore, Md.

Beautiful Monogram Stationery

Any monogram in red, blue, gold, or silver, on any of six colors of Linen Finish Paper, $2.00. Send for style sheet and information how to get a box. Free

WAG MFG. CO., 234 So. 8th St., Philadelphia, Pa.

The Divinity School of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Philadelphia.

Founded by Bishop Alonzo Potter in 1862.

Special students admitted. Privilege of attending course of special study at the University of Pennsylvania.

For information address the Rev George G. Bartlett, S. T. D., Dean, 5000 Woodland Avenue.

EDUCATIONAL

Have You Selected Your School?

Enrollments are now being made for the ensuing school year. Many institutions already have a waiting list. If you find it difficult to make a choice, the Southern Churchman will be glad to assist you. Address

Southern Churchman School Bureau
815 East Grace St.
Richmond, Va.

ST. MARY'S
AN EPISCOPAL SOUTHERN SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

Founded 1842. Four-year preparatory and two-year collegiate courses. Music, Art, Elocution, Domestic Science, Business. Gymnasium. Mild climate makes outdoor life possible the year round. 25-acre campus of old oaks. Fourteen electrically lighted, steam-heated buildings. Moderate rates. Catalog.

REV. WARREN W. WAY, RECTOR
Box 19, ST. MARY'S SCHOOL, RALEIGH, N. C.

ST. ANNE'S SCHOOL

Boarding and Day School for Girls under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. Charlottesville, Virginia. Location healthful and beautiful. General and College Preparatory Courses. Music and Art. Intermediate and Primary. Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Pres.; Rev. W. R. Mason, Rector. Third term begins April 1st. Catalogue sent on request.

(Miss) EMMA YERBY, Principal.
Charlottesville, Va.

HOBART COLLEGE For Men
William Smith College for Women

GENEVA, N. Y.

100th Year OPENS September 20, 1921

Hobart offers a la ge number of scholarships to students prepa ing for Holy Orders.

RT. REV. CHARLES H. BRENT, D. D., LL. D., CHANCELLOR

REV. MURRAY BARTLETT, D. D., PRESIDENT

For information address the President

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS
Largest stock in the South
We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival
The Couper Marble Works
(Established 65 years)
264-268 Bank St., Norfolk, Va

Nothing lovely ever dies,
But passes into other loveliness,
Star-dust, or sea-foam, flower or winged air:
If this befall our poor, unworthy flesh—
Think thee! what destiny awaits thy soul.

—Anon.

The grave is dark no more: a stream of light
Thou, rising, left behind for all Thine own;
Death's chain is broken by Thine arm of might,
And rolled away the stone.

—Bishop Baynes.

You never can have too strong a will, but the trouble is we do not give that strong will up to God, to make it a vessel in which God can and will pour His Spirit, so as to fit it to do splendid service for Himself. Does not God give us all good gifts to enjoy? But the reality of the enjoyment is in the giving back.—Rev. Andrew Murray.

Forgive! Forget! It is the nobler part,
These are the only cures for heartache ills;
These are the graces of the strongest wills;
These are the powers of the humblest heart.
Ah, spend them ere Love's moment shall set.
Forgive! Forget!

The sentinel picketed to watch the enemy does his duty by giving the alarm if the enemy approaches—not by advancing single-handed to the conflict. So the duty of the Christian, watchfully discerning the approach of temptation, is to convey the case to God; it is foolhardiness to adventure into the combat unsent and unprovided for.—Budington.

Many pens have attempted to write a Life of Christ since Canon Farrar wrote his famous volume. The difficulty with most of them is that they give so much attention to technical details they do not hold the interest of the general reader. For some time there has been need of a book that would make its appeal through its clearness and charm of treatment.

This need has now been filled by

PATERSON-SMYTH'S
NEW BOOK

A PEOPLE'S LIFE OF CHRIST

Told in a way that will be read again and again for the solid enjoyment it affords.

The Churchman says: "A book which the average man will read for the pleasure of reading it—a new and popular version for the day and generation."

ONLY $3.50 NET
THE SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO.
RICHMOND, VA.

SUMMER CAMPS

The growing popularity of camps for young people attests the benefit to mind and body of open air and well regulated exercise. Select your camp now. The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN will help you to make a choice.

CAMP NAVAJO FOR GIRLS

7-16 years. On beautiful Lake Thompson, Maine. (Via Bar Harbor exp. from New York, one night.) Rate $200 (no extras). Mid pines and birches on hill sloping down to lake. Full program of water and land sports taught by experienced councillors. Handicraft, folk and interpretative dancing. Excellent food. Physician and nurse. Catalog. Register before June 1st. CLARA HENDERSON, Dir., 1530 Linden Ave., Baltimore, Md.

CAMP TRAIL'S END For Girls

Beautifully located in the Blue Grass region of Kentucky. Splendidly equipped. All land and water sports in CHARGE of experts. Membership select and limited. Trip to world famous Mammoth Cave. Write for booklet. MISS M. D. SNYDER, 363 S. BROADWAY, LEXINGTON, KY.

CAMP JUNALUSKA,
LAKE JUNALUSKA, N. C.

The finest "all-around" camp in the South for girls, near Asheville, in the "Land of the Sky." Girls from eighteen States and two foreign countries last season. July 6 to August 31. Send for illustrated booklet. Miss Ethel J. McCoy, Virginia Intermont College, Bristol, Va.

Church Furnishings, Memorials, etc.

MOLLER PIPE ORGANS

Highest grade instruments. In use in three thous. and churches. Every organ specially designed for the church and service in which it is to be used and fully guaranteed. Specifications and estimates on request. Correspondence solicited.

M. P. MÖLLER
Hagerstown, Maryland.

CHURCH VESTMENTS
Cassocks, Surplices, Stoles
EMBROIDERIES
Silks, Cloths, Fringes
CLERICAL SUITS
Rabats, Collars, Shirts
COX SONS & VINING
2 Madison Avenue New York

CHURCH VESTMENTS
Gold, Silver and Brass
Church and Chancel Furniture
Write for Catalogue
for Episcopal Churches
W. & E. SCHMIDT CO.
108 Third Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

Help Save China's Children

A MOTHER holds in her thin, emaciated arms her starving child. For days she has watched the poor little frame waste away, she has listened to the piteous moans of the sufferer, she has heard the ever weakening voice beseeching her for food, food—WHEN SHE HAD NO FOOD, NOR COULD FIND ANY IN ALL THE LAND. And she knows that the hour is near when the moans will cease and food will no longer be needed.

The mother is one of thousands in China's vast famine district. Six million men, women and children are fated to die of starvation, wracked with the unspeakable pangs of hunger, unless American Christians save them. Dogs, donkeys, grass, even the bark of trees—all have been eaten. And the pitiful part of it is that millions of children, the future hope of the land, are included among the doomed unless relief comes quickly.

In this tragic hour, China stretches forth arms of supplication to America, confident that the love of Christ, whom we have preached to her, will move our hearts to compassion.

This is the hour of Christian opportunity in China. Now is the time of all times to impress upon these people that the love of Christ is something more than a beautiful sentiment. Even a heathen nation like Japan is pouring out relief with a liberal hand, stirred as never before by the overwhelming calamity which has befallen so great a multitude. Surely we can do no less. Surely we shall do much more—and do it immediately—if we are to continue in the profession of service to Him who commanded us to feed the hungry, to shield the weak, and to carry a Living Gospel into all the world, for the salvation of all who may believe.

WHAT YOU CAN DO

1. Give dollars if you can. If you can't, give pennies.
2. Get others to do the same. Enlist rescuers of China in your church, club or office.
3. Take up penny contributions.
4. Find Americans who will adopt a Chinese to feed.
5. Buy Life Saving Stamps.

THE SOUTHERN COMMITTEE

DR. W. B. BEAUCHAMP, Nashville, Chairman.

Vice Chairmen

DR. E. Y. MULLENS, Louisville, Ky.
DR. EGBERT W. SMITH, Nashville, Tenn.
DR. CAREY E. MORGAN, Nashville, Tenn.
BISHOP W. A. GUERRY, Charleston, S. C.
BISHOP E. G. RICHARDSON, Atlanta, Ga.
DR. GEORGE R. MACK, Nashville, Tenn.
DR. W. W. ALEXANDER, Atlanta, Ga.

Members

DR. GEORGE R. STUART, Birmingham, Alabama.
DR. L. E. McNAIR, Jacksonville, Fla.
BISHOP THEODORE D. BRATTON, Jackson, Miss.
DR. GEORGE SUMMY, New Orleans, La.
JOHN J. EAGAN, Atlanta, Ga.
CHARLES M. NORFLEET, Winston-Salem, N. C.
T. S. SOUTHGATE, Norfolk, Va.

China Famine Fund

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., APRIL 30, 1921. No. 18.

PRAYER FOR UNITY.

The Continuation Committee of the Geneva Conference on Church Unity, held last summer, are asking for a wide observance of the Octave of Prayer for Unity, from the Sunday after the Ascension to Whitsunday inclusive, and Dr. Manning and Mr. Gardiner are asking our clergy and people to observe this season also as an occasion for making the World Conference movement more widely known throughout the Church of Christ. The Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity and other widespread organizations with the same object are also urging the special observance of Whitsunday as a day of prayer for the unity of God's people, suggesting a particular hour in the afternoon for union prayer meetings. It is pointed out that this has been adopted as Christian Unity Day by all the associations in all countries that are working towards this end, and they are more numerous and influential than most of us know. The heart of Christ's disciples are everywhere turning that way, with whatever of doubt and perplexity as yet. The great need is more and more being felt, throughout the Protestant world at least. And if, as one proposal after another is put forth looking toward that end, the difficulties which lie in the way become better understood and seem to grow more formidable, this is no more than might have been expected. The problem is being studied from all sides in these days, and its complexities are coming more plainly into view, to the discouragement of some and to the gratification of others who see not yet with a single eye the evils of the manifold divisions in the Church militant. But those who have thought most wisely on the subject are not discouraged. The problem must be understood in all its aspects before a solution can be reached, but with each effort to grasp it or to approach it, or even to stimulate it, progress is being made because the hearts and wills of Christian men are being drawn that way. For at last unity will come not because God's people have been argued together or organized together, but because they have been drawn together. And the constraining power must be from above and be shed abroad in all our hearts by the Holy Ghost. How fitting, then, that on the Day of Pentecost our prayers should arise to claim the promise that He shall lead us into all truth, into unity of spirit and the bonds of peace, that we all may be one.

PREPARATION FOR THE MINISTRY IN "SPECIAL CASES."

In one of the departments of this paper in last week's issue was published some account of the proposed foundation of "The W. P. DuBose Church Training School," to be a Missionary College of the Province of Sewanee, which deserved a more extended notice than our space allowed. The object of the institution is stated to be "the training of Postulants and Church Workers in Religious Education, Christian Missions and Social Service; and the preparation of men desiring to proceed to Holy Orders in the Localized Ministry, as provided in Canon 5, Section IV." It is to this provision of the Canons on Ordination that we wish here to call attention.

These canons, it will be recalled, were thoroughly revised by the last General Convention in accordance with the recommendation of a Joint Commission and the General Board of Religious Education. Among the valuable changes then introduced were those designed to make considerably less stringent the educational requirements for candidates for Holy Orders in certain special cases; as, for instance, persons who have "attained the age of thirty-two years, and have shown such proficiency in business or professional life as gives promise of usefulness in the ministry," persons "of other race and speech" who are to minister among people of their own race, and ministers of other Christian Churches who have served therein with good repute for five years and present evidence of thorough theological training, for whom, however, certain special subjects are assigned for examinations. Of even wider interest is the section of the Canon noted above, which is as follows:

Canon 5, Section IV.

"The Bishop of any Diocese or Missionary District, subject to the consent of the Standing Committee or Council of Advice, may, at his discretion, dispense a candidate desiring to be ordained deacon from all examination except in the following subjects:

(a) The Contents and Interpretation of the Books of Holy Scripture;

(b) The Doctrines of This Church;

(c) The Contents and Use of the Book of Common Prayer:

(d) Church History, a General Outline, Together With the History of This Church in the United States of America; and the History of Christian Missions.

And a deacon so ordained, who has served with good repute and success for at least two years in the diaconate, may be advanced to the priesthood without further examination, provided, that no deacon or priest so ordained shall be transferred from the Diocese or District within the United States in which he was so ordained, until and unless the Board of Examining Chaplains shall certify that he has passed the examinations prescribed in Canon 4, Section 1. However, any priest or deacon so ordained who conforms to the conditions of Canon 2, Section V, Sub-section IV, and Canon 4, Section II, may be granted letters dismissory to another Diocese or District upon the request, in writing, of the Bishop of that Diocese or District."

It is not to be supposed that the Church means by these special provisions to lower her accustomed standard of ministerial education. A reading of Canon 4, "Of the Normal Standard of Learning and Examination of Candidates for Holy Orders," will dispel that idea. The curriculum has been revised, with additional stress laid upon missions and various aspects of parochial ministrations, but the former requirements of a solid grounding in the various branches of theological study are still there, and will remain as the minimum to which, ordinarily, the candidate for ordination must attain.

But as the fullest complement of theological education cannot guarantee a man's fitness for and usefulness in the Christian ministry, so, in exceptional cases, the partial lack of such special education may be more than compensated for by qualities and attainments acquired otherwhere than in the schools. The maxim "solvitur ambulando cum Deo" of the ancient Church father still applies to the most vital problems of religion and of life, and a ripe experience, a sound judgment, a ready will and an humble, loving heart go far toward fitting any man for the best of service to his fellows, even though equipped at the outset with but the minimum training in divinity indicated in the Canon quoted above. The provision therein made is plainly designed to meet the case of a man of mature years, or one for whom, from other causes, a full theological course is impossible; but who, seeing a place that he can fill or a field in which no other is found to labor, is moved to offer his services to minister therein to the extent of his abilities and opportunity. Why should not such a call come to many, especially in the rural parishes and mission fields of the South?

Bishop Meade was ordained in a suit of homespun and returned to his little farm with no opening before him but to minister to his neighbors and their colored servants in a remote countryside. One of the most valued and useful clergymen in Virginia a generation ago took deacons orders when past middle age, with no thought but to help his aged rector more efficiently than he was doing as a lay reader. All of our older dioceses, doubtless, have the record of men who were thus drawn into the ministry of the Church by the appeal of a need presented to them, and who made the fullest proof of their ministry by natural ability and sincere consecration.

Book Notices

The Parish: Its Life, Its Organization, Its Teaching Mission, and Its Divine Contacts. A Handbook for the Clergy and Laity. By Rev. William A. R. Goodwin, D. D., St. Paul's Church, Rochester, N. Y. Introduction by Bishop Brent. Morehouse Publishing Co., Milwaukee. Pp. 149.

Dr. Goodwin has given us here a little work of considerable value, worthy of the study of the younger clergy especially. A high idealism is combined with practical plans and suggestions in a rather unusual way, and the spiritual end is never lost sight of in the consideration of means. The useful parish is conceived of as the only "live" or successful parish, one that is corporately animate and functioning throughout for ends beyond its material existence or well-being. It is first an organism, and, as such, requiring an organization for the complete fulfilment of its being, and that of the best.

The specific plan of organization presented is that of the "group system" which was so generally adopted wherever the Nation-Wide Campaign was brought to good success, enlarged in its operation to cover wider aims. It has the advantage of being adapted, with modifications, to small as well as large parishes, and even those which are widely scattered in their membership. The spirit and purpose rather than the details of organization are to be stressed. This book contains withal many hints and suggestions of an incidental nature which add largely to its value.

What Did Jesus Really Teach About Prayer. By (the Rev. Dr.) Edward Leigh Pell. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York. Pp. 203. $1.50.

Dr. Pell addresses himself to a very large class of imperfectly instructed Christians who have been taught, and have supposed the New Testament to teach, a great deal about prayer which their own experience has not corroborated. Much unbelief has been generated by the failure of prayers to receive the specific answer sought, which prayers, the author insists, were essentially pagan in their conception and in the whole thought of God on which they were based. He speaks a little strongly perhaps on the latter point and draws distinctions with a rigidity which may be discouraging, but there is no question about the grounds upon which he finds true prayer to rest in the teachings of our Lord. First, on the Fatherhood of God, "from whom every fatherhood in heaven and earth is named," perfect in wisdom, power and love; secondly, on the universal fact that the supplies for the needs of all God's creatures come through their abiding in their proper environment, that is, in harmony with His laws, or His will; which is what the Master meant to emphasize when He said, "If ye abide in Me, and My words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will and it shall be done unto you." Or, in other words, "Whatsoever ye shall ask in My name." And these two, the great underlying factors in prayer, which at last are one, will bear and repay an immense deal of devout study and meditation.

Everyday Religion. By James E. Freeman, D. D. Fleming H. Revell Co. New York. Pp. 219. $2.00.

While rector of St. Mark's Church, Minneapolis, Dr. Freeman contributed weekly a little sermon to the columns of the Tribune of that city. The present volume is made up of selections from these to the number of nearly an hundred, with an introduction by the editor. "Dr. Freeman," he says, "came into his pulpit by way of the market place, bringing with him the appreciation and the hunger of the men of the work-a-day world for elemental truth and the practical side of religion." The sermons are readable, timely, genuine in tone, free from theological bias, but confident in their presentation of Christian truth as the solvent of the problems of life.

A Wonderful Morning. An Interpretation of Easter. By James H Snowden. Macmillan Co., New York. Pp. 154. $1.75.

A few years ago Dr. Snowden wrote "A Wonderful Night," an interpretation of the Christmas story, to which this is a companion volume. The story of the resurrection is given in detail, the accounts harmonized not exactly as is usual, the "infallible proofs" strongly emphasized and the significance of the great event elaborated. The style is attractive and popular, and the press-work worthy of so excellent a piece of work.

Fundamentals of Prosperity. What They Are and Whence They Come. By Roger W. Babson. Revell, New York. Pp. 95.

The president of an organization for compiling and studying economic statistics addresses business men, from his professional viewpoint, on the things which he finds to be of highest moment in the business world—the human element with its spiritual values, and these under the inspiration and control of religious principles. The papers are short, pithy and convincing, and are worthy of the thoughtful consideration of the business world in its endless and purblind pursuit of "prosperity."

STEWARDSHIP.

The Rev. C. C. Kemp.

Will a man rob God? Yet men have been robbing Him; and that not in tithes and offerings only, but in the "principal" of His endowment, which is vastly more serious. For is it not a primary postulate of religion that all we are—all we have of natural gifts—comes from Him, and that therefore we are but stewards in respect thereof? Thus it is obviously our manifest duty to dedicate ourselves, from the beginning and throughout all our lives, to the service of God; that is to say, to the service of our fellowmen. When, therefore, men devote themselves to the acquisition of private profit in competition with their brethren, what is that but plain robbery of God, piratical preying upon the brotherhood?

Surely they know not what they do who advocate the principle of private profit-seeking in any sphere. And in view of the nature of the present crisis in human affairs throughout all the world, it would seem to be the paramount duty of the Church at this time of all times to proclaim aloud to men, and to convict them of, the mortal sin they are committing by this radical misappropriation of fundamental trust funds.

THE STRUGGLES OF FAITH

By the Rt. Rev. Boyd Vincent, S. T. D., Bishop of Southern Ohio.

There is a subject which is vital to the thought of our time, and upon which I would seek to bring a message. It is this—the struggles of faith.

Many an earnest soul today echoes those words which were spoken to Jesus: "Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief."

You remember the story. Jesus had been on the Mount of Transfiguration. In the crowd, at the foot of the mount, a distressed father brings his epileptic child to the disciples to quiet his paroxysm; and they cannot. Jesus, just come down from the mount, suddenly appears.

I. But now let us gather up a little more carefully the main points in what follows:

First, notice the father's new hope. "If thou canst do anything, have compassion on us and help us," he cries out. How quickly he turns from others to the Master Himself! Jesus' whole ministry proved that He would pity and help, if He could.

Notice next the Master's encouragement. "If thou canst?" repeats Jesus, taking the man's own words out of his very month; for the real hope lay after all in the man's own faith. So the Master continues: "If thou canst believe, all things are possible unto him that believeth."

So now notice, again, the true spirit—the real essence—of faith here, after all. "Lord, I do believe," says the father. That is: I do believe in God and goodness; I do believe in that Power within us, not ourselves, which makes for righteousness. I consent to that Power; I do try to obey it. Still I know that I have no such hold on the reality of the Divine as I ought to have. Therefore, 'Help thou—help thou—mine unbelief!" Why "thou"? Because in Thee I see God and goodness as nowhere else. Never man spake as Thou dost. No man could do the wonders Thou doest if God were not with him. Therefore give me of Thine own perfect faith in God. Complete mine! Only let me be with Thee and catch the contagion of Thy words, Thy Spirit, Thy life in God. Is it any wonder that the Master saw and respecteth and wanted to help this much sincerity in the man?

And once more. Notice just where the secret, energizing, effective power of faith lies, viz., in prayer. "Why could not we cast him out?" asked the disciples. "This kind," replied the Master, "can come out only by prayer." For remember, now, where the Master Himself had been just before—on the Mount of Transfiguration. Remember what He had been doing there. Two things. First, he had been in wireless communication again, by prayer, with the Father in heaven, glorifying His name, desiring to do His will. And the answer had come directly back to his own filial spirit: "This is My beloved Son. Hear ye Him." Is it any wonder now that we are told that even "as He prayed" Jesus "was transfigured"? And so do you not see the second thing he had been doing, too, in that act of prayer? He had been recharging all His own batteries of faith with fresh power. And again, is it any wonder that with such a personality, all freshly surcharged with such a divine power of faith, He could, by a word of command, quiet the child's paroxysm—as the disciples could not?

II. And now turn to your own case.

Your faith, too, is now only a half-faith, perhaps. It may never have been the fully formulated faith of a Christian. Or it may have been that once, and is now less than that. But let us thank God together if you still have as much real faith as that father in the story; and if you do as sincerely long for more. Let us say that you, too, do really believe in God and in goodness; that you, too, do recognize "that Power within us, not ourselves, which makes for righteousness"; that you do consent to that Power, and that you are still trying to live according to it.

But this weak and wavering faith of yours is hurt and hindered, you feel, by many things. So let us look carefully now at some of these hindrances and see whether they are as hopeless, or even as real, as you think they are.

First, perhaps, there is something wrong in your own life. It may be some besetting sin; or it may be a whole lifetime of wrong-doing. God seems as if He did not care and you almost hate Him; or He seems ready to destroy you for your sin, and you only fear Him. What are you to do? Why, simply come back again to the Master and let Him give you of His reassuring faith in God. For the God of Jesus is no such angry despot as you are thinking of: He is "our Father." This is the truth which the prodigal son saw when he "came to himself"; it is this which turned his face and his feet homeward, and we know how his father received him. We remember, too, how the Master dealt with that "woman who was a sinner"; a woman swept away perhaps by the very strength of her love for some scoundrel, who takes advantage of this and then turns her adrift, until, suddenly, she finds the Master, and seeing what He is, goes to Him in tears, just because the love of God and goodness is still in her penitent heart. "Therefore," says the Master, "her sins, which are many, are forgiven her; for she loved much." Here we see the Father's real heart again in Jesus. He, too, knew what is in man—the worst in us and the best in us. He saw, even in such souls, the lingering faith in God and goodness which can still lead back to a truer faith and a better life.

Or perhaps a difficulty for your faith is the whole problem of the presence of evil in this world at all. You do not see why God permits it; or you do not see how there can possibly be a good God in a world so bad. You hold God responsible for it all. But is this fair?

Take the fact of sin. Is it here because of God's will or in spite of that? Is it God's fault or man's fault? Isn't it the result of our own abuse of that very free-will, God's noblest gift to us—our very power to choose the right or the wrong—without which we could not have been men at all?

There are all the suffering and the sorrow in the world. But why should you think and talk of these, as if they were "sent" by God? That was the mistaken old Hebrew idea. But we know today that such things are not God's "visitations"; they are the result of man's violations, somewhere, somehow, of the very laws which God meant to give us health and happiness. And even if the Father cannot spare us such things—still do you think He does not care? Did not Jesus' whole ministry to the suffering and sorrowing prove God's pity for His children? And did He not promise a coming day when we shall never have to shed another tear?

Ah, yes! you will say, but still there is that other hateful fact of death—universal death! But remember that death, universal as it seems to be at present, is neither a dominant fact nor a final fact in the universe; it is only an intermediate fact.

What, then—your little candle-flame blown out,
And all the world in darkness for a minute?
Why, even so? The stars still shine, no doubt.
Enough to strike a match by—and God's in it.

All nature shows us this: shows life always passing on, through the death of old forms, as in the seed, to new life or fuller life in new forms. So in the world of spirit; we ourselves are to live on, even though these poor houses of clay which we call our bodies perish, for God Himself, supreme in His own universe, is only Life—from everlasting to everlasting. That is the dominant fact. No fear that He will tolerate, in His own universe, such an enemy as death forever. Even it, He says, shall at last be destroyed. "Why, then," asks St Paul, "should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?" And is not this what Jesus' whole work means, if it means anything? "Because I live," He says, "ye shall live also."

There is all the awful wrong and injustice in the world. What else is this, though, than "man's inhumanity to man"? And is it not God's own very spirit of justice which teaches us so to hate all that?

And there is war—horrible, hellish war! But Christianity never claimed the power to prevent that, but only to offer men a nobler ideal of their life together. So that here again, this is man's "failure"—not God's; no! not so long as the Spirit of His Son still teaches us Christians to protest so against war with all our souls.

But the difficulties for your faith may lie in quite a different direction.

It may be a difficulty about the Bible. Because modern criticism has made havoc of some man-made theories and old misunderstandings of the Bible, you think that the real authority of the Bible itself is destroyed. Not at all! For by just these new and truer ideas which we have gained, the Bible itself stands stronger and more authoritative today than ever as the record of God's revelation to man. Certain men-made theories of inspiration may have been discredited; but the fact of inspiration remains—proved, as the Bible itself claims, by its very power to "make wise unto salvation, through faith in Jesus Christ"; proved by the further fact of its "profitableness," for instruction in righteousness and in furnishing the man of God completely unto all good works.

Or it may be the nature-miracles, in the New Testament records, which trouble you. Miracles, you insist—in the light of modern science—are simply "impossible." But Huxley, one of the greatest of English men of science, just as flatly declared: "No miracle is impossible in itself; it is all a question of evidence." * * * "And there are more miracles in nature," he said, "than in all your Bible and your theology." "Daily and hourly," said Carlyle, "the world natural grows more of a world magical to me." But the Master Himself never offered His miracles as "signs" or proofs. They were chiefly object-lessons; meant to teach spiritual truth. How often He exclaimed to His disciples, after one of His miracles, "How is it that ye do not yet understand?" Indeed, in the last analysis, the saving power of your faith does not depend at all on your acceptance of such miracles, real as they may be and helpful as you would find them. Jesus Himself said so. "Thomas," He said, "because thou hast seen, thou hast believed. Blessed are they that have not seen and yet have believed!"

Or it may be the Church's creeds themselves which are your stumbling-block. There are some of their articles which you cannot accept or profess. But may this not be so because you have so far failed to see those great spiritual truths lying back of the declared historical facts, and which give them their very highest spiritual value?

Take the virgin-birth of our Lord: you may think that you can neither accept this as a fact, nor see any reason for it. But remember that if Jesus was indeed a distinctively divine Person—the very Son of God from heaven—remember how impossible it is that such a Divine and Eternal Personality should have been derived from a human father in time. And, on the other hand, granted that the story of the Nativity may be not prose but sacred poetry, still do you not see the imperishable truth enshrined even in such popular form? For do we not all feel and know this—namely, that "the true life incarnate in Jesus Christ and in turn imparted by Him to us, is wholly a divine life?—a life which could only have come, therefore, from a divine source and in no way from mere human nature?" Why, think what St. John could say even about ourselves—that "as many as received Him (the True Light and Life of men) to them (also), He gave the right to become children of God, even to them that believe on His Name, who were born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God!" Do you not see that it is this very same sublime truth, of pure spiritual sonship in God, which is so beautifully expressed also in the story of the unique birth of Jesus Christ? Cannot your soul rest content and even rejoice in such a spiritual interpretation here?

Take the resurrection of our Lord and our own resurrection. You cannot believe that flesh and blood, once truly dead, ever did or ever can rise to life again. But do you need to believe this? The central truth of the Resurrection, as we have already seen, is not one that concerns our bodies half so much as it does our spirits. It is the one mighty truth that Jesus still lives and that we shall still live. Yet no one ever contended so strenuously as St. Paul for the reality of our Lord's resurrection and of ours. But our resurrection body, he insisted, will be like Christ's, no longer "a natural body," but "a spiritual body"—that is, a body fitted only for spiritual uses in a world of spirit; but our body still, for the identity is in us and not in it. Notice, too, that while the Apostles' Creed speaks of "the resurrection of the body," the Nicene Creed speaks only of "the resurrection of the dead."

Or take the articles about our Lord's Ascension and his Session at the Right Hand of God. It is perfectly true that the moment you pass out into space there is no such direction as "up" or "down." It is perfectly true that God Himself has no body, and so, literally, no right hand. But do you not see that the whole transaction stands as nothing else can for the truth that our Divine Redeemer—God's own Son—having finished His work on earth, simply went back to His own place of equal authority and power with His Father in heaven—until His kingdom is fully come. Why can you not say this article, honestly, in this sense then, even if you cannot say it yet in the other literal sense?

III. And now—I hope I need hardly say how wholeheartedly I say the creed myself, and therefore that I am not encouraging any other man to say his creed in any consciously dishonest sense I am not encouraging any man in any merely critical and contemptuous spirit toward any part of Christianity. What I am trying to do is to really help those souls among you—of whom the Master Himself speaks—those men of "honest and good hearts," who are involved in intellectual difficulties in their faith and who yet long to be free from those difficulties. Even Abraham Lincoln (according to Rankin) could say: "I do not claim that all my doubts . . . have been swept away. They are not. Probably it is to be my lot to go on in a twilight, feeling and reasoning my way through life, as questioning, doubting Thomas did. But in my poor, maimed, withered way, I bear with me, as I go on, a seeking spirit of desire for faith that was with him of the olden time, who, in his need, as I in mine, exclaimed: 'Help Thou my unbelief.'"

And so I bid you keep those "honest and good hearts" of yours: they are the only hopeful soil, the Master said, for all religious growth and fruitfulness. Hold fast your faith in God and goodness—so far as it goes. Follow the truth as you see it; do the good you know. This is the one thing in you that keeps you headed straight; the one thing in you on which help can really lay hold.

Then go on praying, too: pray for more faith; for Jesus Himself said that desiring is receiving in things spiritual. Pray to that acknowledged Power within you, not yourself, which so makes for righteousness. Pray as Moses prayed, as "seeing Him who is invisible." Pray as that distressed father prayed the Master: "Lord, I believe. Help Thou mine unbelief." Pray as the apostles prayed the Master: "Lord, increase our faith." Pray as the Master Himself incessantly prayed to His unseen Father, and so found His own faith incessantly increased, until at time, to the eyes of His apostles, He was actually transfigured by it. "You do not know," asks Lyman Abbott, "that God will hear you? You do not know that you will get an answer? Well, then—try the experiment," he says. "Believe the highest in yourself. Believe that you have a voice that will pierce the clouds; believe that you, too, have an eye that can see the Eternal!"

And then go back, my friends, to Christianity's Master Himself, and let Him give you more of His own faith.

Your creedal difficulties have arisen largely, no doubt, from a previous state of mind. For instance, you are more or less influenced, perhaps, by the materialistic spirit of a good deal of modern thought. You are hampered by its assumption that there is no such thing as the spiritual and supernatural, because it has not yet found such a world by its own scientific methods. But notice that this conclusion is pure assumption; not shared, even so, by many leading men of science today. What you need, then, in this case, is to test that assumption for yourself by other methods than those of natural science. For example: Does the world's whole history show another set of forces—spiritual forces—actually influencing human life and the human race quite as profoundly as those natural forces which science does recognize? "Religious forces," said Lord Acton, "are the most active forces in history. Religion is the master-key in the study of (human) life." In other words, it is a simple question of fact—of one tremendous fact, as over against all mere theories as to possibilities or impossibilities: Has there been, or has there not been, a moment in history when the spiritual, the supernatural, did actually manifest itself among men in such an undeniable way as is claimed in the case of Jesus Christ? Surely the only way in which you can settle this question for yourself is not by a priori reasoning or theorizing about it, but by an actual study and knowledge of the Christ Himself. You must go directly to Him for your conclusion. You must really live with Him long and closely, in order to decide what the mere presence of such a Being as He in this world really means, as to the whole truth of the spiritual and supernatural. And when you get this point settled favorably—this miracle of miracles—then the rest of the so-called "miraculous" will trouble you a good deal less.

Or you may have come to your difficulties through another previous state of mind. Your faith may have been only an inherited, traditional Christian faith; one in which you were simply brought up and professed, without ever thinking very much about it. Perhaps it never has had any real foundation for you in deep personal experience and conviction. But when at last you have been forced to think about the whole matter, you have probably begun at the wrong end of things. You have tried to settle, first-hand and off-hand, those most fundamental and really final questions of our Lord's Divinity and the so-called miraculous events in His life; and you have naturally failed. For that is not the true process of conviction. That is not the process by which the Master Himself educated His first disciples, for years, into that confession of Him, at last—as the God-sent "Christ"—on which He built His Church. Rather, this is the process through which your faith needs to go: Go back to that same Christ yourself, as you still find Him there in the simple gospels. Live long and closely with that Divine Man, Jesus. Hear what He says; watch the kind of things He does; catch the Spirit that is in Him; see how entirely He lives and speaks and acts, in and for and by God; feel the truth and power of all this to lift your own soul to God; do the things He bids you do; and then decide, for yourself, whether there is not in Him "all the fulness of the Godhead dwelling bodily"—that is, in visible form.

And lastly: Go back to church; keep on going to church! For your own sake and for theirs, make common cause, so far as you can, both in worship and work, with others who also believe in God and goodness. Say your creed; half of it, if you must; all of it, if you can, even in your own sense and understanding of it. There is no dishonesty in this; provided it is done not contemptuously, but humbly; provided you are sincere in what you do believe; provided that you do really long for more light—more faith.

And go back to your Lord's table; keep on going to it! So long as you do not positively deny your Lord or positively repudiate your creed; so long as there are real gratitude and love in your heart for Him; so long as you do in some sense discern the Lord's Body there, you need never fear that He will charge you with 'hypocrisy." Be sure that He will see, and understand, and pity, and be patient with, and be ready to help, your struggling faith; so long as it is sincere so far as it goes; so long as you can honestly say, "Lord, I believe. Help Thou mine unbelief." And no right-minded pastor will be any less sympathetic and patient with you in these days.

Parochialism.

The Rev. Edward Lowe Temple.

Few dangers assail our modern Christianity with more persistent insidiousness than the malign spirit of selfish parochialism. Surely the command of our Divine Lord and Master is to "love our neighbor as ourself"—not to love ourselves better than our neighbors, nor to make haste to shut ourselves away from them behind a high and cruel barbed-wire fence of our own clannishness. In this case what was once, in some sense, a virtue has degenerated into an actual vice.

Each parish, indeed, is, or ought to be, a human brotherhood with kindred aims and aspirations; but higher than this (like our own beloved "indestructible union of indestructible States") all our parishes are knit firmly together into diocesan unity; and these units together coalesce into our great American Church, whose supreme legislative organ is our Triennial General Convention, where the three orders of Bishops, Priests and the Laity in unison frame our canons and organize our aggressive missionary work.

But a still higher thought than this should surely dominate our aspirations and endeavors. All about and around us lie other bodies of Christian people whose achievements in our common Master's service so frequently put us to utter shame. We are divinely certified that "there shall be one flock, one Shepherd," where now the present joining notes of diverse organization so painfully subdivide the Christian landscape. In our own capital city, for instance (to select a few leading organizations out of many) one need only visit, if but a single time, the Presbyterian Church of the Covenant, Calvary Baptist Church, or the Methodist Foundry Church, to meet at once a hearty handclasp of welcome and brotherhood that should cause our nerves to tingle with pleasure.

These good people of the twentieth century, whom the great apostle to the Gentiles would have styled our "brethren according to the flesh," are in no sense primarily responsible for, and a large proportion of their membership are perhaps ignorant of, the original and the unhappily inherited causes—that centuries ago, from various reasons, brought about their separation from our own historic body from which so many of them sprang. The writer was not long ago assured by one of their leading minds that there was really no greater divergence in what he deemed to be essentials between them and us than there was between different wings of churchmanship in our own body. And further, he added, with a humorous twinkle in his friendly eye, "There are High Church Presbyterians no less than High Church Episcopalians!" And, in the earnest endeavor to facilitate some loving reconcilement with our brethren at our very doors, lies a manifest duty for the Laymen's Service Association.

"Old, unhapy, far-off things,
And battles long ago"—

Unquestionably it is the function, primarily, of our own Commission on Faith and Order to seek out and further some sane method of bringing about the reunion of our now sadly divided forces, whose wanton waste of means, scattering leadership and unseemly competition furnish the heathen (both abroad and at home) so apt an occasion "to rage, and the people to imagine a vain thing." But it should be constantly borne in mind that, whatever the Lambeth Conference of the present year of grace may suggest and recommend in their supreme collective wisdom, and whatver the Anglican Episcopate may ultimately formulate as a basis for union, yet it is the combined and concentrated purpose of the laity (from whom the higher orders are necessarily recruited) that will, in the last analysis, achieve the coveted goal.

Provided only that they prayerfully seek for and grasp the great vision, and then hold their rudder true, they shall in the end, like the great mariner, Columbus, in imminent danger of mutiny, and with naught but the stars for his guide, find in the dawning their keels grate on the sands of a new world.

At the now famous Edinburgh Conference for Unity of a few years since, it was the Archbishop of Canterbury, the exalted protagonist of Anglican Christianity, who at its close uttered these pregnant words: "Should we, brethren, become finally and really united, and inscribe on our banner the word 'Missions' (the sole cause, in fact for our abiding fellowship) verily, there be some standing here who shall not taste of death before they shall see the kingdom of God come with power!" The evangelization of the world and the unity of Christendom are sure and certain pledges in the counsels of the Almighty. For, as "beyond the Alps lies Italy," so above and beyond the jarring notes of human unrest and discord shines forth, in unparalleled sublimity, the blessed vision of the face of Christ.

Young Peoples Service League

Mrs. C. S. Q.

There are many live things in Texas—but one of the livest we have seen is the Young People's Service League in action, under the immediate direction of the Rev. Gordon M. Reese.

We are hoping the plan may be a distinctive contribution to the Young People's work throughout the Church, because of its two outstanding features; first, that it keeps in line with the Church's general program, and, second, that it has a definite plan for training in Christian leadership, which is developed in summer camps and conferences.

As we survey the stream of ordinary parish life, we find a great gap between the years of fourteen and twenty, and as the Young People's Service League has slipped into this gap, connecting the activities of the children in the Church School Service League, with the work of the adults in the Church Service League, we have at last a continuous stream.

The Young People's Service League is answering the desire and longing for service in the Kingdom, which is undoubtedly hid in the heart of every normal boy and girl in the Church. The diocesan organization is, of course, representative of each parochial group, but as it is in the parish unit that we must solve our problems, we shall give a brief outline of the organization in a parish:

There is, first of all, our adult council, consisting of the rector, two men and two women. Any baptized boy or girl who promises to observe the five rules of the League is eligible for membership. These rules are as follows:

1. Rule of Prayer: To pray morning and evening for our Church and Church school, and for God's blessing on the Young People's Service League;

2. Rule of Service: To do some definite task each day for the building up of Christ's kingdom here on earth, and to try each week to lead some other boy or girl to do the same;

3. Rule of Worship: To attend the regular service of the church and church school, and to make an earnest effort each week to lead some other boy and girl to do the same;

4. Rule of Fellowship: To be friendly and courteous to others at all times, and to share with others the privilege I have received;

5. Rule of Gifts: To give to God, regularly each week, some gift which has cost me an effort.

Carrying out the idea of the Church School Service League, every unit of the League works in the five fields of service thus following the place of the Church's general program.

Meetings are usually held just preceding the Sunday evening service, and in some instances this is supplemented by a week night social meeting. Our boys and girls are developed through the League mentally, physically, socially and spiritually (Luke 2-52: "Jesus increased in wisdom and in stature, and in favor with God and man"). Each week there is sent out from the Diocesan office, by Mr. Reese, programs and suggestions for weekly meetings.

Are the young people responding? From the number of letters containing interesting reports of work done in all points of the Diocese, which come to Mr. Reese's desk, we are sure they have grasped the idea and gone ahead full speed about their work.

One of the biggest assets of the Young People's Service League is the training in Christian leadership, which is a natural outcome. On May 15 Miss Edith Parker, of Louisville, Ky., comes to assist Mr. Reese, and look after the girls' side of the work. Early in June there is to be a three-day conference in Religious Education, when one hundred picked young people will gather. A beautiful home on the bay shore near Houston has been turned over to Bishop Quin for use during the conferences. There are to be three camp sites set up in different parts of the Diocese, immediately following this training school. At each of these sites there will be conducted, first, a ten-day camp for boys, and immediately following, a similar camp for girls. The camps will, of course, be carefully supervised, and a real program of play, work and prayer will be carried out.

We see already great results from the activity of the Y. P. S. L. in Texas. In January, simultaneously with the Diocesan Council, there was held the first annual Diocesan meeting of the League. This meeting, in addition to our already organized Student Council, under the able leadership of the Rev. Harris Masterson, brings our young people in great numbers, and the older members of the Diocesan family are necessarily affected by the contagion of their energy and enthusiasm. We are thankful indeed to find the Church throughout the country answering the need of our boys and girls.

Rev. Gordon M. Reese, 1117 Texas Avenue, Houston, Tex., will be glad to exchange ideas with other people interested in this great phase of the Church's work.

The Call of Life Service.

As part of the program now being carried out in the Diocese of Virginia to present the call of Life Service to the young people of the Diocese, the following letter has been sent to every member of the graduating class of every public high school within the bounds of the Diocese of Virginia. The letter was sent by mail as a direct personal message to each one:

What Are You Going to Do With It?

It is your life we are asking about. What are you going to do with that?

You are looking forward today to your graduation from the high school, which is to come in the next few weeks, and we wish to join our congratulations with those who know and love you, that the years of faithful study at school have brought you at last to the goal which was set before you.

What Are You Going to Do After You Graduate From High School?

Through all these years of study you have been laying the foundation upon which your adult life in the world is to be built. You will go onward to the further training of college, or into business life, or else will take your place and find your sphere of usefulness in the home. But wherever you go, you must decide definitely, and give your answer one way or the other to the one fundamental question: What am I going to do with my life? Do I aim to live it for myself alone, seeking success and advancement that the world may minister to my pleasure and enjoyment; or do I desire to live such a life that the world may be a better and a happier place because I have lived in it?

We cannot but feel that any education is a supreme failure which has been unable to impress the truth that each one of us is here, not to get what he can out of life, but to give himself in a service and daily ministry of love to the world in which God has placed him. Because you have received a high school education, you are all the better equipped to render effective service to others, in your home, your community, the world.

What Are You Going to Do?

Every young man and woman, by the time of graduation from high school, should decide what his career in life is to be.

Have you decided yet what you desire to do?

This message is being sent to the graduating classes of the high schools in our State to call attention to one thing, and to ask our boys and girls to think about it. And that is the calling of life service in the Christian Church.

Every Christian Church in our country is in need of more men and women to enter the various fields of service. There are congregations of Christians everywhere which cannot secure ministers because the supply of ministers is too small for the demand. The missionary work of every church, both at home and in the foreign missionary fields, is asking for many more workers in order that the gospel of Christ may really be carried to every creature. Young men are wanted to volunteer to study for the ministry, or to prepare themselves to go as physicians, or teachers, into some part of God's great harvest field. Girls are needed to give themselves in the great sphere of women's work for Christ, to go as deaconesses, nurses, physicians, teachers, at home and abroad, to do the part that women can do best of all in bringing Christ into the home life of the world. This calling of life service is no place for the weakling, or the self-seeker. Only the best and the bravest and the truest can do the work. But wherever a young man or young woman desires to live for the betterment of human life rather than the advancement of self, wherever one would be willing to give up the prospect of worldly success and the gratification of worldly ambitions in order to find the greater joy that comes from the service of others; wherever, above all, one desires to share in the wonderful privilege of preaching Christ to a world of sinful men and women, we hope that every such an one will consider the question of devoting his life to the ordained ministry of the Christian Church, or some other form of life service.

We believe very firmly that God must call men into the ministry, and He must call both men and women to give one form of life service or another. But we think also that He calls many young men and women who do not stop to listen or to answer. We are very sure that God calls enough boys and girls in every generation to man all the places where Christ can be preached. And the fact that there is such a lack of workers today shows, it seems to us, that the boys and girls have failed to perceive that God was calling them.

Does God want you as one of the workers in His great vineyard? Will you not stop and think, and try to find out? When you say your prayers at night, ask Him to show you where He wants you to serve Him. We have no doubt at all that He will show you if He wants you to go into the ministry, or as a missionary, or into some other form of life work.

Talk with your mother and father or your pastor about it. They can probably help you to decide, and your pastor can show you the steps to take in preparing for your life work.

But whether or not your decision may finally be to give your life to some form of service in your Church, we hope and pray that all those who graduate from high school this year may become an ever-increasing influence for righteousness and purity and for God in this land of our love.—The Diocesan Board of Religious Education, Diocese of Virginia.

THE CHRISTIAN HOPE.

Christian hope is essentially but one aspect of Christian faith; no more, but certainly nothing less. It is not an inference from faith; it is not a natural or independent intuition; it is part of faith itself. It is the same mind which says, "Thou, O Lord, art my portion," and, "I am continually with Thee: Thou wilt guide me with Thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory." Our relation to God in Christ, that is to say, has a future as really as a past, a future which is no mere casual or problematical appendix to the present, but its living prolongation. Apart from this the so-called Christianity which remains will issue in a pessimism not less dark than the belief in Fate which crushed the mind of Greece and Rome, from which the gospel promised emancipation, and against which were directed some of the most spiritual intuitions of the mystery religions. A purely imminent and mundane Christianity may be constructed at any time by the manipulation of ideas: what is certain is that it can never be believed. It is the living paradox of faith that the more we are conscious of receiving from God now and here, the more passionately we crave its continuance and the more ineradicable becomes the conviction that this desire will not be put to shame. The pain of loss is real only for those who have possessed. Christian hope is set not upon a mere multiplicity of things—some of which must be relative and uncertain—but upon Him Who is Last because He is First.

. . . By its very nature religion takes account of the last and final things. It is concerned with ultimate realities, which have projected themselves into our experience in the form of unconditioned values—values which flatly decline to be made relative by the leveling operations of the understanding in science or the scientific research of history. Neither science with its ultimate categories nor history with its highest terms can give or even conceive what is wanted. Complete and lasting satisfaction is vainly sought in the social experience or in any remodeled social system we can picture. But religion is religion only as it rises into the sphere of finalities, to unite us with the Eternal in modes over which change has no power. Elsewhere we have no choice but to accept the relative; faith alone has, and, better still, has promise of, the absolute.

. . . Life in Christ, felt and known within, tends to a goal by its vital movement. Victory over sin, over sorrow and over impotence is part of the gospel of promise. The soul cannot do justice to the fellowship with God inaugurated by forgiveness—cannot respond to the challenge of His redemptive action for us and in us—except as it travels forward, in desire and presentment, to an irreversible completion. Thus faith is even more than the inspiration of hope; it is its regulator, its law. We have no right to expect what is not contained by implication in the Father's self-bestowal in Jesus that would be to desert faith for uncontrolled and uninspiring reverie; but also we have no right to expect anything less than Christ's sacrifice and triumph bid us claim. . . . Hence it is a just and illuminating thought that every system of theology should be read backward at least once, commencing with the last things, since it is in the conclusion that we find the truest index of the whole. If a man has really understood what the divine Fatherhood means, or the forgiveness of sins, or the new nature; if his faith leads him, as faith in the New Testament always does, to take utter fulness of life as the divine gift, and to build his view of redemption to the scale of Christ's infinitude—all this will come out convincingly in his conception of the Church's hope.—H. R. Mackintosh, D. D., in "Immortality and the Future."

ACCORDING TO HIS WILL.

If we pray for any earthly blessing, we must pray for it solely "if it be God's will," if it be for our highest good; but for the best things we may pray without reservation, certain that, if we ask, God will grant them. No man ever yet asked to be, as the days pass by, more and more noble and sweet and pure and heavenly-minded, no man ever yet prayed that the evil spirits of hatred and pride and passion and worldliness might be cast out of his soul, without his petition being granted, and granted to the letter.—Dean Farrar.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

WANTED: RECORDS OF SACRED MUSIC FOR JAPAN.

Mr. Editor: No doubt most of your readers have heard of the Rev. P. K. Goto, of our Shitaya mission in Japan, who has been in this country for the past year, taking post-graduate work at the General Theological Seminary.

Mr. Goto is making plans to return to his people in the very near future, and will probably leave these parts within the next three weeks. He would like to take back with him some records of sacred music and Church hymns. I have wondered whether any of your readers would have some records of this character which they would be willing to give up in order that Mr. Goto might take them back to be used on his Victrola in Japan. They should be in our hands within the next three weeks.

Any such records sent to me at the Church Missions House, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City, will be gratefully received.

JOHN W. WOOD,
Executive Secretary of the Department of Missions.

The Great Commission.

PROMISING CONDITIONS IN CHINA: IMPRESSIONS OF A RETURNING MISSIONARY.

Rev. J. M. B. Gill, D. D.

Now that I am safely back in Nanking, I want my friends to know something of the condition in which I found the work and something of its promises, and the plans which seem best fitted to fulfil those promises. You can hardly appreciate the joy it gave me to be once more in the midst of scenes and friends and helpers and work which have been upon my heart during those months of absence. It seemed so natural to be back here that my furlough time would have seemed like a dream except for the eager question I met on all sides as to things in America and what I had been able to do in the way of interesting friends at home in the future of our work in Nanking. And the friendly interest you have taken in the task means so much to us out here!

The first news I have to report is extremely distressing. Our splendid Chinese priest, Rev. Mr. Chung, is leaving on April first to take charge of St. Peter's, a self-supporting congregation of our Church in Shanghai. So well and faithfully had he led the workers and the congregation during my absence that in every department of the work is shown great progress and he has created a fine esprit de corps in the congregation. It is a great tribute to his worth that not only this whole congregation, but representatives of every Foreign Mission in the city, united in a petition to him to stay in Nanking. However, he cannot see his way to a reconsideration of his decision. He is going, and, humanly speaking, I do not see how we are to do without him, especially since there is no Chinese priest to take his place. Were it not for the fact that we realize that it is God's work as much as it is our own, we should indeed feel hopeless. It is our earnest hope that his going may react upon us who are left as a call to deeper consecration and more prayerful effort.

During my furlough the Bishop visited Nanking and confirmed a class of twenty-six. The work of evangelization has been vigorously carried on. I arrived here just as the China New Year week of preaching started. As usual, we sent out bands of Christians preaching on the streets, and going out with them and preaching in open places on the street, I found it not at all unusual to have from one to three hundred people attentively listening. Every evening the church was packed with attentive congregations, and while it is too soon yet to speak of actual results, one thing is very evident—the attitude of the masses of China toward the message of the gospel is undergoing a radical change. The strict attention they give and the numbers that come to hear bespeak a lively interest and a growing sense of the value of Christ's gospel for the individual and the nation. I would call to the serious consideration of this fact all those with whom I have spoken about the need for workers to take advantage of the present opportunity in China, and also those who may be in a position to help with their prayers and gifts, though prevented from coming in person.

The day schools, both boys' and girls', have prospered beyond our greatest hopes, and, best of all, the Christian teachers have seen to it that Christ is put first, and mere education is not allowed to become the end and aim of the schools' existence. I wish you could have seen the joy in the face of our boys' school superintendent when, in telling me of his work in the past year, he announced that in that time thirteen pupils had been admitted catechumens, twelve baptized and five confirmed. It seems a shame, with the school proving such a valuable agency in the winning of souls, the Department of Missions cannot see its way clear to give us an appropriation sufficient to pay one-third of the running expenses. The pupils themselves are so interested in the welfare of the school that last year they gave a play, and the proceeds, nearly one-third as much as we get from the Board, they gave toward the expenses of the school. One of our graduates has volunteered to teach the English lower classes in order to help out with the salary question. It is the general opinion and desire of the Chinese helpers and our congregation that we should add a middle school department so we can hold our boys longer under Christian influences. As Nanking is a very influential educational center, I think it would be very wise to make this advance, but where funds can be found to make it possible is a hard question to answer. It would not be very costly, either.

Our entire congregation seems heartily concerned about the growth of the Church and the spread of Christ's kingdom in China. It did me good when meeting some new Christian to hear him say, "I was brought to belief in Christ by such and such a member of the Church." They are also interested in outside charities—they gave over $100 for the relief of the terrible famine in North China—and are anxious to see the Church do social service work and exert an active and reforming influence upon society. You can always find interested listeners full of suggestions when you speak of such things.

We have been planning for a parish building which would give us a fine street preaching hall and public reading room on the ground floor and room to care for our social clubs and other activities upstairs. The estimated cost is gold $5,000, and friends at home have interested themselves in trying to raise this amount. On arriving here I was met with the news that a large Chinese official residence next door to our compound, that I have coveted for years, had been offered to us at approximately the amount we estimated for the building above mentioned. This is a wonderful opportunity, a Godsend. If we can make the deal it gives us more room than the new building would, and adds two pieces of vacant land to our present holdings. It seems almost too good to be true, and we are praying that some arrangement can be made by which we can get this property. It is ridiculously cheap, and if there is a clear title we should by all means buy the place.

The work that is waiting to be done is simply bewildering. In all soberness I cannot imagine greater opportunities for service than exist right here in China today. I could wish that this letter was full of interesting details; it will be easier to supply them when I have been here longer and am more able to gather up my personal contacts with our Christians.

The Government Orphanage, where we have had such opportunities for work is still open to us. They have one hundred more children just brought down from the famine area in the north. There are over 750 in the institution now; a large per cent. are Christians and the others are open to all the Christian influences we can bring to bear upon them.

I know that you rejoice with me over these open doors that are before us, and that you will pray with me that the Church may be enabled to enter in and occupy for her Lord.

By the ascension all the parts of life are brought together in the oneness of their common destination. By the Ascension Christ, in His humanity, is brought close to every one of us, and the words "in Christ," the very charter of our faith, gain a present power. By the Ascension we are encouraged to work beneath the surface of things to that which makes all things capable of consecration. We ponder these lessons of the Presence of Christ ascended about us and in us all the days to the end of the world, and the sense of our own weakness becomes perhaps more oppressive than before. Then it is that the last element in our confession as to Christ's work speaks to our hearts. He is not only present with us as ascended; He is active for us. We believe that He sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty.—Bishop Westcott.

Church Intelligence

Centennial Celebration.

The plans for the celebration of the Centennial of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society and the Semi-Centennial of the Woman's Auxiliary are taking final shape. A tentative plan was approved by the Department of Missions and reported to the Presiding Bishop and Council in February. This has been given very careful consideration by a committee of twenty-three members representing all departments of the Church's work, and this committee is expecting to make a final report to the Council on April 27.

Army and Navy Commission: Chaplain Wheat Elected Secretary.

At the regular meeting of the Army and Navy Commission of the Church held in Washington on April 13, Chaplain Clayton E. Wheat, of the United States Military Academy, was elected Secretary of the Commission. All communications should be directed to him at the Cathedral Offices, Mt. St. Alban, Washington, D. C.

Statement of Distribution, Month of March, 1921.

Payments for account of voluntary and commissioned chaplains; allowances and expenses.....		$ 664.50
Expenses of administration; salaries .....$ 50.00
Office expense..... 288.58		338.38
Total expenditures, month of March, 1921		$1,002.88

Near East Relief: Receipts and Disbursements.

$14,596,336.89 is the amount of money accounted for as receipts and disbursements during the year of 1920, according to the annual report filed with Congress by Near East Relief last week.

The total cash receipts and disbursements since the organization of the committee amount to $46,482,924.48, while the addition of flour, merchandise and items other than cash bring the total valuation of the relief administered through this organization to more than $60,000,000.

The National Office of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew has moved its new quarters in the new Church House of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, 202 South Nineteenth Street, Philadelphia. All communications to the Brotherhood for the several secretaries should be so addressed.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Colored Convocation Well Attended.

The twelfth annual meeting of the Colored Convocation of the Diocese of Virginia was held in St. Mary's Memorial Church, Berryville, the Rev. Joseph F. Mitchell, rector, April 20 and 21, with an unusually large attendance of clerical and lay delegates representing the congregations, Woman's Auxiliaries and Sunday schools in the Archdeaconry. Bishop Brown celebrated Holy Communion, and the annual sermon was preached by the Rev. Lorenza A. King, rector of Meade Memorial Church, Alexandria. Addresses of welcome were made on behalf of St. Mary's, by Mr. George W. Lightfoot; the Baptist Church by the Rev. W. L. Starre and the Methodist Church by the Rev. C. E. Lark. Reports made showed the colored work of the Diocese to be in better shape and with more promising prospects than ever before.

The principal feature of the afternoon session was the annual address of the Bishop, which was very encouraging, and will prove most helpful to the Convocation in its work along all lines in the future.

The annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Convocation was held Wednesday afternoon, presided over by Miss Louisa T. Davis, the Diocesan President. Mrs. R. T. Barton was also present, representing the Juniors. All pledges for the past year were fully paid up, and pledges for the coming year were made by every branch. Every organized congregation and mission in the Colored Archdeaconry has a branch of the Woman's Auxiliary.

The Rev. G. McL. Brydon, Archdeacon of the Colored Work, made an encouraging address on the good work being accomplished all over the Diocese by the clergy and laymen of the several colored parishes. Much interest was shown in religious education, and a committee appointed to work with the Bishop and the Archdeacon on this important subject, composed of the Rev. J. L. Taylor, the Rev. J. D. Brown, Professor John Mayne and Dr. D. A. Ferguson, all of Richmond.

Elections were as follows: Dean, the Rev. J. L. Taylor, St. Philip's Church, Richmond; Secretary, the Rev. Edward Ellis, St. Cyprian's, Richmond; Treasurer, the Rev. L. A. King, Meade Memorial, Alexandria; delegates to the Diocesan Council, the Rev. J. F. Mitchell, of Berryville, and the Rev. John H. Scott, of Essex County; lay delegates, W. J. Edwards, of Berryville, and O. G. Conn, of Trinity, Charlottesville. The Convocation will meet next at Charlottesville.

The Albemarle Convocation will hold its spring meeting May 3, 4 and 5 in Emmanuel Parish, Greenwood, Va. Every member intending to be present will kindly notify the Rev. D. C. Mayers, rector.

The Rev. W. H. Cumpston has resigned the charge of Luray Parish, Luray, and accepted charge of the work at Lundale, Logan County, Diocese of West Virginia, to take effect May 1, 1921.

NEW YORK.

Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop-Elect.

Dr. Drury, Rector-elect of Trinity Parish.

As stated in last week's issue, the Rev. Dr. Samuel Smith Drury, rector of St. Paul's School at Concord, N. H., has been elected rector of Trinity Parish, in succession to the Rev. Dr. William T. Manning. No information has been received, but it is understood he is to accept. The election was unanimous, no other name having been presented to the vestry. The Rev. Dr. Manning, who is still rector, presided at the meeting. The prompt decision, and the decision itself, give great satisfaction to Church people of New York, within and without the parish. Long vacancies have been found much to injure parishes and their work. Here is an election taking place even before the present rector has resigned.

It is unofficially known that names suggested to members of the vestry included three vicars of the parish, the Rev. Drs. W. W. Bellinger, Milo H. Gates and James P. McComas, and the Rev. Dr. George Craig Stewart, of St. Luke's, Evanston, Ill. It is significant, as showing the spirit obtaining in Trinity Parish under Dr. Manning, that the vicars of St. Agnes' and Intercession Chapels are to be the new Bishop's attending presbyters at his consecration.

If he accepts, the Rev. Dr. Drury will be the twelfth rector of Trinity Parish. He was born in Bristol, R. I., in 1878, the son of a prosperous physician. He was educated at Harvard and Berkeley, and ordered deacon by the late Bishop McVikar, of Rhode Island. While in deacon's orders he went to the Philippines, and while there was advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Brent. That was in 1908. In that same year he became rector of St. Stephen's Church, Boston, and two years later was elected vice-rector of famous St. Paul's School at Concord. In 1911 he became the head of the school.

It is stated that Dr. Manning will not resign the rectorship until a new rector is chosen and installed, and that he has promised Trinity vestry, personally as well as Bishop, to assist them in securing the right man for rector, should Dr. Drury not accept. For the first time it is now stated that the rectorship of Trinity Parish carries a salary of $15,000 a year, the same as that of the Bishop of New York. Rumors have had it for years that the salary was $25,000.

Unique Medical School at Seamen's Church Institute.

The Seamen's Church Institute, a part of the work of the Church in New York and in the country, has a medical school unlike every other. Its head is Captain Robert Huntington, and part of its instruction is given from the radio station on top of the great building in South Street. Three in four ships going to sea do not carry physicians, and until lately only a mere fraction took any adequate medical chests. The medical director of the school is Dr. W. A. Wilson, and he has found of late that on some ships not even bandages and other first aid were carried. Part of the work of the Institute has long been the training of sailors when ashore in medical care, but of late successful efforts have been made to supply ships with medical outfits and trained volunteers to use them.

At present there is a radio station on top of the Institute, but it is hoped to provide a more powerful one, and then, with the call KDKF, to prescribe for ships all over the world. No distinction is made as to nationality. Where too far for direct communication, one ship can relay to another, and so no matter where illness on ships may be, the Church is ready and able to give them medical care. It was found that on many ships, when flesh wounds occurred, oakum or waste was stuffed into them. Now, with the cooperation of the government, standard medicine chests are required on all ships, and the Institute by wireless teaches men all over the world to use their contents.

As many as sixty seamen a day are treated in the Institute clinic. The equipment is most complete and up to date.

"We try to give the same service as would be given—in St. Luke's, for instance," said Dr. Wilson.

"We are in touch with every social service agency in the city. We send seamen to every hospital in the city, and we have special beds in some hospitals that are given to seamen," said the doctor. "Besides, seamen in need of every kind of medical attention, from slight matters to very important, there are men who come in here who are suffering from the results of their war experiences—shell-shocked men. Or perhaps they are just completely discouraged. Sometimes a man only needs advice. Sometimes he needs a big steak—and when he does he is sent downstairs to get it."

C.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

At the annual meeting of the Churchmen's League at the Cosmos Club, Tuesday, April 26, an address was made by the Rev. Henry M. Medary, of Philadelphia, on the subject, "Diocesan Flags With Suggestions for a Flag for the Diocese of Washington."

Officers for the ensuing year were elected and a buffet supper served.

A special admission service for the Girls' Friendly Society was held at the Chapel of the Good Shepherd Sunday evening, April 24, at which an address was made by the Rev. G. Monroe Royce, of New York.

Mr. W. M. Danner, General Secretary of the American Mission to Lepers, will be in Washington from May 6 to May 8, under the auspices of the Washington Auxiliary. His itinerary of the churches while here will include St. John's Church, Georgetown, and the National Cathedral School for Girls.

The Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., rector of Epiphany Church, was the guest of honor at a "fellowship dinner" given by the members of his congregation on Saturday evening, April 23, at Epiphany Parish Hall. An address of greeting was delivered by the Bishop of Washington, and other speakers were Major General John A. Lejeune, W. S. M. C.; William Knowles Cooper, of the Y. M. C. A., and Colonel John Temple Graves.

Mr. Charles F. Wilson presided as toastmaster, and there were about two hundred men attending.

At the opening meeting of the National Congress of Mothers, in convention in Washington, during the week of April 25, the invocation was made by the Rt. Rev. Alfred Harding, D. D., Bishop of Washington. Addresses were made on this occasion by Philander C. Claxton, United States Commissioner of Education, the Superintendent of Public Schools in Washington, and others. The program of the week was full of interest, and included speakers of nation-wide importance on various subjects pertaining to the welfare of the children of the community and the nation.

M. M. W.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Congregational Singing.

A meeting for the discussion of congregational singing was held Wednesday night in Holy Trinity Church, under the auspices of the Church Club of Philadelphia. Professor P. C. Lutkin, dean of music at Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill., led the discussion. He is a recognized authority on hymnology and believes that congregational singing is the most important phase of church music.

Ralph Kinder was at the organ; several choirs sang, and some of the leading choirmasters and organists of the city attended. Invitations had been sent to more than 1,300 persons in the Diocese.

Among other things, Professor Lutkin says: In congregational singing neither a good voice nor a bad voice matters much. The whole thing is the intention back of it.

What is needed in hymn singing, he continued, is to get life into it. It should, above all else, be an expression of human feeling.

Dr. Grenfell on Labrador.

Dr. Wilfrid T. Grenfell spoke April 20 on "Labrador" at a meeting in St. Martin's in the Field Church, Chestnut Hill, in the interest of the International Grenfell Association, which is raising an endowment fund of $1,500,000 to perpetuate his work among the inhabitants of Labrador and Newfoundland.

"The Labrador doctor" described conditions in Newfoundland and Labrador, and told of the establishment of hospitals and community camps there.

"The Sunday school is the connecting link between the illiterate people and the high ideals of life in Newfoundland and Labrador," said Dr. Grenfell. "Many of the illiterate people in those countries cannot understand the Bible, but derive vast benefits from the influence of the Sunday school."

Large Class Confirmed at the Mediator.

A congregation that filled the new Chapel of the Mediator attended the confirmation services recently, when one hundred and one were confirmed, bringing the membership up to the 1,000, which has been the goal set for the time of the consecration of the chapel. Bishop Rhinelander officiated and delivered the address. This was also the sixth anniversary of the rector, the Rev. Phillips E. Osgood.

Woman's Auxiliary "Flying Squadron."

A novelty in the way of missionary work was instituted Monday, April 18, when a "flying squadron," formed of the Woman's Auxiliary, left the Church House on an evangelistic tour and visited suburban churches in Royersford, Oaks, Phoenixville and Lower Providence. The tour was the first of ten flying trips to be taken by the women to different parts of the Diocese to establish closer relations and better cooperation among the many parishes. Among those on the "flying squadron" are Mrs. J. Allison Scott, Mrs. Henry Dillard, Jr., Miss Mary H. Howland, Miss Sarah D. Lowrie, Mrs. J. Willis Martin, Mrs. Charles R. Pancoast and Mrs. George Wharton Pepper.

R. R. W.

TEXAS

Rt. Rev. G. H. Kinsolving, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Quin, D. D., Coadjutor.

Great Activity in St. Paul's Parish, Waco.

Rt. Rev. George H. Kinsolving, D. D., visited St. Paul's Parish, Waco, the Rev. W. P. Witsell, rector, on Sunday, April 17, and confirmed a class of sixty-two—thirty-nine men and women and twenty-three boys and girls from eighteen to twelve. This is by far the largest class that has ever been confirmed in St. Paul's Parish, and one of the largest classes ever confirmed in the Diocese. The Bishop also addressed the Men's Bible Class and the Women's Bible Class jointly, there being present about one hundred men and about forty women.

The Lenten and Easter services were very productive of good results, the attendance during Lent being perhaps the largest in many years, and the church being unable to accommodate those who wanted to come on Easter Day.

The Young People's Service League is developing great interest among the young people, and the various subordinate organizations among the boys and girls are full of activity. There has recently been completed a campaign for funds to put the young people's activities on a large and solid basis. One feature of the plan is to secure another rectory and turn the present rectory into a young people's club-house. Changes are also being made in the yard by putting in tennis courts, volley ball courts, etc. All of this is a part of the plan to attach and hold the young people to the church.

There has also been dedicated within the past few weeks a beautiful pendant electrical cross that hangs over the altar, given in memory of the late Mr. James B. Baker, of this parish.

KANSAS

Rt. Rev. James Wise, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishop Visits "The Heart of Kansas."

"The Heart of Kansas" is the name given to that part of the Diocese to which he administers, by the Rev. R. Y. Barber. It covers all of three counties, Allen, Neosho and Woodson, and a part of Wilson; in area it is somewhat larger than the State of Delaware, with a population of about 75,000, among which are scattered some five hundred baptized persons. Ninety per cent. of them live in the three centers where we have churches, Chanute, Iola and Yates Center, while the rest are scattered in the smaller towns and out in the rural district. The real work is to minister to these scattered people and to find and reclaim the others—"the lost Churchmen."

Recently the Bishop spent a part of four days visiting this section. The first place was Grace Parish, Chanute (where the rector lives). Sunday morning he preached, confirmed a class and celebrated Holy Communion. In the afternoon he laid the cornerstone of the new plant, which is nearly completed. The new building is of Carthage stone, with a seating capacity of two hundred and twenty-five, as against one hundred and twenty-five. The chancel has been greatly enlarged; the whole interior has been changed. It is one of the most complete little plants in the West, and when complete will cost about $20,000. When the work begins in the fall Grace Church will be in the position to offer an active and an attractive program to the youth of the city.

The Bishop was driven from Chanute to St. Timothy's Church, Iola, where he held Evening Prayer and confirmed a class. The next morning he visited the high school and spoke to five hundred young people. While there he was the guest of a home which claims to have entertained every Bishop of Kansas, and the home also has a room which has never been occupied by any save a Bishop or a minister. The hostess, Mrs. Jamison, is a foster daughter of the late Mrs. Sarah Simpson, who was confirmed by Bishop Chase in 1848 at Jacksonville, Ill. The family has the confirmation certificate with his autograph—and it is in perfect condition. Mrs. Simpson, who was ninety-two when she recently passed away, left to St. Timothy's Parish a very desirable piece of property next door to the church. The Bishop next visited Calvary Church, Yates Center, where a Healing Mission was held at 3:30 P. M., to a most interested congregation, and confirmation at 4:30. At night a dinner was given in honor of the Bishop to over one hundred persons, who were later joined by others to hear the Bishop's address on the visit to the Lambeth Conference. Tuesday morning he visited the high school and spoke to over two hundred. Generous offerings were made to his purse for the Boys' Camp.

R. Y. B.

PANAMA CANAL ZONE.

Rt. Rev. J. C. Morris, D. D., Bishop.

The Nation-Wide Campaign.

At the primary Convocation of the Missionary District of the Panama Canal Zone, held in the latter part of February, Bishop Morris, in his Convocation address, after outlining the origin of the Nation-Wide Campaign and its remarkable results in the first year, said:

"This Missionary District was not created until the latter part of 1918, when the preliminary work of the campaign was finished and the actual canvass very nearly so. Naturally, no notice came nor any literature. It was properly deemed unwise to make a start without information or the means of preparation. This year, however, the case is different. We shall want, of course, to fall in line, and I know we shall do our share, whatever the share assigned to us may be. I beg the Convocation to take such action as shall secure a strong committee to bring the Nation-Wide Campaign before all the congregations and direct the movement to a successful issue."

As a result, the Convocation adopted a resolution committing the Missionary District to the full plan of the Campaign, and appointed a Campaign Committee to take immediate steps to put the plan in operation.

MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. Chas. D. Williams, D. D., Bishop.

Women to Sit As Part of Diocesan Convention.

For the first time in the history of the Diocese of Michigan, a House of Churchwomen with certain legislative functions will sit as a part of the eighty-eighth Diocesan Convention to be held in Ann Arbor on May 11 and 12. It is expected that there will be more than two hundred women in attendance at the convention, and as many laymen from parishes throughout the eastern part of the State will probably be in attendance.

On the first night of the convention, May 11, the entire convention will join in commemorating the fifteenth anniversary of the ordination of the Rt. Rev. Charles D. Williams to the Episcopate. At this celebration, which will take the form of a testimonial dinner to be held at the Michigan Union, it is expected that several speakers of national prominence will be in attendance.

Among the important business which will come before the convention will be the report of the new Executive Council, and special reports by the Nation-Wide-Campaign Executive Committee.

Church Club to Establish Boys' Camp: Plans have been made for the establishment of an Episcopal Diocesan Boys' Camp at Lotus Lake, about eight miles north of Pontiac this summer. The property for the camp is just opposite that of the Boy Scouts, and was left to the Diocese by the late George N. Brady. The Church Club of the Diocese has charge of the development of the camp, and plans to put up a building this year which will accommodate between fifty and sixty boys, and which will be the first step toward developing the property to the extent where it can be used for clergy meetings, social conferences and so forth.

I. C. J.

NORTH CAROLINA

Rt. Rev. Jos. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop.

Dr. Glazebrook Speaks to Men of Raleigh.

Dr. Larkin W. Glazebrook, a prominent physician of Washington, D. C., came to Raleigh on Sunday, April 17, and made an address in Christ Church in the morning and the Church of the Good Shepherd at night. The addresses of Dr. Glazebrook were heard by large congregations made up chiefly of men, as his message is for men, and the Brotherhood of St. Andrew of the city had made an effort to get the men out. Dr. Glazebrook spoke most interestingly of the work of the laymen in Washington. Dr. Glazebrook himself has had no small part in this work, as he has put the men of his neighborhood in all of the churches to work. He does not confine his efforts to the Episcopal Church, but has organized a league of the churches about him, made up of men. It was an inspiration to hear this layman tell of the pleasure he found in working for Christ, and his urgent appeal to other men to get into the same sort of thing was one of the most moving addresses heard in a Raleigh church. No body of laymen could listen to Dr. Glazebrook and not be aroused to the need of putting their shoulder to the wheel, and he points out definitely what they ought to do.

C. A. A.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay, D. D., Coadjutor.

Dr. Patton Conducts Conferences for the N.-W. C.

The Rev. Dr. Robert W. Patton, campaign director, completed a series of conferences in the Diocese of South Carolina during the second week in April. The first part of the week was spent in Charleston, where he preached in four different parishes on Sunday, and in the two succeeding days held four conferences on the Church's Mission, at which practically all of the parishes in the city were represented and all of the clergy, including some from nearby towns. There was also a special meeting with the clergy for the purpose of going over the plan of work for 1921 and initiating preparation for it at once.

The two days following were spent in Columbia, S. C., where nearly all of the clergy in the northern part of the State, together with both Bishops, were present.

The preliminary work for these conferences was well handled by the Rev. L. G. Wood, Field Secretary, who for many years past has been Dr. Patton's co-worker in holding these missions for the Church's Mission.

OKLAHOMA.

Rt. Rev. T. P. Thurston, D. D., Bishop.

Memorial Service for the Rev. Vincent Colyer Griffith.

On Sunday, April 17, a service commemorating the life and ministry of the Rev. V. C. Griffith was held in St. John's Church, Norman, Okla.

Vincent Colyer Griffith was born fifty-four years ago in Brooklyn, N. Y. He was graduated from the Polytechnic Institute, and from Columbia University School of Architecture. He practiced his profession until about twelve years ago, when he came to Oklahoma.

He was ordained deacon in 1911 and priest in 1913 by Bishop Brooks, and remained in charge of St. John's Church, Norman, until September, 1920, when he resigned because of failing health.

"To those who knew him, Mr. Griffith was a rare soul, deeply spiritual, keenly intelligent and earnestly desiring to do the Master's work. He labored uncomplainingly, with meagre equipment, and small show of results. But he never worried. His great outward monument in Oklahoma is the fine new building for King Hall, at Norman."

His last days were spent in St. Luke's Hospital, New York, where he died Friday, March 11, 1921.

J. W. D.

NEW MEXICO.

Rt. Rev. F. B. Howden, D. D., Bishop.

Additions to Clerical Workers.

Three names have recently been added to the force of clerical workers: The Rev. William B. Allen has taken the work at Tucumcari, and has moved his family there. The Rev. F. A. T. Eller has gone to Carlsbad. The congregation there have recently renovated the rectory in preparation for their new pastor and his family. Also, the Rev. F. M. Johnson now takes charge of the church at Marfa, Tex., and the associated missions of the "Big Bend" region.

The Bishop has set apart eighteen days (April 21 to May 6) for addresses in St. Louis, Kansas City and elsewhere in behalf of the Nation-Wide Campaign. He is to preach the convention sermon on May 8 at Keokuk, after which he has a long list of visitations in New Mexico.

D. A. S.

MILWAUKEE.

Rt. Rev. W. W. Webb, D. D., Bishop.

What One Church Did for the China Famine Sufferers.

The people of Eau Claire were asked to reduce their Sunday dinner on April 17 to the simplest possible fare, and to give the money so saved to the China Famine Relief Fund. The rector of Christ Church, the Rev. Frank E. Wilson, sent out to each member of his congregation an appeal for these suffering people, asking that they make their dinner as plain as possible on that date and give to starving China the financial benefit. As a result the offering on Sunday morning was $155.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

THE COMING COUNTRY CHURCH.

In the past month or so a handsome new parish house has been dedicated in one of our Southern country parishes. One of the features of the dedication ceremonies, which extended over two or three days, was a mass meeting of the farmers, at which the Governor was to speak, and matters of importance and interest to more scientific agriculture and better farming were to be discussed.

Some may wonder what such discussions have to do with Church work, and why they should be a part of the dedication of a parish house, but to us it is a splendid indication that the country church is awakening to its opportunities and its responsibilities in this way.

Our Saviour said: "I came that ye might have life, and have it more abundantly." One of the ways to have life more abundantly is to produce life in greater plenteousness. When a large part of God's children are starving today, surely it is fitting that God's Church should be a place to point the way to more efficient tilling of the soil. If farmers have learned methods of producing better crops at a church building, they will certainly be more ready to divide their products with the needy in God's family at the call of that church.

It is a glorious thing to see the country church taking its proper place in the leadership of its community. It should become the centre for every sort of social activity. A library, a well-equipped kitchen for serving suppers, should all be an important and essential part of the modern church in the country.

Its organizations, too, should include a committee for visiting the sick and strangers in the neighborhood. If our churches had given these matters the attention that they deserve, we should not have seen the growth of so many lodges bearing the names of all the birds and beasts like the Owls, the Eagles, the Elks and the Moose.

These societies have only grown up to feed the natural appetite of mankind for friendly intercourse with his fellows.

All forms of wholesome recreation should be centered around the church, especially the country church. There is nothing more striking about St. John's gospel than the fact that the second chapter opens with the words, "And the third day there was a marriage in Cana of Galilee, and the mother of Jesus was there. And Jesus was called and His disciples to the marriage." The interesting thing is that this marriage feast was the first public occasion to which our Saviour went accompanied by His disciples, and He went there immediately after His own baptism and this selection, serves to show to the world that He had not chosen them to lead a life of seclusion set apart from the innocent pleasures of life. On the contrary, He exerted His divine power to add to the hospitality of the occasion.

THE GROUP SYSTEM.

During the Nation-Wide Campaign most of our parishes organized prayer circles, composed of from twenty-five to fifty persons, in the same locality for holding the cottage prayer meetings.

One city parish that we know of has been wise enough to make this arrangement permanent and to utilize it for greater efficiency in parish administration.

The original prayer leader has become the group leader, or captain, and tries to keep in touch with all the families in the group which he or she presides over. The purpose now is not to conduct prayer meetings, but to keep the rector informed of the condition of the congregation. In a large church this means a great deal, for so often there is a new baby to be baptized or some family has moved from one part of the city to another, or a new family has moved to the town or city, or some one has lost a relative who was not a member of his or her own church.

All these are matters of the inner life of people which the most attentive clergyman could not know, but which one living in the locality would naturally hear about.

By meeting once each month with his group captains, the rector can keep himself so well informed about his flock that he will not lose any time calling at out-of-date addresses, and can often make an opportune call in time of distress or trouble of which he would not otherwise have known at all.

Of course, this plan requires co-operation of the congregation itself, but that forms one of its advantages because it builds the members of the church into a closer union, and offers to many a field for service and an opportunity for doing something for the church which is just the thing that many people need to awaken their sympathy and interest in the church.

Such a parish organization, too, tends to make the church more of a "going concern," so that if they should lose their rector they would hold together and keep up their interest through a period of change that would be impossible without some such method.

If this plan were carefully carried out in large parishes it could almost double the efficiency of the rector's visits by enabling him to go always where he was most needed.

THE RURAL RECTORY.

The writer has recently had the pleasure of spending a Sunday in a country parish. The rectory in which he was entertained had a hot water furnace, and was equipped with an air compression water system, the water being pumped from a spring on the church property.

It is good to find such comfort and convenience in the rural rectory, and it should be so in every parish of this character. The work in the country is necessarily more arduous than that in the city, and the salary is usually lower, the parson therefore is entitled to as much ease when he is at home as possible. These household helps are not so important, however, to the rector as to his wife, and here again she is entitled to every possible advantage to offset the isolation of a country home.

There is another reason also why it is important properly to equip our out-of-town rectories with modern conveniences, and that is that by so doing we can render a real service to the country at large. There is a serious drift from the farm to the city in these days, and it is largely due to the fact that people think that they can live with so much more comfort in a town than it is possible to do in the country.

It is a good thing to have the church demonstrate the fact that a country home can be made just as comfortable and attractive as the city house.

In agitating for these improvements in his rectory, the country parson need not feel that he is acting from a purely serfish motive, but that he is rendering a real service both to his church and to his country in making the rectory a model of what is attainable in every country home.

It would be well, too, for our vestries in the rural parishes to take note of the fact that they can never expect to keep a rector unless they give him the right kind of a house to live in.

The work in the country is just as important as that in the cities, and it deserves the attention of just such a type of clergyman to carry it forward, and it should be made attractive in every way possible, so that the country clergyman will feel that his services are appreciated by the interest that his parishioners take in his residence.

Family Department

APRIL.

1. Friday.
3. First Sunday after Easter.
10. Second Sunday after Easter.
17. Third Sunday after Easter.
24. Fourth Sunday after Easter.
25. Monday. S. Mark.
30. Saturday.

Collect for Fifth Sunday After Easter.

(May 1.)

O Lord, from Whom all good things do come; grant to us, Thy humble servants, that by Thy holy inspiration we may think those things that are good, and by Thy merciful guiding may perform the same; through our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

Collect for St. Philip and St. James' Day.

(May 1.)

O Almighty God, Whom truly to know is everlasting life; Grant us perfectly to know Thy Son Jesus Christ to be the way, the truth, and the life; that, following the steps of Thy holy apostles, Saint Philip and Saint James, we may steadfastly walk in the way that leadeth to eternal life; through the same Thy Son Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collect for the Ascension Day.

Grant, we beseech Thee, Almighty God, that like as we do believe Thy only begotten Son our Lord Jesus Christ to have ascended into the heavens; so we may also in heart and mind thither ascend, and with Him continually dwell, Who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end. Amen.

The New Prayer.

We pray no more, made lowly wise,
For miracle and sign;
Anoint our eyes to all within
The common, the divine.

And nobler yet shall duty grow,
And more shall worship be,
When Thou art found in all our life,
And all our life in Thee.

—Frederick L. Hosmer.

With the Gunners.

The auctioneer glanced at his book. "Number 29," he said, "black mare, aged, blind in near eye, otherwise sound."

The cold rain and the biting north-east wind did not add to the appearance of Number 29, as she stood, dejected, listless with head drooping, in the center of the farmers and horse dealers who were attending the sale of cast army horses. She looked as though she realized that her day had waned, and that the bright steel work, the soft, well-greased leather, the snowy head-rope and shining curb were to be put aside for less noble trappings.

She had a curiously shaped white blaze, and I think it was that, added to the description of her blindness, which stirred my memory within me. I closed my eyes for a second and it all came back to me, the gun stuck in the mud, the men straining at the wheels, the shells bursting, the reek of high explosive, the two leaders lying dead on the road, and, above all, two gallant horses doing the work of four and pulling till you'd think their hearts would burst.

I stepped forward, and, looking closer at the mare's neck, found what I had expected, a great scar. That settled it. I approached the auctioneer and asked permission to speak to the crowd.

"Well," said he, "I'm supposed to do the talking here, you know."

" 'It won't do you any harm,' I pleaded, 'and it will give me a chance to pay off a big debt.'

"Right," he said, smiling; "carry on."

"Gentlemen," I said, "about this time a year ago I was commanding a battery in France. It was during the bad days, and we were falling back with the Hun pressing hard upon us. My guns had been firing all the morning from a sunken road, when we got orders to limber up and get back to a rear position. We hadn't had a bad time till then, a few odd shells, but nothing that was meant especially for our benefit. And then, just as we were getting away, they spotted us, and a battery opened on us good and strong. By a mixture of good luck and great effort we'd got all the guns away but one, when a shell landed just in front of the leaders and knocked them both out with their driver; at the same time the gun was jerked off the road into a muddy ditch. Almost simultaneously another shell killed one of the wheelers, and there we were with one horse left to get the gun out of the ditch and along a road that was almost as bad as the ditch itself.

"It looked hopeless, and it was on the tip of my tongue to give orders to abandon the gun, when suddenly out of the blue there appeared on the bank above us a horse, looking unconcernedly down at us.

"In those days loose horses were straying all over the country, and I took this to be one from another battery which had come to us for company.

"I turned to one of the men. 'Catch that mare, quick.'

"In a few minutes we had the harness off the dead wheeler and on the new-comer. Pull? Gentlemen, if you could have seen those two horses pull!

"We'd just got a move on the gun when another shell came and seemed to burst right on top of the strange mare. I heard a terrified squeal, and through the smoke I saw her stagger and with a mighty effort recover herself. I ran round and saw she'd been badly hit over the eye and had a great tearing gash in her neck. We never thought she could go on, but she pulled away just the same, with the blood pouring from her, till finally we got the gun out and down the road to safety.

"I got knocked out a few minutes later, and from that day to this I've often wondered what had happened to the mare that had served us so gallantly. I know now. There she stands before you. I'd know her out of a thousand by the white blaze; and if there was a doubt there's her blind eye and the scar on her neck.

"That's all, gentlemen; but I'm going to ask the man who buys her to remember her story and see that her last days are not too hard."

She fell at a good price to a splendid type of West country farmer, and the auctioneer whispered to me, "I'm glad old Carey's got her. There's not a man in the country keeps his horses better."

"Old Carey" came up to me as we were moving off. "I had a son in France," he said, "in the gunners, too; but he hadn't the luck of the old mare" —he hesitated a moment and his old eyes looked steadily into mine—"for he'll never come back. The mare'll be all right, sir," he went on as he walked off, "easy work and full rations. I reckon she's earned them."—London Punch.

"Tomorrow and Tomorrow and Tomorrow."

"I would do great things in the world," he said,
"Such fancies run in my head alway:
But today it is spring and the sky o'erhead
Is cloudless blue and the soft winds play.
Then today let me idle, for work will stay,
But the sweet springtime will so soon be fled."

"I will do good deeds for the world," he said,
"When the winter comes with its sleet and snow.
Then the sick must be cheered and the poor be fed
And the naked be clothed when the cold winds blow;
But today, when the summer is all aglow
I will bask in the warmth of the sun instead."

"I will do great deeds in the world," he said,
"When the balmy days of the springtime come,
But today, when the sky is a roof of lead,
And the thick snow falls and the birds are dumb,
The very heart in my breast is numb."
And he stirred the fire to a glowing red.

So the seasons pass and the years are sped,
And the deeds we dream of are left undone,
The sick uncheered and the poor unfed,
The work unfinished that was begun.
And we die at last with the prize unwon,
And the Riddle of Life—which is plain—unread.

—Gus Gordon.

The Eager Foreign Mothers.

"I know no English—only my man and childer." One of the most tragic aspects of life among our newly arriving Americans is that mother gets left behind. Father picks up English by going to work. The children at school enter a new world. Soon a big gulf separates them from the mother at home, "who don't know nothin'." At the International Institutes, centers of Y. W. C. A. work for the foreign-born, special classes are held for her. "Her eagerness to learn is pathetic," says one of the workers. "One Hungarian woman gets up at 4:30 to study her lessons. Another does her spelling lesson while washing the dishes. All display with pride their new accomplishments at home. Their sole anxiety is whether the classes are to be continued. If the home-life is to be saved, the prestige of these mothers in the eyes of their family must be restored."

Side-Tracking the Fruit Salad.

Nina smiled as she cut up the cranges and bananas and opened the can of pineapple. What a happy thought it was to make this fruit salad for young Mrs. Hastings! How pleased she would be! There was no one quite so lovely and sweet and charming as was she. At least, that was what Nina thought.

With deft fingers Nina soon had the fruit ready, and then prepared to whip the cream. She was so glad she had thought of it!

Just as she had her task completed, mother came into the room. "Dear," she said. "I wish, as you go to Mrs. Hastings', you'd stop in and ask Mrs. Prisby if she can wash a white counterpane for me tomorrow. It's right on your way."

Nina nodded. She was thinking how pretty the fruit salad looked and how pleased young Mrs. Hastings would be. "Certainly, mother," she replied a little absently.

With the covered dish in her hands she started out, a moment later, in her blue gingham morning dress with its white collar and cuffs.

It did not take her long to reach Mrs. Prisby's little gray cottage with its weather-beaten walls and sagging gate.

She went in holding the covered dish carefully.

There was no sign of life in front, and she went around to the rear door. It was open, and in the center of the kitchen, before two tubs full of clothes, stood Mrs. Prisby. Her face was beaded with perspiration, for a fire burned in the range, and the steam from the boiler made the room stifling.

Nina wondered how Mrs. Prisby could stand it.

"Good morning, Mrs. Prisby," she began. "Mother sent me over to inquire if you could wash a counterpane for her tomorrow."

Mrs. Prisby smiled. "Surely I can, Miss Nina," she replied.

Nina looked at her. "Have you a large washing today, Mrs. Prisby?" she asked gently.

Mrs. Prisby nodded. "Yes, with two extra pair of blankets; but I ought to be glad to have the strength to do my work; and I am, Miss Nina."

Nina stood there on the threshold with the dish of fruit salad in her hands. She had made it for young Mrs. Hastings, but somehow, as she looked at Mrs. Prisby, she wavered. She stood there undecided a moment—then she knew.

"Mrs. Prisby," she said finally, and with a sweet smile, "wouldn't you like this dish of fruit salad? I made it this morning."

She uncovered the dish as she spoke, and held it out in all its cool, appetizing temptingness to the little tired woman whose face was beaded with perspiration.

Mrs. Prisby stared. "Oh, Miss Nina!" she cried. "Fruit salad. Would I like it? Why, it would be the greatest treat in the world."

Nina smiled. "Then it certainly shall be yours."

Without another word she set the dish of fruit salad on the kitchen table from which Mrs. Prisby ate her scanty meals.

A moment later she was on her way home.

There was a new expression on her sweet young face as she walked along. She had made the fruit salad for young Mrs. Hastings, but she had given it to Mrs. Prisby, and somehow she could not be sorry.

An extra dish of fruit salad meant nothing very much to young Mrs. Hastings; but with Mrs. Prisby it was an event. Nina could see yet the look of joy on the thin, tired face when she had offered it.

She would have been more convinced she had done the right thing if she could have seen Mrs. Prisby, after she left her in the hot kitchen, as she toiled over the bubbling clothes, for Mrs. Prisby was singing, in a thin, cracked voice:

"Jerusalem the golden,
With milk and honey blest;
Beneath thy contemplation
Sink heart and voice opprest."

All at once she stopped. "It's a nice place here," she whispered, "especially if you're going to have fruit salad for dinner."—Selected.

The Openers of Wells.

"And so you are much discouraged, Ruth?"

"Yes, Dr. Rankin, I'm just a sort of second-hand worker. I'm not original. The only talent I have is to cheer people along; I have never done an original bit of good in my life."

Dr. Rankin smiled into the earnest young eyes. "Listen to what I have just been reading: 'And Isaac digged again the wells of water which they had digged in the days of Abraham his father; for the Philistines had stopped them after the death of Abraham.'

"In the old Hebrew days the well-digger was a benefactor, for water was scarce. Isaac was esteemed just as highly for reopening the wells that the Philistines had filled as Abraham had been for digging them in the first place. Do you catch my point "

Ruth shook her head in perplexity.

"Why, Ruth, there is no more important business in the world than just keeping open the wells which the Philistines of sin and discouragement and weakness are continually trying to fill up. And from what I hear you have quick sympathy and understanding, contagious cheerfulness and energy—the very qualities needed for keeping open the well-springs of courage. Do you see what I mean?"

"I think I am beginning to understand."

"The Suez Canal cost a hundred million dollars and nobody knows how many lives," Dr. Rankin went on. "It is worth all it cost, but it would be worthless if dredge boats were not continually at work keeping the channel free of the sands that are always drifting in and that would soon close it again. In the same way the drifting sands of temptation and weakness would soon fill up the channels of communication with God—which somebody has opened—if it were not for constant watchfulness and helpfulness on the part of persons like yourself. Do you see now?"

"Dr. Rankin," cried Ruth, "that's the best sermon you ever preached! Won't you preach it some time from the pulpit? There are so many second-hand people like myself whom it would help."

"I might," said Dr. Rankin thoughtfully. "The Openers of Wells—that would not be a bad subject."—Youth's Companion.

The Hidden Life.

There is an old and beautiful Spanish legend of a certain convent of St. Benedict, not far from the old city of Toledo, which was the retreat of a sisterhood embracing some of the noblest blood of all Spain. When the Moors overran the country, after Don Roderick and his fine chivalry were slain, they came to this convent and vowed its destruction. But just as they were making their final assault the convent disappeared. Cloisters, cells, chapels, belfry, with their inmates, sank underground. Forty years after, a lonely traveler, journeying through the forest at eventide, heard in an open space of rising ground the mysterious echoes of vesper bells and voices floating on the still evening air, as they breathed forth the praise of evensong. Nothing but a moss-grown stone pinnacle, surmounted by a cross, broke the dark glades of forest on either hand. Yet the harmonies from that buried convent thrilled his heart with wonder and awe. Such is the Christian life ever since the first Easter day, buried away out of the sight of men, stolen from the grasp of the boasting foe, "hidden in the sealed stone," yet still exerting its powerful spell over the hearts of men. It is a life hid with Christ in God. It lies beyond the grave; therefore it is safe from the defiling touch of men.—Diocese of Chicago.

A Plea for Work.

"Work!
Thank God for the might of it,
The ardor, the urge, the delight of it;
Work that springs from the heart's desire,
Setting the brain and the soul on fire—
Oh, what is so good as the heat of it,
And what is so glad as the beat of it,
And what is so kind as the stern command,
Challenging brain and heart and hand?

"Work!
Thank God for the pace of it,
For the terrible, keen, swift race of it;
Fiery steeds in full control,
Nostrils a-quiver to greet the goal.
Work, the power that drives behind,
Guiding the purposes, taming the mind,
Holding the runaway wishes back,
Reining the will to one steady track,
Speeding the energies faster, faster,
Triumphing over disaster.
Oh, what is so good as the pain of it,
And what is so great as the gain of it?
And what is so kind as the cruel goad,
Forcing us on through the rugged road?"
—Y. M. C. A. Bulletin.

A New Star.

Astronomers have discovered a new star which is arousing unusual interest. It is known as the Nova Sagitarii star, or "novae." Stars of this kind burst suddenly into flame and then fade away until they are invisible to the eye. Sometimes they can still be seen by powerful telescopes, while again they disappear entirely. During the past four hundred years twenty-four such stars have been discovered. Astronomers have many theories to account for the sudden disappearance of such stars, but they still remain a mystery. Some of them appear regularly at intervals of centuries. There have been more of them in the past thirty years, but this is explained by the fact that more powerful telescopes are in use and more astronomers are constantly on the lookout for them.—Ex.

If there is anything good in you, anything fine or promising, work will bring it out. Talents do not, as a rule, start up as the grass and wild flowers do in the spring, obeying some magic mysterious summons. They are more like the grain which must be planted, watered, kept free from weeds and watched incessantly until the time of harvest.

Earth grows into heaven, as we come to live and breathe in the atmosphere of the Incarnation. Jesus makes heaven wherever He is.—F. W. Faber.

For the Young Folks

The Twinkle-Tinkle Time.

Oh, the tinkle-tinkle-tinkle
Of the merry drops that twinkle,
All advancing, dancing, prancing,
On the shining window-pane!
With the tinkling and the twinkling
All the garden they are sprinkling!
Was there ever such entrancing,
Dancing, prancing April rain?

All the little flowers are peeping
From the beds where they were sleeping,
So beguiling is the smiling
Of the raindrops' tricksy ways;
Up they spring, all brightly, lightly,
Oh, so eager and so sprightly,
Each one shining with the smiling
Of the joyous April days!

Now a gleaming and a beaming
From the April sky is streaming!
'Tis the sun, who'll wait no long time
For the rain to make his call;
Gaily winging birds are singing,
All the air with joy is ringing!
Oh, the merry, cheery song-time,
And the joy-time of us all!
—Minnie L. Upton, in St. Nicholas.

Margie's Charm.

"What is it that makes every one love Margie Fitch so?" said Jennie Howard. "She isn't pretty nor stylish. Now what is it, do you suppose?"

"I think I know the charm. Perhaps you would better set yourself the task this week to discover it," answered her mother, busily putting the sitting-room to rights.

The next day at school Jennie followed Margie like a detective. The first thing she noticed was Margie's kindness to Alice Ross, a shy, new scholar, who stood quite alone, looking wistfully at the others at their gay sports. Margie went over and made her acquaintance, and after a little urging the girl joined the merry group, and was soon laughing with the rest.

When school was called Margie laid a rose on the teacher's desk as she passed and smiled a cheery "Good morning," and received an appreciative smile in return.

About an hour later Jennie saw the new pupil sitting with head bent forward regarding her work with a hopeless expression. Up went Margie's hand for permission to leave her seat; it was granted, as were all her requests, for the teacher knew they were never of a trifling nature. With a little help in the right place from Margie, the troublesome examples were conquered, and the girl lifted a grateful face to Margie's as she thanked her.

On their way home a troop of girls were working off their spirits in a game of tag. Margie, in whirling suddenly, came in collision with a gentleman, knocking his cane from his hand.

"Oh, I beg your pardon, sir," said Margie, covered with confusion as she returned the cane to him. "I'm afraid I have hurt you, sir," and she looked up with frank solicitude in her eyes.

"Not at all, my dear," he responded heartily, pleased by her courteous manner. "Go on with your play and be happy. I am proud to doff my hat to so polite a young lady." Which he did with a stately bow, and passed on.

"How did you dare? I should have been too frightened to have said a thing," exclaimed one of the girls.

"So should I," chorused the others.

There was a social in the church parlors that week Jennie still hovered near Margie, learning a sweet lesson every day from her. As they sat turning the leaves of a hymn book, finding their favorite songs, a lady paused to speak to them. Margie instantly arose and stood while talking to the lady.

The two girls started for another room where the young people were preparing for games. Just then Margie espied a solitary figure sitting in the corner. This was the deacon's wife, who was deaf. After a handshake and a sentence through the ear-trumpet, people usually left her to herself. But Margie crossed the room to her, and taking the trumpet in her hand, being careful to articulate plainly, she sat and chattered half an hour away, amusing the dear old lady by repeating the pleasantries and jokes which were flying from lip to lip of those around them.

"You have been a comfort to me, my bonnie lass," said the old lady, patting the hand that held the trumpet. "Now, go and play with the rest. I thank you, my dear, for your thoughtfulness to an old woman like me." And Margie went away quite happy.

"I think I have found out Margie's charm," said Jennie to her mother the next morning. "It is because she is good to everybody."

"Yes, that is it," answered her mother. "She is thoughtful, kind, polite and obliging. I think she must carry the Golden Rule in her heart."—Advance.

For the Southern Churchman.

The First Easter.

(Lois Hedrick, Aged 13.)

Samuel was playing with his boy companions, outside of his cottage door. His father had died, leaving his mother with a little baby boy to raise, and he had been a great help to his mother as he grew up, and was now playing with his companions after his evening meal. He had heard a great deal about the man who claimed He was the Son of God, and Who had healed many. He had also seen Him as He toiled wearily along with His cross on His shoulders and the look on His face was so beautiful that Samuel asked his mother if he could go help Him with His burden. But his mother was afraid of the people's wrath, and restrained him. When he saw Simon help Him he was glad, because he loved this sorrowful looking Man, Who on Mount Calvary had died on the cross. He was not so merry as usual, and his playmates tried to make him play, but he just sat and thought, so they went off to find pleasanter company.

Samuel thought all night, and decided he would go to the garden where that sorrowful looking Man now lay in His tomb. He could not go on the Sabbath, but he went early on the morning after, and as he approached he saw the form of a woman, who was weeping, of whom he knew enough to recognize her as Mary Magdalene. He looked toward the tomb, and lo! the stone across the door was rolled away, and as he looked in the tomb was empty! He happened to glance up then and saw the Man approaching Mary Magdalene, and as she started when she saw Him, He said, "Be not afraid," and He told her to go and proclaim to His disciples that he was risen. Samuel then knew that this wonderful Man was the Son of God. When Samuel grew old and his grandchildren clustered around him, he would tell them of Christ, and that first Easter Day in the garden.

A Garden Party.

The Cabbages—their heads together—planned this summer fete:
The Parsley and the Watercress helped to decorate.

The Onions were so strong that they could carry things around;
The Brussels sprouts laid carpets on rough places on the ground.

The Pumpkins' jack-o'-lanterns lighted up
the scene with ease;
The first guests to arrive were Lettuce,
Radishes and Peas.

The Tomato shunned the Beet—she said,
"Her red just spoils my gown!"
The Potato's brand-new eyeglasses were always tumbling down!

At little vege-tables tea was poured for every guest;
And fair young Peas ran round with cups, fulfilling each request.

The Celery and Lettuce served a most delicious salad;
The Corn, though somewhat husky, sang a plaintive little ballad.

(Her ancestors, you know, were colonels all along the line);
Professor Bean's string orchestra, accompanying, was so fine

That the Turnips, Beets and Carrots seemed just rooted to the spot;
And the Muskmelon for once her melancholy mood forgot.

But all things end, so when the Moon arose in heaven's blue dome,
The Pumpkins blew their lanterns out,
and every one went home.
—Exchange.

How Animals Sleep.

Elephants sleep standing up. When in a herd, a certain number will always stand watch while the others sleep, for the big, powerful beasts are timid and cautious at night and will not go to sleep unguarded.

Bats sleep head downward, hanging by their hind claws.

Birds, with few exceptions, sleep with their heads turned tailward over the back and the beak thrust beneath the wing.

Storks, gulls and other long-legged birds sleep standing on one leg.

Ducks sleep on open water. To avoid drifting ashore, they keep paddling with one foot, thus making them move in a circle.

Foxes and wolves sleep curled up, their noses and the soles of their feet close together and blanketed by their bushy tails.

Lions, tigers and other cat animals stretch themselves out flat upon the side. Their muscles twitch and throb, indicating that they are light and restless sleepers.

Owls, in addition to their eyelids, have screens that they draw sideways across their eyes to shut out the light, for they sleep in the daytime.—Selected.

Flying.

You do not need an airplane
To skim above the world:
A tall tree and a strong bough,
And a long rope curled—
And whisk, your toes are near the clouds,
Your skirts are in the sky!
You do not have to be a bird
To fly, fly, fly. —Selected.

Little Yellow Bill.

He didn't know why he did it, but he kept jerking his head back, and with each jerk the upper part of his bill would strike something hard. After keeping this up for about a half a day, all of a sudden a little crack appeared, and the light streamed through just as it does through a key-hole. While he was wondering what it all could mean, the crack got wider, and his head pushed out and buried itself in soft, warm feathers above. When his eyes got used to the light he looked around and saw a whole lot of little yellow, fuzzy creatures, about a dozen of them; some were standing up, some were sitting down, and some were trying to shake off pieces of white shelly stuff that seemed to cling to their persons. Giving his shoulders an upward hunch, and at the same time kicking out with his feet, the shell cracked in two, and there he stood, a little wild duck, very young, but very beautiful. The mother seemed real proud of the little yellow things, and she would put down her head and say "howdy-do," in low, duck language, as she cleared up the nest of the broken shells and flew away with them, so that no one would ever suspect that there was a duck's nest anywhere about.

All of his little brothers and sisters were just exactly alike; their bills were flat, and the color of gold; and each one wore the cutest fuzzy-wuzzy jersey, that fitted just like skin, over their heads, necks and bodies clear down to their short, bare legs. All of them had black hat-pin eyes, and feet thin like postage stamps.

That afternoon their mother took them all down to the water, and she waded out and out, and when it got too deep for wading she just sat down and floated about like a chip. It was very wonderful, and they all ran out in the water to see how she did it, and before they knew what was happening, the water got too deep for their ducky legs, and there they were, floating like so many chips, too. It was the greatest fun they had ever known; just to sit on the soft, wet water, kick their feet out behind and feel themselves going wherever they wished. It was so much easier than walking, and one kick would send them a lot farther than ever so much walking. And then the water was so much softer to their feet than the hard, dry sand. While they were thinking how happy they were, and wondering what new joys lay ahead of them, a curious thing happened to their mother; she soused her head and neck under, gave two or three kicks right up towards the big yellow sun—and, she wasn't there any more! They wondered what could have become of her; and each little duck began to feel lonesome and afraid, and a lump got in their throats that would not go down. Just when they thought she had left them for good, she popped up right before their eyes, and there was not a drop of water on her beautiful dress. So our little duck thought he would try sticking his head under, and kicking up at the sun, and see what would happen. To his surprise, he went down and down, and saw many wonderful things that he had never dreamed of before. He passed some little fishes that were bright and shiny, just like the new shiny dimes; and some wore white, wavy whiskers, and hat-pins sticking up on their backs; and some seemed to be nearly all eyes and mouth, and he thought maybe he had better go back where his mother was; so as he looked up where the light came from he felt himself rising, and before he knew it he was floating on the surface, in the midst of his folks. When they got tired of swimming their mother would come out on the bank, stand up very straight, flap her wings a while, and then waddle away through a path in the rushes that led to an open place, where there was plenty of sunshine, and just dozens and dozens of little fat, green grasshoppers that were so young they could hardly jump at all. After eating all their little round stomachs would hold, they told themselves they never, as long as they lived, wanted anything more to eat. Their first day had been about a week long, and stuffed chuck full of surprises and delights, so now they began to grow tired, and their wings drooped down, and their feet dragged as they walked.

The sun had turned red now, and was slowly sinking behind the canebrakes; long, dark shadows crept farther and farther across the marsh; big white birds with long legs dangling behind flapped lazily towards their roosting place in the cypress swamp; a long line of buzzards made ink spots across the sky as they sailed steadily to their boarding house in the dead trees down the river. The marsh folks were going to bed. So the mother duck got in front, the thirteen children in single file behind, and waddled off to the home nest under the log. So with many soft, peeping good nights, they cuddled down under their mother's breast, and were soon dreaming of the queer, big-eyed fish they saw under the water.

The South's Best Book Store

HUNTER & CO

105 E. Broad Street
Richmond, Va.

Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen
Prompt and Reliable Service

Spring Styles

NOW READY

Have Your Old Hat Fixed Like New

Many customers use their old hats by having them made over for their children. We specialize on children's hats.

PARCEL POST DEPARTMENT AT YOUR SERVICE.

VERRA HAT WORKS

211 NORTH FIRST STREET
RANDOLPH 90

NICK BULL'S MARKET,

Richmond's Leading Dealer in

FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME

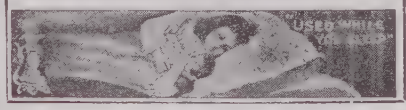
312 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.

Phone Randolph 1680

WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

WHEN WRITING OUR ADVERTISERS PLEASE MENTION THIS PUBLICATION

Vapo Cresolene



(Established 1879)

Used for more than forty years. The benefit derived from it is unquestionable.

FOR more than a generation we have been receiving grateful testimony to the virtues of this thoroughly tested and proven treatment. It stops violent coughing, and difficult breathing, assuring restful sleep because the antiseptic vapor carries healing with every breath. Booklet 48 tells why the diseases for which Cresolene is recommended yield to this simple and dependable treatment.

Vapo-Cresolene is sold by druggists

VAPO-CRESOLENE CO., 62 Cortlandt Street, New York

Jno. L. Williams & Sons

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565)

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds.

DISTANCE

Makes no difference to Berry patrons—our Mail Order Department can serve you anywhere; delivery free.

Write for our new catalogue of MEN'S and BOY'S CLOTHING.

The South's "Old Home" store with new blood and best values!

O. N. Berry Co.

ESTABLISHED 1879

Main and 11th Sts., Richmond, Va.

R. Geissler, Inc.

56 West Eighth Street, New York

Memorials

FOR THE CHURCH

Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

THE IRISH HOME RULE QUESTION.

Protestants of Ulster are opposed to "Home Rule," which is simply Roman Rule. This book is informing, awakening. Friends are contributing to send it to Congressmen, Governors and others. Are you a lover of the Bible, a Protestant? Read and circulate this book. Price 30c, 4 for $1. Order today.

PENTECOSTAL PUB. CO., Louisville, Ky.

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

FAMINE RELIEF.

For the convenience of our readers we publish the addresses of the treasurers of the various Relief Funds whose appeals for the starving, and especially for starving children, are so urgent and touching. The Southern Churchman will forward contributions to any of these, but to save time, postage and possibility of miscarriage, checks would better be sent directly to the treasurers as below:

Near East Relief (formerly "Armenian and Syrian Relief")—Cleveland H. Dodge, No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York City.

European Relief (Central and Eastern Europe)—Franklin K. Lane, 42 Broadway, New York City; or locally for Virginia, Desoto Fitzgerald, 218 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.

Chinese Famine Relief—Remit through Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer, Presiding Bishop and Council, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

Acknowledgments.

Trinity Church, Bedford, Va.....$12.00
Mrs. C. W. Tompkins, Richmond, Va. 3.00
Edmund Berkley, Chester, Va..... 1.00
Mrs. H. W. Lewis, Jackson, N. C... 10.00

PIPE ORGANS

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID in building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York

SPECIAL NOTICE.

DON'T TRY ON YOUR NEW DRESSES over your old corset. Let us help you select and fit to you the corset that does greatest justice to your figure. The Corset Shop, 317 N. Fifth St. Mrs. A. J. Pyle, Prop. Phone Ran. 3397.

Doll Skirts Accordion Pleated Free. ASHBY B. PYLE, 315 N. 5th St. Hemstitching. Pinking and Button Covering.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER

Invites you to inspect her line of GAGE Tailored HATS. Also the ADVANCE Showing of Spring Hats in the most attractive shapes.
209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

NIAGARA METAL WEATHER STRIPS

Saves 25 per cent. Fuel. Prevents Rattling Windows, keeps out Dust, Dirt and Storm.

CINCINNATI REWIRABLE METAL AND WOOD FRAME SCREENS.
L. F. HEROLD,
2 N. 11th St., Richmond, Va.
Phone Randolph 3550.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

THE DAUGHTER OF A CLERGYMAN desires board in the country with a Church family. Address information to the Rev. Roger Atkinson Walke, Pikesville, Md.

A GENTLEMAN DESIRES WHOLESOME country board and pleasant room with open fire, in well-bred Virginia family. Piedmont or mountains. Kindly send terms, location, etc., to "B. R.," care of Southern Churchman

I take this method of thanking my many clients for their past patronage, and assure them I am still selling Spirella corsets, and can be reached at the Wallerstein, Apartment 202, or by phone, Randolph 3694-W. MISS MYRTLE McDONNELL.

HELP WANTED

YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCATION AND refinement wanted to enter the St. John's Hospital Training School for Nurses (Episcopal), Brooklyn, N. Y. Applicants required to have one year of high school or its equivalent. Course three years. A registered school of high standing. Nurses receive remuneration. Many social privileges. Home life pleasant. Graduates are now receiving $6.00 per day. Apply to St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED—TO EMPLOY A CLERGYMAN as superintendent of small orphanage in North Carolina. Correspondence solicited. Address Rev. E. A. Penick, Jr., Charlotte, N, C.

WANTED—A HOUSEKEEPER FOR A church institution. Apply at office of Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

WANTED—A MOTHER'S HELPER; TWO small children. References required. Address C, care Southern Churchman.

SITUATIONS WANTED.

WANTED POSITION AS (TRAVELING) companion to a lady, by a lady of pleasing personality. For information address Rev. R. R. Phelps, 105 Pine Street, Berkley (Norfolk), Va.

A PRIMARY TEACHER OF EXPERience wishes a position during the summer months as helper in school or orphanage. Address Grace Mellichamp, Congaree, S. C.

A LADY—CHURCHWOMAN WITH BEST references—wants position as traveling companion for all, or part of summer, on very reasonable terms. Address "T," Southern Churchman.

EPISCOPAL CLERGYMAN WILL SUPply during months of July and August. Address "4," care Southern Churchman.

A YOUNG GIRL, HIGH SCHOOL GRADUate, desires a position for the summer months. Address "M.," care of Southern Churchman.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

Hawkins: Entered into rest at his home in Raleigh, N. C., April 14, DR. ALEXANDER BOYD HAWKINS, age ninety-six, son of the late Colonel John D. Hawkins and Jane Boyd Hawkins.

"Father, in Thy gracious keeping.
Leave we now, Thy servant sleeping."

Scott: At the home of her brother, Rev. F. G. Scott, Petersburg, Va., in the early morning of Tuesday, April 12, 1921, NELLY BARBOUR SCOTT, of "Clifton," Orange County, Va., in the eighty-sixth year of her age.

"Her works do follow her."

RESOLUTIONS.

On the death of Rev. Arthur L. Seiter, President of the Norfolk County School League:

Whereas, it hath pleased Almighty God, in His wise providence, to call from us our most beloved and honored president, the REV. ARTHUR L. SEITER, whose wise leadership as an organizer and as a presiding officer of our County School League, had won for him the highest esteem and admiration of the members of that organization from the various sections of the county, and

Whereas, we are constrained to give expression to our feeling of sadness and bereavement at the loss of so noble a character; therefore

Be it resolved, that in the death of the Rev. Arthur L. Seiter, of Meadowbrook, Norfolk County, Va., the league has lost a most faithful and efficient officer, the county a valued citizen, and the community at large a man of great power for the uplift and establishment of every cause that stands for the moral, spiritual and educational advancement of his fellowman.

Resolved, further, that these resolutions be spread upon our minutes; that a copy of the same be sent to the family of the deceased, and that a copy be sent to the local press and also to the Churchman for publication.

NORFOLK COUNTY SCHOOL LEAGUE,
By MRS. R. N. BARROWS, Secretary.

JAMES CARSTAPHEN PURNELL.

Entered into eternal life, April 9, 1921, at Battle Creek, Mich., in his seventy-fifth year, JAMES CARSTAPHEN PURNELL, of Winona, Miss. The funeral services were held at Immanuel (Episcopal) Church Tuesday afternoon, April 12, 1921, by the rector, George Vernon Harris, and Rt. Rev. William Mercer Green, after which the Masons conducted a most beautiful service at Oakwood Cemetery, where the body was laid to rest amid a wealth of beautiful flowers. Besides his wife, Mr. Purnell is survived by the following sons and daughters: Frank M. Purnell, Memphis, Tenn; Miss Jennie H. Purnell, James C Purnell, Jr., and Mrs. Eunice P. Cameron, all of Winona, Miss., and Rhesa H. Purnell, of Roanoke, Va.; and seventeen grandchildren; two other daughters, Mrs. T. U. Sisson and Mrs. William C. Ward, having died several years ago. Many relatives and friends from a distance came to pay a last tribute to his memory.

Mr. Purnell was born at his father's plantation home, near Duck Hill, Miss., March 17, 1847. He was educated in Salem and at Horner's School, Oxford, N. C. No doubt the early religious training and influence of these schools helped to mould his character and caused him ever to strive to do good and to help his fellowman. He entered the Confederate Army, and in May, 1865, surrendered with the Twenty-eighth Mississippi Cavalry at Gainsville, Ala. He wished to perpetuate the memory of these companions in gray, and presented to Statham-Farrel Camp a beautiful monument which was placed in the court-house yard at Winona.

Mr. Purnell was twice married. His first wife was Miss Jane Boyd Hawkins, of Carroll County, Miss. After her death, he was later married to Miss Helen Purnell, of Eupora, Miss. Mr. Purnell became a member of the Episcopal Church in 1873, and was the first junior warden of Immanuel Parish. In 1896, after the death of his father-in-law, Major Frank Hawkins, he was made senior warden, which office he held until his death. As evidence of his love and devotion to his church, he and his wife had built and presented to the congregation in 1910 a beautiful new church of brick and stone. He was treasurer of All Saints' Episcopal College in Vicksburg, Miss., for several years, and gave much of his time and energy towards building that institution. He was many times delegate to the General Episcopal Conventions. His favorite verses were the fifth and sixth verses of Proverbs 3.

"Trust in the Lord with all thine heart, and lean not unto thine own understanding.

"In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy path.'

It may indeed be truly said that this was the guiding influence throughout his life, and he never failed to quote it to those he loved, begging them to let it be to them the helpful guide which it had always been to him. He assisted many young men and girls in obtaining an education; several of whom are now prominent in business and church circles.

He was a charter member of Winona Lodge, No. 48, F. & A. M., since 1875, and filled many positions, last of which was Worshipful Master. He loved children, and when the public school became overcrowded he built and presented to the city of Winona a substantial school building to be used by the primary grades, which is now known as Purnell Hall. He was a successful business man in mercantile, planting and banking circles. As his home paper stated, "In the death of Captain Purnell, Winona loses one of its most beloved and useful citizens, the State one of its most substantial men, the nation a 100 per cent. American."

IDA LEE RUST.

There passed away in Washington on Easter Monday, at the age of eighty years, MRS. IDA LEE RUST, daughter of the late Edmund I. Lee and Henrietta Bedinger Lee, of Leeland, Shepherdstown, W. Va.

Mrs. Rust was the widow of Colonel A. T. M. Rust, and she is survived by a brother, the Rev. H. B. Lee, D. D., of Culpeper, and a sister, Mrs. Charles W. Goldborough, of Shepherdstown. Mrs. Rust was the mother of eleven living children, eight sons and three daughters.

A member of an old and distinguished family, she represented the highest type of Virginia's gentlewoman. Colonel Rust, her husband, died thirty-four years ago. He was an officer in the Regular Army, and graduated at West Point. In '61 he volunteered his services to the Confederacy.

The last twenty-five years of Mrs. Rust's life were spent in Leesburg Va. The strong impress of her splendid life was made on this community. It is indeed difficult, in fact impossible, to record the power of the life of this woman of God.

In her home her influence was supreme. The character of her sons and daughters speaks here. Desirous of the highest and best for her children, not alone by her example and precept did she seek their attainment, but by practical effort also. Of unusual intellect, she directed their studies (in a time when educational advantages were limited in the South), and laid foundations of character and efficiency upon which they have builded well.

In the community her life counted for righteousness, justice and helpfulness—always desiring to be of service to others.

In Mrs. Rust's Christian and church life she never spared herself. From early girlhood she was Christ's faithful soldier and servant. Her deep and intellectual interest in missions was an especial characteristic and life long.

Pre-eminently she put spiritual things first. Relying on the power of prayer, her Bible and her Master for daily guidance.

She knew the meaning of religion—loved and used the house of God. In quietness and confidence she found her strength. Her sympathy and splendid judgment uplifted many souls in their joys and sorrows. Her patience, her deep understanding, her keen sense of justice, but chiefly her love, affected all who knew her. Freely she gave, because she freely loved.

Among all who have been the choice vessels of God's grace and the light of the world, she will long be remembered. God, give us grace to follow the example of her steadfastness of faith and obedience to His holy commandments.

The world is poorer for her going, but richer and stronger for her life. For her—

"The strife is o'er, the battle done,
The victory of life is won,
Alleluia!"

W. H. B.

When our Lord says, "Take my yoke upon you," He invites us to become linked to His omnipotence.

It is the genius of Christianity to have transfigured sacrifice by displaying it to us as the reverse of the medal called Love.—H. R. Haweis.

JUST READY

More "FIVE-MINUTE TALKS"

By Walter R. Bowie, D.D.

SUNNY WINDOWS

Author of "The Children's Year"

AND OTHER SERMONS

Here is another volume of Dr. Bowie's talks to youngsters, all attractively suited to the child mind. The subjects are arresting themes, calculated to almost invariably catch the attention of boy or girl—while the treatment thereof is simplicity itself.

As the Record of Christian Work said: "Dr. Bowie's talks are capital—straight to the hearts of children, clever, interesting, helpful."

Cloth, $1.25 net

For Sale by

Southern Churchman Co., Richmond, Va.

Spring and Summer Suits $25 to $50

They are Suits made to hold their own against any competition. They are the best values offered for a long time. Examine their woolens, their skillful workmanship, their style, and you'll need no further encouragement for a selection.

Shoes, Hats,

Furnishings,

and Boys' Clothes.

Mail orders solicited.

Horace S. Wright Co.

Broad at First,

RICHMOND, VA.

J. & R. Lamb

25-25-27 SIXTH AVENUE NEW YORK

MEMORIALS IN STAINED GLASS
MOSAIC · MARBLE · STONE · GRANITE
CARVED WOOD · METAL · ETC.

"The Store That Pleases"

FOR FURNITURE

JONES BROS. & CO.

INCORPORATED

1418 East Main St. :-: Richmond, Va

AN UNPRECEDENTED Free Trial Offer o HYMN BOOKS f

100 COPIES OF THE NEW "KING OF SONG BOOKS"

GLAD TIDINGS IN SONG

(Just off the press)—188 pages—314 songs
Compiled by 100 leading evangelists

Will be send Free, prepaid to any Church, Sunday School, Young People's Society or other religious organization,

For One month's Free Trial

If not satisfied, you may return the books and we will pay the freight or express both ways. If satisfied, send us the money for the books.

Returnable Sample Copy Sent on Request

Cloth, 45c; prepaid, 50c. Limp, 35c; prepaid, 40c. Manila, 30c; prepaid, 35c.

ABRIDGED EDITION

96 pages—107 hymns

Manila, 15c, prepaid. 12 1-2c, not prepaid.
Limp Cloth, 20c, prepaid. 17 1-2c, not prepaid.

THE GLAD TIDINGS PUBLISHING CO

202 S. Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois.

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor

Richmond, Va.

Young Men's Christian Association

Grace and Seventh Streets
Richmond, Va.

Information, Reading, Rest, Visitors Welcome

92 ROOMS FOR MEN 92

Hot and Cold Water
Shower Baths

Gymnasium, Swimming Pool, Bowling Alleys, Games, etc.
Gospel Meetings and Bible Study

For information, address
S. K. McKEE, Gen'l Sec'y
P. O. Drawer 1238

Sacramental Wine

Absolutely Pure Grape Wine

Made expressly for use at the Communion Table

Established 1857

Phone, Write or Call
Tel. Cortlandt 3001

H.T. Dewey & Sons Co.

Address Either
138 Fulton Street, New York City
or Cellars, Egg Harbor, New Jersey

Renew your health by purifying your system with

Quick and delightful relief for biliousness, colds, constipation, headaches, and stomach, liver and blood troubles.

The genuine are sold only in 35c packages. Avoid imitations.

The Best of the New Things for Springtime

In the enthusiastic seeking of "lower prices" which seems to have become so general during recent months, there is danger, we think, of overstepping the bounds of true economy and mistaking the cheap and tawdry for the low-in-price.

This is one reason why you will find a visit to this store particularly helpful at this time, in fulfilling your plans for the new season.

No unworthy goods may find a place among the stocks, and we think you may safely rely upon our taste and good judgment in selection.

And while everything here is of the same high, dependable quality that has always been characteristic at MILLER & RHOADS, prices are now materially lower.

To-day the store is gaily decked out in its spring-time dress, splendidly ready to serve your every need, whether for articles of apparel and personal adornment or for the home.

Miller & Rhoads

"The Shopping Center" Richmond, Va.

Have You Made Your Will?

See G. Jeter Jones, Vice-President, about this now. All conferences confidential. Phone or write for appointment.

Merchants National Bank

11th and Main Streets, Richmond, Va.

"SAFEST FOR TRUSTS"

Are You Burying Your Talents?

Have you stopped to think that, if you are keeping at home any considerable sum of money you are doing yourself a great injustice? Certainly you are, because you are depriving yourself of the interest your money should earn for you.

Let us write your name on our books.

Planters National Bank

Main and 12th Streets

Resources over $20,000,000.00

HICKORY HILL DAHLIA FARM

QUALITY DAHLIA

Box 227-C, Richmond, Va

Send for a Catalogue

HOT WATER HEAT

For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc, Without Cellars

ARCOLA SYSTEM

R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.

9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

Service

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE
CARPETS DRAPERIES

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health and, above all,

Provide yourself with Traveler Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank

Richmond, Virginia

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS

FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG

S. T. Beveridge & Co

Office: 1217 East Cary Street

Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byr

Richmond, Va.

R. L. Christian & Company

514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.

Leading Fancy Grocer

AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.

Catalogue mailed on application.

Not Merely

a counting house, but a people's bank and a useful servant in this community.

We believe that it is the duty of any company which serves the public to be a builder of good will in its community, and that its success depends upon the efficiency of its service.

3% interest on savings and dormant accounts. Interest figured on daily balances.
Irrespective of its size, we invite your account.

Richmond Trust Company

Capital and Surplus, $1,200,000

Main and 7th Streets

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary
J. M. Leake, General Agent
E. B. Addison, Vice-President
J. C. Watson, Treasurer
Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

You Can Send Your Boy or Girl to Any College in This State

At but small sacrifice to yourself through our "COLLEGE PLAN"
Ask or write for booklet

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK

Tenth and Main Sts. Richmond, Virginia

"The Bank with the Three Doors of Opportunity"

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson
Security Storage Company, Inc.

Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage

Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

Keep Your Skin-Pores Active and Healthy With Cuticura Soap

Soap, Ointment, Talcum, 25c. everywhere. For samples address: Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. V, Malden, Mass.

O. Luetke's Art Works

Church Furnishings
IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.
Est. 1886. 328-332 7th Ave. New Yor

THE DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY

Founded 100 Years Ago

Has For 85 Years Been Officially Represented By

THE SPIRIT OF MISSIONS

The Seventh Oldest Magazine in the United States

The spirit of missions records, month by month, through well-illustrated and interesting articles, the work of the Church as carried on by our representatives in many parts of the world. It tells the vitally interesting story of pioneer work in the outlying districts as well as the more established missions nearer home and reports regularly the activities of the various departments of the Presiding Bishop and Council at the Church Missions House.

The Spirit of Missions is indispensable to the well-informed Churchman. No matter what other magazines you are in the habit of reading, The Spirit of Missions belongs in your home.

The following comments speak for themselves:

Fill out the attached order blank and enter your subscription to-day. Subscription price, $1.00 a year.

The following comments speak for themselves:

From a Virginia subscriber:

"I wish I could send you into every Church family in the United States. You are the most instructive magazine that I ever see."

From the president of a Woman's Auxiliary in California:

"I would not think of being deprived of the spiritual uplift and education that The Spirit of Missions brings to me each month. It is not only helpful to me, but to many others."

From a Sunday School teacher in Tennessee:

"I could not hold a Sunday School class without the information and inspiration gained from The Spirit of Missions."

A deaconess in Utah writes:

"I thoroughly enjoy each number and prize the magazine very highly. Such a breezy bird's-eye view of the entire field is a real help and incentive in one's own little task."

From a subscriber in England:

"It is by far the best magazine of its kind that I know of, and keeps me in touch with the great Church in America, which I have learned to love and admire."

"Your magazine is one of the most interesting publications in America. It is inspiring and helpful as well."

"I have no words to express my admiration for the magazine. It is the best cure for the 'blues' that ever comes my way."

"Some time ago I thought the magazine had reached its acme, but I declare each issue is better. It's a wonder how you do it."

"We have been subscribers to The Spirit of Missions for over fifty years and we would not be without it.

Fill out the attached order blank and enter your subscription today. Subscription Price, $1 a Yr.

THE LENTEN NUMBER

Reached 167,000 Homes Sign the Blank and help it reach that number every month!

THE SPIRIT OF MISSIONS,
281 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Enclosed find $1.00 for a year's subscription to THE SPIRIT OF MISSIONS, to begin with the.....number.

Name.....
(Print Name and Address)

Street.....

Town.....State.....

Subscription Rate: In U. S., $1.00 a year; Canada and Foreign, $1.25

Southern Churchman

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., MAY 7, 1921. No. 19.

"I bind myself today to God's strength to pilot me;
God's power to uphold me;
God's wisdom to guide me;
God's eye to look before me;
God's ear to hear for me;
God's word to speak for me;
God's hand to guard me;
God's path to lie before me;
God's shield to protect me;
God's host to save me."

EDUCATIONAL

SEWANEE MILITARY ACADEMY

53rd year. In an ideal spot, heart of the Cumberland mountains, 2,000 feet elevation. College preparatory; also equips for citizenship. Military instruction secures regularity, neatness, respect, promptitude. Student body are boys of character who are developed into manly men of purpose. 40-acre added domain. Vigorous outdoor life; all athletics. R. O. T. C. Episcopal. Early registration advisable. Catalog. Address The Principal, Sewanee, Tenn.

Holderness School for Boys

Five buildings. 20 acres. Prepares for Colleges and Technical Schools. Ranks with highest grade schools of New England, yet by reason of endowment the tuition is moderate. Modern gymnasium Skating. All winter sports. 41st year

Rev. Lorin Webster, L. H. D., Rector, Plymouth, N. H.

National Cathedral School

A Boarding and Day School for Girls Fireproof buildings in Cathedral Close of 40 acres. College Preparatory. Advanced and Special Courses. Music and Art.

The Bishop of Washington,
President of the Board of Trustees
Jessie C. McDonald, M. S., Principal
Mount St. Alban, Washington, D. C

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to
REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean
Petersburg, Va.

The Virginian Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-third year of this School for Boys opens September 15, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to
REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D...Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each.

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"Every word of God is both truth and duty—revelation and commandment."

If for some of us, and sometimes all of us, action cannot mean doing, then remember bearing too is action—oftenest its hardest part.—William Channing Gannelt.

Christ comes with a blessing in each hand—forgiveness in one and holiness in the other—and never gives either to any who will not take both.—Thomas Adams.

Rejoice, ye humble,
And exalt, ye poor!
God's kingdom yours
If ye but walk in truth.
—Thomas a Kempis.

The true conquest and peace of faith, as well as the solution of the mystery of sorrow, lie in our willingness to suffer, so far as it may bring us to the society of our Lord.—Bishop Huntington.

The world is wide
In time and tide,
And God is guide;
Then do not hurry.
That man is blest
Who does his best
And leaves the rest;
Then do not worry.
—C. F. Deems.

Yet a little while.
Yet a little way;
Saints shall reap and rest and smile
All the day:—
Up! let's trudge another mile.
—Christina Rosetti.

To make a prayer a right prayer, there must go so many circumstances as that the best man may suspect his

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had or development of Nurses. For further information, address,
REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt

St. Christopher's School

(Formerly the Chamberlayne School)

A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND VA.

Tenth session begins September 22, 1920 Tuition in boarding department limited to twenty-two boys—$700.

For catalogue, address

Rev. C. G. Chamberlayne, Ph. D., Headmaster

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.
A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. College preparatory. Boarding department 503 W. Franklin Street. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health; out-door life.
MISS ROSALIE H. NOLAND, Principal

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLES TOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes Individual instruction. $600

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

FOR GIRLS CHATHAM, VA.
RT. REV. B. D. TUCKER, D. D., PRESIDENT
Rev. C. Orlando Pruden, D. D., Rector
Beautiful and healthful location. 10-acre campus. Modern equipment. Athletics, Gym College Preparatory. Music, Art, Domestic Science. Expression. Certificate admits to leading colleges Catalog.
ANNIE MARION POWELL, M. A., PRINCIPAL, Box 13

CHATHAM Episcopal Institute

HOBART COLLEGE For Men
William Smith College for Women

GENEVA, N. Y.

100th Year Opens September 20, 1921
Hobart offers a large number of scholarships to students preparing for Holy Orders.

RT. REV. CHARLES H. BRENT, D. D., LL. D., CHANCELLOR

RET. MURRAY BARTLETT, D. D., PRESIDENT

For information address the President

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

The Ninety-ninth Session Opens Wednesday, September 21, 1921

For catalogs and other information, address The Dean, Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia.

EDUCATIONAL

Have You Selected Your School?

Enrollments are now being made for the ensuing school year. Many institutions already have a waiting list. If you find it difficult to make a choice, the Southern Churchman will be glad to assist you. Address

Southern Churchman School Bureau
815 East Grace St.
Richmond, Va.

CREAM SODA WATER
RIGHT IN YOUR OWN HOME

Prepare it yourself in five minutes. Dainty, delicious, wholesome and healthful. Cannot be distinguished from that served at the best soda fountains. All flavors, and ice cream soda, besides.

NECTRO-FRUITINE

The wonder and delight of all who have tried it. The greatest temperance proposition ever known

Fine for home use, church and charity fairs and suppers, as well as for automobile and yachting parties, etc., and where the pleasure and convenience of soda fountain service is unobtainable.

Sent by mail to any address on receipt of $1.00 in postal or money order, made payable to

NECTRO-FRUITINE COMPANY
P. O. Lock Box 1256
Belmar, Monmouth County, New Jersey

"The Store That Pleases"
FOR FURNITURE
JONES BROS. & CO.
INCORPORATED
1418 East Main St. :-: Richmond, Va

Beautiful Monogram Stationery

Any monogram in red, blue, gold, or silver, on any of six colors of Linen Finish Paper, $ .00. Send for style sheet and information how to get a box. Free

WAG MFG. CO., 234 So. 8TH ST., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

PRE-WAR PRICES
$15 the Hundred; 20cts. singly.
New Songs of Praise and Power, No. 3.
(Just off Press)
150 Gospel Sunday School Songs. 22 Responsive Readings. Returnable Sample sent on request.
HALL-MACK CO., 21st & Arch Sts., Phila., Pa.

The days are ever divine. They come and go like muffled and veiled figures sent from a distant friendly party; but they say nothing, and if we do not use the gifts they bring they carry them as silently away.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

A beneficent power, if we obey it, blesses and helps us; but the same power, if we disobey it, curses and ruins us. That law runs everywhere. Was not Judas cursed by the same friendship with Jesus that perfected John?—Selected.

The power of the Holy Ghost by which every man who is in doubt may know what is right, every man whose soul is sick may be made spiritually whole, every weak man may be made a strong man—that is God's one sufficient answer to the endless appeal of man's spiritual life.—Phillips Brooks.

We do not know what we shall be, but we may well believe that as the slow-crawling, shaggy caterpillar is to the swift-winged, gorgeously-arrayed butterfly, so is this present "muddy vesture of decay" to that glorified body with which we shall be clothed.—J. H. Snowden.

A time is coming when perfect beauty, perfect tenderness, and everlasting union shall be ours; when partings never more can torture love; when life is love, and death is dead; when "their soul shall be as a watered garden, and they shall not sorrow any more at all."—Canon Knox-Little.

The glory of the Christ, the Son of God, could not be manifested in the most august words. It could only come forth in suffering. Only the cross could make it known. Only in enduring and overcoming death could He show what His oneness with God was: only so could it be shown what His oneness with men was.—F. D. Maurice.

It is our talent in action, in circulation, not wrapped up in a napkin, that will bless and help the world, and bless and ennoble ourselves; and that rule holds good whether our particular talent happens to be culture, or the genius of organization, or the gift of sympathy, or the stewardship of money.—Henry C. Potter.

The real answer to man's need is Jesus Christ. Not that vague, powerless abstraction called "Christianity," which never saved anybody, and never will, but Jesus Christ Himself, wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities, exalted to the right hand of power, conquering carnal, selfish hearts by the magnanimity of suffering love.

There is a wide difference between belief in a doctrine and trust in a person. We can believe a doctrine, but we cannot trust it. We can grasp it with our minds, but it makes no appeal to our hearts; we may believe in the resurrection of the body without believing in Him Who is the resurrection and the life. This is a mistake we often make. We believe the abstract doctrine and forget the living Person. Half our Christian faith is assent to various propositions instead of trust in a personal Redeemer, Who is Himself the substance and explanation of them all. "I," said Jesus, "I am the resurrection and the life."—D. Fairweather.

SUMMER CAMPS

The growing popularity of camps for young people attests the benefit to mind and body of open air and well regulated exercise. Select your camp now. The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN will help you to make a choice.

CAMP NAVAJO FOR GIRLS

7-16 years. On beautiful Lake Thompson, Maine. (Via Bar Harbor exp. from New York, one night.) Rate $200 (no extras). Mid pines and birches on hill sloping down to lake. Full program of water and land sports taught by experienced councillors. Handicraft, folk and interpretative dancing. Excellent food. Physician and nurse. Catalog. Register before June 1st. CLARA HENDERSON, Dir., 1530 Linden Ave., Baltimore, Md.

CAMP TRAIL'S END For Girls

Beautifully located in the Blue Grass region of Kentucky. Splendidly equipped. All land and water sports in charge of experts. Membership select and limited. Trip to world famous Mammoth Cave. Write for booklet. MISS M. D. SNYDER, 363 S. BROADWAY, LEXINGTON, KY.

CAMP JUNALUSKA,
LAKE JUNALUSKA, N. C.

The finest "all-around" camp in the South for girls, near Asheville, in the "Land of the Sky." Girls from eighteen States and two foreign countries last season. July 6 to August 31. Send for illustrated booklet. Miss Ethel J. McCoy, Virginia Intermont College, Bristol, Va.

Many pens have attempted to write a Life of Christ since Canon Farrar wrote his famous volume. The difficulty with most of them is that they give so much attention to technical details they do not hold the interest of the general reader. For some time there has been need of a book that would make its appeal through its clearness and charm of treatment.

This need has now been filled by

PATERSON-SMYTH'S
NEW BOOK

A PEOPLE'S LIFE OF CHRIST

Told in a way that will be read again and again for the solid enjoyment it affords.

The Churchman says: "A book which the average man will read for the pleasure of reading it—a new and popular version for the day and generation."

ONLY $3.50 NET
THE SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO.
RICHMOND, VA.

Jno. L. Williams & Sons

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565)
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds

Earn Extra Dollars in Your Spare Hours

You need no experience to be successful—You can learn as you earn. Let us tell you about our plan.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN is the oldest Episcopal Church Paper published in America. Every dollar received in subscriptions will be devoted to the improvement of the paper and the extension of its service in the work of the Church.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

Street.....

There's a Word

frequently used now-a-days that sometimes is meant and sometimes isn't.

The word is "SERVICE," and we leave it to you to determine whether we mean it.

The Union Bank of Richmond

1104 East Main Street

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffein contained in each:

Black tea—1 cupful (hot) (5 fl. oz.) ..... 1.54 gr.

Green tea—1 glassful (cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice) ..... 2.02 gr.

Coca-Cola—1 drink, 8 fl. oz. (prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup) ..... .61 gr.

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

The Coca-Cola Co., Dept. J, Atlanta, Ga., U. S. A.

J1

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS
Largest stock in the South
We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival
The Couper Marble Works
(Established 65 years)
264-268 Bank St., Norfolk, Va

J. & R. Lamb
23-25-27 SIXTH AVENUE NEW YORK
MEMORIALS IN STAINED GLASS
MOSAIC · MARBLE · STONE · GRANITE
CARVED WOOD · METAL · ETC.

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., MAY 7, 1921. No. 19.

SEEKING POWER FOR A GREAT ACHIEVEMENT

Last week we called attention editorially to the appeal of the Continuation Committee of the Geneva Conference and the Commission of the World Conference on Faith and Order that the days beginning May 8th and ending with Whitsunday shall be used as a special time of prayer for the reunion of Christendom. Now on the eve of that period we would re-emphasize that appeal.

This is our chance to show, in the first place, our belief in the reality of the supreme source of power.

We know the value of machinery. The most marked characteristic of our time is its genius for organization; and organization has its immense importance. It is the vehicle through which the spirit must express itself. It fulfils the same function in all moral and spiritual work that the delicate balance of wheels and rods and pistons fulfil in the engine if the steam is to be turned into effective power. Yet organization, by itself, like dead iron and steel by themselves, is a mere cumbrous mass unless the fires be kept burning within from which the vital power flows.

Therefore, we need prayer. If we set about God's work, we cannot accomplish it simply by the multiplication of our human expedients. We must be in touch with His inspiration. We may plan as much as we choose for Christian reunion; we may turn upon it the ripest wisdom of all our scholars; we may have a thousand men ferreting out the historic causes of division, and seeking some basis of agreement; but all this will be in vain unless we gain the warmth and glow of that consciousness of God which can make us spiritually sympathetic, and open to His purposes which are larger than all the fragments of our partial knowledge. If Christian reunion is to come, it will come only to a people on their knees.

In the second place, these days of special prayer may be made an occasion for that actual co-operation into which we pray increasingly to be led. It can be easily possible for our own churches to arrange in town or country neighborhoods a series of brief services at some central point and invite the ministers of other communions to have part in these. There need be no elaborate program. What we want is a gathering together of those who will lift up our common petition to God for the spirit of fraternity and wisdom and obedience. Who can set limitations to the unseen influences of this simple assembling of ourselves to be led in prayer and meditation by Christian men of different names with whom we may all realize more consciously our union in fundamental loyalty to the purpose of Jesus? In some communities it will be possible to awake wide public interest in such a series of services for united prayer, and many may come. But if only a few came, the promise is of avail that where two or three are gathered together in Christ's name, there He will be in the midst of them. And if from our divided Christendom we can touch Him, we shall begin to be bound together by the only attraction which can permanently hold.

A FALSEHOOD SMOKED OUT

The news columns in the morning papers of May 1 contain a dispatch from Washington which illustrates the sort of misrepresentation to which movements for moral betterment are frequently liable. It begins thus:

"Another moral crusade has now been repudiated by professional reformers. The anti-tobacco movement, supposed to have the full and enthusiastic support of many, if not all, the national reform organizations, has gone the way of the Sunday blue law campaign. It is disowned and discredited by its alleged authors."

The first impression the casual reader would get from these words is that "professional reformers" had intended to carry forward some extreme and fanatical programs of theirs, but had thought better of it and had retreated. The article then goes on to discuss the proposed crusade against tobacco, which was alleged to have been a part of the purpose of the "Women's Christian Temperance Union," the "Anti-Saloon League," and various other bodies. As a matter of fact, these organizations have not, and never have had, any such purpose. The National Women's Christian Union declares that it—

"brands as untrue the charge that we are engaged in a secret campaign for an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting tobacco. We will, however, continue our educational campaign; we will urge the strict enforcement of the laws forbidding the sale of tobacco to minors; we will continue to protest against untruthful and misleading advertisements and against the increasing habit of smoking among women."

And other organizations announce their attitude similarly.

It has been of late a favorite method of the opponents of social betterment to allege all sorts of exaggerated purposes in connection with the forces they fear, and to arouse public hostility on the basis of these trumped-up caricatures. By this means they trade upon the gullibility of many well disposed but indolent people, who, believing this nonsense, assume an air of pitying superiority to those earnest forces which they ought to understand and be fighting for. Looking back now, every one can recognize how the prohibition cause was libelled and distorted; and the enemies of prohibition, beaten now on the essential issue, are at the old game of ascribing to those influences which secured prohibition all kinds of fanatical further purposes which they hope will create a reaction in public opinion. The story, so sedulously spread, of the inauguration of the crusade against the use of tobacco is the illustration of this which is at the moment most plain.

It behooves the people of our churches to be very slow to believe stories which tend to make any organization for moral reformation ridiculous. They had better stop and look and listen, for there is something in ambush along that path of credulity on which they are invited to go.

Particularly does this apply to us who are members of the Episcopal Church. As a body, we did not bear a leading part in the achievement of prohibition. The great majority of our people recognize now that prohibition has been a benefit to the country, and those who voted against it when the matter was at issue are frank to acknowledge that they would never vote again for the open saloon. But we cannot take much pride in this belated wisdom. The fact remains that in the large the membership of other communions bore a more conspicuous part than ourselves at the time when the fight brought odium and reproach. We ought, therefore, to chasten particularly in ourselves the temptation to that sort of supposed superiority which makes one smile indulgently at the purpose of those whom he calls fanatics, believe exaggerated falsehoods in regard to them, and find in these ideas an excuse for sitting down and doing nothing when there is genuine work that calls still to be done. Such legislative advance as national prohibition, and all other registrations of the public will to achieve moral and social improvements, can be made good only by the continual strengthening of the morale of all those who stand for the best things.

WAS DR. MANNING RIGHT?

The last issue of "The New Republic" has an exceedingly interesting and important article, entitled, "Dr. Manning's Social Creed," in which there is a distinct challenge for the thought and will of the Church.

It seems that a few weeks ago Bishop Williams, of Michigan, preached in New York in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. In his sermon he used much of the material of one of the lectures which lately he had delivered on "The Lyman Beecher Foundation," at Yale University. He spoke with a bold plainness of certain industrial injustices of our time, and of the duty of Churchmen, as he believed, to sympathize with the aspiration of the laboring class for a larger democracy in industry. On a following Sunday Dr. Manning, the Bishop-elect of New York, from the same pulpit repudiated Bishop Williams' message. "It is," he said, "our duty to meddle as little as possible, as a Church, with definite political or economic issues, as to which few representatives of the Church are qualified to speak wisely." He declared that we must not take sides in industrial conflict; but, as the New York Churchman has somewhat grimly reported, a layman who had listened to Dr. Manning was heard to remark as he went out from the service. 'Dr. Manning did take sides, and the side he took will not interfere with the building of the cathedral.

The "New Republic" says: "The newspaper extracts from his sermon do not tell us why he regards the application by the Anglican Church of Christian principles to industry as 'meddling,' but it is not because industry is a human activity to which the Christian gospel is irrevelant. For he declares in the same sermon that 'if we will bring Jesus Christ into our problems, personal, social, industrial and national, we shall find their right solution.' The combination of these two statements of Dr. Manning leads to a startling conclusion. If the 'bringing' of Jesus Christ into 'industrial problems' will result in finding the right solution, yet if at the same time few representatives of the Anglican Church are qualified to 'speak wisely' on economic issues, we must infer that few representatives of the Anglican Church are capable of applying the gospel of Jesus to the practical problems of life."

Now, goes on The New Republic, "here is a fundamental contradiction of thought." Christians must believe, as Dr. Manning says, that the Christian gospel provides the clue to the right conduct of political and economic affairs. If it did not provide the clue, if it were possible to segregate the business in which the great majority of people are occupied for so much of their time and to classify it as outside of the realm of Christian truth, either Christianity would not be a religion, or religion would not reveal an inclusive way of life. Yet, as a matter of fact, the political and economic activities of the modern industrial community are conducted with only the most occasional and remote regard for Christian truth. Politics is fundamentally a matter of power and business a matter of self-interest. Politicians and business men, while they usually call themselves good Christians and pray to a God who is Father of Jesus Christ, ignore the Christian gospels in the conduct of their affairs. If a group of men who are trained to interpret the gospels seek to advise them in the conduct of industry or government or object to their existing practices, they regard it as mischievous 'meddling.' No politician or business man would think of consulting with clergymen about the policies he ought to adopt. The function of the clergy, as he sees it, is to bathe in the odor of sanctity institutions and enterprises whose nature laymen have determined on wholly secular grounds.

"Dr. Manning, in the sermon from which we have quoted, reflects the consequences of this anomalous situation. As a Chirstian he was bound to believe that, if business men conducted their affairs according to the light of Christian truth, they could deal rightly with the human problems of industry. Yet as a man of the world he knew that in the opinion and according to the practices of the great majority of business men, clergymen ought not to 'meddle' in questions of business policy, and that when they do 'meddle' they do not 'speak wisely.' He regarded the business man's opinion of clerical meddling as more important and more true than the clergyman's view of the present conduct of industry. If the spokesmen of Christianity could not, from a business man's point of view, 'speak wisely' about 'economic issues,' their lack of wisdom was mischievous and deserved rebuke at his hands. But it never occurred to him that perhaps the inability of 'the representatives of the Church' to 'speak wisely' about 'economic issues' was due not so much to the foolishness of his fellow-clergymen as to the past negligence of the Church in permitting industry to depart so far from Christian truth and yet to remain complacently self-righteous."

We believe this secular journal, turning the cool and critical idea of the world-at-large upon the Church, has revealed in this last sentence a truth which we do well to recognize. "The past negligence of the Church in permitting industry to depart so far from Christian truth, and yet to remain complacently self-righteous"—here is an indictment which brings our thought to sudden arrest. We cannot escape the recognition that before the bar of human judgment today the Church has got to plead "guilty" or "not guilty" to that charge, and if guilty she needs a transformation of mind and heart.

We believe that in large measure the charge is true, though happily its weight is qualified by that word "past." For too long a time the Church preached a gospel which was merely individualistic. She did not grapple with the crying problems of our complex civilization, and her interpretation of her own gospel did not keep pace with the needs of a swiftly changing life. Of late there has been a tremendous new realization of the Kingdom of God as the central message of the Master, and of its implications as affecting our responsibility to bring the ideals of Jesus to bear upon the determination of those actual conditions under which men live and work, make money, employ and are employed, every day. But we have by no means caught up with the problem. Only little by little, and through a few voices crying in the wilderness, have we set ourselves to remedy our past negligences in "permitting industry to depart so far from Christian truth." Industry has been largely built on selfish competition, with cynical distrust of co-operation as a really practicable motive. We have allowed men to be hard and rapacious in their commercial transactions, and still maintain their standing as Christian communicants, and even as leaders in the Christian Church. We have made it plain that there are certain standards of personal morality which are expected of Christian disciples and without which a man immediately loses caste, but we have not yet made either clear or commanding a standard of social idealism to which it shall be equally a matter of course that those who claim to be Christians shall pledge their allegiance.

Nobody imagines that any individual, or group of individuals, will be so wise about practical matters that they can tell the whole Church exactly what it ought to think and do. Some reformers are extremists and some are unwise, but we believe that the Church will arrive at truth, not through stifling the voice of any courageous spokesman, but through listening to what any man whose soul is on fire with a desire for a new social righteousness has to say concerning the way his Christian conscience makes him believe that righteousness should be sought. Organizations like the League for Industrial Democracy have an invaluable place in compelling the thought of the Church, whether we agree with all its particular views or not; and preachers like Bishop Williams, who fearlessly speak their challenge to the comfortable complacency of much of our ecclesiastical thinking will, we believe, be far more likely to lead the Church forward into truth than preachers who cry "Hush, hush," and "Hands off," lest you be thought to "meddle!"

Book Notices

"The Problem of Christian Unity." By Various Writers. The Macmillan Company.

This brief book, issued under the auspices of the Christian Unity Foundation, will be of great value and of distinct encouragement to all who are thinking upon the matter of the possible reunion of divided Christendom. The average person has the feeling that there has been much discussion, still vague to him, on this matter, with, so far as he can see, little result, and he is not hopeful as to any tangible success. But this book is likely to produce a completely different temper of mind, and to warm the whole atmosphere of expectancy into which the matter of Christian unity may be lifted. For here are gathered the utterances of a group of most distinguishd Christian leaders, and, with one possible exception, all are not only vitally interested in the reunion of Christendom, but are distinctly optimistic as to progress in this direction. The writers include the President of Union Theological Seminary, two bishops of the Episcopal Church, a Congregational minister, a Presbyterian minister, a Methodist bishop, and the head of the Foreign Missions Board of the Presbyterian Church. Particularly striking is the chapter by President McGiffert, of Union Seminary, on "Causes Leading Up to Disunity," and that by the Rev. Henry S. Coffin, on "The Mind of the Master."

"Religion and Business." By Roger W. Babson. The Macmillan Company.

Mr. Babson's name is widely known in the business world as head of a great statistical organization. His message, therefore, will doubtless be listened to with particular respect by many who might think that ministers, when they speak of religion, speak ex-parte. What is the judgment of a man whose occupation it is to deal with cold figures, and to sum up the trend of practical affairs with a detached and impartial judgment?—this is worth knowing for all who want to estimate the place of religion in modern life.

For these reasons, and because of the fact that it is written with great clearness and force, this book of Mr. Babson's is of high value He sets forth with frankness the faults and limitations of the Church, but always with such a genuine message of its tremendous possible power that he stirs a desire for the better intelligence and will that shall clear the road through those mistakes toward the Church's maximum service. The character of the book is indicated by the titles of certain of its chapters, "Business Men and the Church," "The Greatest of Undeveloped Resources—Faith." "The Religion Which Will Finally Survive," "The Great Opportunity for Religion in Industry," "Immediate Problems Facing the Church." And his whole message is perhaps summed up in this sentence at the end of the chapter on "Business Men and the Church"—"These investigations have led me to believe that religion is the great undeveloped resource of America today."

"The Pulpit and American Life." By A. S. Hoyt. The Macmillan Company. Price $2.50.

Professor Hoyt, of Auburn Theological Seminary, here adds another valuable book to his two other volumes on preaching which have appeared before. This latest work of his is a review of the power of the pulpit in American life, as illustrated through the personalities of some of the great preachers. There is a chapter first on the Puritan preacher; then, in succession, chapters on Jonathan Edwards, Lyman Beecher, William Ellery Channing, Horace Bushnell, Henry Ward Beecher, and that supreme figure in the Episcopal Church, Phillips Brooks. From the lessons of these great men and prophets, considered one by one, Professor Hoyt then turns to certain general considerations affecting the opportunity of the pulpit today, and discusses these in five chapters, entitled, "The Old and New Evangelism," "Some Distinctive Contributions to the American Pulpit," "The Present American Pulpit," "The Pulpit and Social Welfare," and "The Pulpit and the Nation."

Students in our theological seminaries, and all men starting upon their ministries with the freshness of its undiscovered field still before them, will find in this book the thrill of a great encouragement if they will see that the minister has been, and still can be, the voice of a great authority for conscience of each time, and that men who listen to the voice of God, and seek thereby to be His prophets, possess a privilege of service unsurpassed in power and joy. In the words of Professor Hoyt in his chapter on "The Pulpit and the Nation," when he has reviewed the names of some of the great spokesmen of the Church, "These are great names, ranking with the highest in any calling. But the same truth holds of the rank and file of the pulpit. We could not live without the truths they declare. We could not grow in worth without the ideals they represent. As Mr. Wilson said at Carlisle, England, in the church once served by his maternal grandfather, 'From such quiet places as these go forth influences that bless the life of the nation.'"

HIS LOVE.

"He loved His own unto the end,"
And asked their love;
He said, "I call you each My friend,
And not My servant; and I send
One from above,
Who shall reveal such grace and truth to you
As in My sojourn here ye never knew."

"But why depart?" they cry, "why will
To leave us here?
Thou sayest that Thou dost love us still;
Can it be love if thus Thou fill
Our cup of fear?
O Master, Master, shouldst Thou now depart,
All sorrow needs must overwhelm our heart."

Yet it is love; He said, "I go;
For could I stay,
Your earth-bound thoughts would never know
Love's fullest mysteries, which flow
From Me alway;
My human heart might linger with you yet,
But now affections must on heaven be set.

"You could not know Me more, unless
My Spirit came
And taught the ways of righteousness,
How sin and judgment to confess,
How learn to blame
All clinging to inferior things of earth,
Blind to the glory of your heavenly birth.

"My peace I leave with you, but not
As this world gives;
My Spirit comes to you, yet what
He teaches shows no earthly lot;
He ever lives,
The world must learn. I hear the Father's call
Away from earth—awhile I leave you all.

"Arise! let us go hence." He rose,
And, as He spake,
Calmly He moved, as one who knows
The coming onset of His foes;
The winds shake
With distant sounds, as through the olive grove,
"Let us depart," is echoed from above.

—W. J. Irons.

It is a great encouragement to Christians that every sin and vice is shown in its true character in the Bible and that sinners are made to understand that their actions are not only disapproved by men, but judged as utterly unworthy by a God of unerring justice. Mere censure of wrong cannot reform the wrongdoer. Only the gospel of Christ can effect that inward change in men that causes them to hate vice and to follow after virtue. But what would this world come to if sins were no longer reproved?—Exchange.

ADVENTURERS FOR GOD

The Rt. Rev. Beverley D. Tucker, D. D., LL. D.

A special service, which attracted quite a representative congregation, was held at Cape Henry, Va., on the afternoon of April 26. It was at this point that the adventurers, who afterwards settled at Jamestown, forming the first permanent English settlement in America, made their first landing on April 26, 1607, and raised a cross. The exercises were held near the old lighthouse which marks the traditional spot where the cross was raised three hundred and fourteen years ago, and consisted of a special service arranged by the Bishop. The service was taken by Bishop Thomson, and the Rev. Messrs. H. H. Covington, D. D., M. B. Marshall, J. F. Coleman and R. J. Alfriend. Bishop Tucker made the address, which follows:

"By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went."—Heb. 11:8.

It is just three hundred and fourteen years ago that the first permanent settlement of the English people, and the establishment of the English religion, had their beginning at this place. If we would understand the spirit in which this adventure was undertaken we must go back to the old records of the Virginia company.

The age of Elizabeth, and of the reign that followed it, was a period of expansion. Those old Devonians, who had followed Drake around the seas, and who had sailed with Raleigh, had fired the imagination of the English people, and they were looking beyond the Atlantic, not only for new territory for the English crown, but for the planting of the faith of Jesus Christ. The Rev. Richard Hakluyt, whose body is buried in Westminster Abbey, was the leader in this effort to make the people of England realize that it was not enough to extend the commerce and to enlarge the boundaries of their country, but that they owed it to themselves, as a Christian people, to propagate the faith of the gospel, and to send the blessings of the Church of God wherever they planted their material civilization. In the patent for Virginia obtained from the king, it was expressly stated that one object of the undertaking was that "so noble a work may, by the providence of God, hereafter tend to the glorie of his divine Majestie, in the propagating of Christian religion to such people as sit in darkness and miserable ignorance of the true knowledge and worship of God, and may in time bring the infidels and savages, living in those parts, to human civility and quiet government." And so it happened that when the first company sailed, one of their number was a minister of the Church, appointed for this service by the Archbishop of Canterbury, who was Bancroft. Mr. Wingfield, the first president of the colony, says of Hunt:

"For my first worke, which was to make right choice of a spiritual pastor, I appealed to my Lord of Canterbury, his grace, who gave me very gracious audience at my request. And the world knoweth whom I took with me."

And so Robert Hunt, godly, full of zeal, became the herald of the gospel to America.

The first colonists set sail in three small vessels, of an aggregate tonnage of three hundred tons, on the 19th day of December, 1606, from Blackwell. The Goodspeed, the Susan Constant, the Discovery, this was the fleet that bore the advance guard of the English race to America. It was a hazardous voyage whose difficulties came in the very beginning. For six weeks they were kept on the coast of England by contrary winds. Dissension and strife threatened in the very beginning to ruin the undertaking. "It was then that Mr. Hunt, by his prudent conduct and pious exhortations, allayed," says Stith, "their fury and dissension. This good man, although he was so sick and weak the whole time that few expected his recovery, bore all with meekness and patience. He never betrayed the least desire to leave the business, although his habitation was but twenty miles from the Downs, but preferred the service of God and his country in so good a voyage before all private respects or considerations whatever."

Captain John Smith was put in confinement, and it was not until after the landing when the sealed instructions were opened that they found his name included in those which were to make up the Council.

Passing the Canary Islands and the West Indies, they steered for the north shores of America, but driven by winds they reached the opening of the Chesapeake Bay which had not been discovered before. They called this point Cape Henry, after the son of James the First, who died at nineteen years of age, but who had already proved himself a man of noble spirit. It was this Prince Henry who planned the first University at Henricopolis, for the training not only of the colonists, but of the Indians. His early death prevented the fulfilment of his high ideals for the colony. The other point was named for his younger brother, who became Charles the First. They landed here from their ships, and doubtless knelt, as was their wont, for prayer. They were suddenly assaulted by five Indians, who wounded two of them. From here they passed to Point Comfort and then up to the Island of Jamestown, where they made their first settlement.

It is difficult for us, standing here today, surrounded by that wonderful civilization which has transformed America from a wilderness to a nation equipped to lead the world, to picture those men as they landed for the first time on the shores of the new world. They had their dreams of colonization, but they could not have realized then what would be their fulfilment today. And yet they had come, turning their backs upon home and ease and safety, to set forward human progress. They were called "gentlemen adventurers," men who had a vision and who dared to follow it. The spirit which drove them through storm and tempest and over uncharted seas was the spirit which, through all history, has made possible the advance of the human race.

It was a venture not only for England, but for God, and (if America is true to the spiritual leadership He has given), for humanity. They had the faith and the courage of the great adventurers of all the ages—daring all for the quest they set before them.

The spirit which prompted them, as they left the safe shore of old England, was the spirit of Tucer, as he said:

"Nil desperandum auspice Teucro, et Teucro duce,
"Cras, ingens mare transibimus."
"Tomorrow we cross the Great Sea."

It was more than this. In the heart of Captain John Smith and Robert Hunt it was a venture for God. They went out, like Abraham, not knowing whither they went, but following the call of God, seeking another country. They were men of mixed character, with their faults and human passions, but of high resolve; and back of all the frailty of their human nature was the spirit of seeking something higher and nobler in the land of which they dreamed. They were adventurers, like Sir Humphrey Gilbert, who, as his ship was sinking, sat at the prow with a book in his hand and called to his men, "Be of good cheer; we are as near to heaven by sea as by dry land!"

It is in virtue of the dreams of these men that you and I are here today. We can overlook their weaknesses and make allowance for their faults as we recall their high courage and their thought that they were to win a land for God and for Christ.

This place marks the beginning of the English settlement in America, but it marks also, as yonder cross will tell, the beginning in English America of the Christian Church. We trace back through the centuries and tell the marvelous story of the development of our great nation, but we also tell the story of the building up of the faith of Christ, a story full of cause for gratitude, and yet, as we look around, of ground for reproach, for we feel how much in human thought and human life is still unconquered for the Christ.

And so we look back, not simply to glorify the past and to praise these men who came in their frail ships to build a nation in this new world, but to get from them that spirit of high resolve, of faith and of courage, which will lead us to consecrate ourselves not only to the task of doing our part as citizens of a great republic, safeguarding its future and making it in all things worthy of its glorious past, but of going forth as adventurers for God and for Christ over the troubled seas of humanity.

This was the spirit of Abraham as he obeyed the call of God. It was the lure that drew St. Paul as he saw the vision of the man of Macedonia and heard the pleading, "Come over and help us," or as he cried, "I must also see Rome," or dreamed of taking his journey to Spain, or it may be to Britain. It was the spirit of Ufilas as he carried the gospel to the Goths, of Xavier as he went to India, of Henry Martyn in Persia, of Livingston and Hannington in Africa, of Boone and Thomson in China, of Patterson in the isles of the sea, of Williams in Japan, and of Stuck in the Arctic regions.

Their spirit is but the faint reflection of that of the great Adventurer—of Him Who, not counting the cost, left the glory and the peace and the safety of His heavenly home and came to what was to His experience an unknown world of trouble and sorrow and sin, that He might colonize it for God!

O, my friends, let us look to Him, the Author and the Finisher of our faith, Who in His heroic quest for souls left the splendor of His throne and the glory of the heavenly country to become an adventurer for God!

Let us consecrate ourselves to the work of laboring to hasten the time when His cross, with its message of salvation, shall be planted in all parts of the world. Then shall we prove ourselves worthy of our spiritual ancestry, of the inheritance of the saints in light, kinsmen of the glorious company of the apostles, of the goodly fellowship of the prophets of the noble army of martyrs; nay, worthy to be called brethren of the ascended Christ, sons through Him of the living God.

Counsel for the Times

From the Convention Address of Bishop W. F. Faber, D. D., of Montana.

I cannot pass over the remarkable "Appeal to All Christian People," made by the Lambeth Conference, which opens with the significant words, "We acknowledge all those who believe in our Lord Jesus Christ, and have been baptized into the name of the Holy Trinity, as sharing with us membership in the Universal Church of Christ which is His Body." It is well that this great truth, which has been, so to speak, kept under cover among us, or, at least, too timidly affirmed, should be thus positively and without qualification affirmed by the Bishops, and followed by a frank confession that guilt of "crippling the Body of Christ and hindering the activity of His Spirit" is shared by us along with them. There is a restatement of the familiar "Lambeth Quadrilateral," the fourth article ("the Historic Episcopate") being put thus: "A ministry acknowledged by every part of the Church as possessing not only the inward call of the Spirit, but also the Commission of Christ and the authority of the Whole Body." Then follows a plea for the Episcopate as the one means of providing such a ministry; and a suggested offer to accept from the authorities of other communions a form of commission or recognition of our ministry by them; thus in effect inaugurating reordinations or superordinations all round.

Bishop Gailor said that it was "realized that these approaches would meet some rebuffs and disappointments"; and they have. An American writer in The Hibbert Journal for January confirms this expectation. "There is," he says, "not the least possibility of this path to unity being taken by the great non-Episcopal communions." I regret to say that I agree with him. But if the unity of His people is the will of Christ, it shall come in spite of all prejudices and blunderings, later if not soon. If it be said, "He prayed for a spiritual unity, not one of organization," I reply, "It is the spiritual unity that we are lacking." Every day we are suffering for it in the results of our work. The whole world, long before the war and in the horror of the precipitation of the war and since the armistice, has suffered and been helpless and is helpless today, so far as the checking and guiding influence of organized Christianity is concerned, through the disunion of the Church. We here in Montana have but slight opportunity to call conferences to discuss Lambeth proposals with our brthren, but at least we may cultivate cordial good will, and we may further co-operate with them in ways which in no wise compromise any convictions or principles, or even scruples. And many, perhaps most of us here, are doing so now. Let brotherly love abound more and more. And let us, too, study this question with an open mind, and pray to be guided into paths of fellowship and peace.

A recent writer in a popular weekly asks petulantly, "Why don't the churches settle things?" Admitting the truth of some of his complaints—the futile character of much which is miscalled "preaching," and the rage for machinery and efficiency—experts in attempts to make churches "business-like" (to mention but two)—I fail on the whole to follow his argument as to what it is that needs to be "settled." He speaks of the pathetic craving of the man in the Pullman smoking apartment, whose soul is hungry for spiritual things, for real religion. He dwells upon the fact that increasing multitudes have a tremendous interest in religion and less interest than ever before in the Church. Well—the latter may or may not be true; as to the former, if they have this enormous interest in religion, we can only say they have queer ways of showing it. They might, for example, take a little more interest in churches, these being, after all is said, the only organizations in the land which are distinctly committed to the maintenance and propagation of religion. These same men continue zealous adherents and supporters of one or another political organization, all the while distinctly disapproving of some of its methods and some of its leaders. Or, still keeping aloof from the churches, they might take seriously to heart the unrest and misery of the world, and set themselves to righting some of its wrongs and relieving some of its woes and bringing into effect, so far as in them lies, the Golden Rule, which is surely quite unecclesiastical.

No, I strongly suspect that the unhappy frame of mind of many men today is chiefly due to an apprehension that the unsettled spirit of the world may dispossess them of privilege or property, and they wish the Church to appease that spirit and serve to stabilize the old order. That, I think, is one of "the things" which many men today want the churches to "settle." I cannot think otherwise, being constantly bombarded with the literature of such propaganda.

Meanwhile, what is first needed is a religion of genuine repentance. Panic fears of "revolution," along with boundless frivolity, greed of pleasure and shameless flaunting of indecency, all of them evidences of a self-centered interest, call aloud for a "change of mind," which is what true "repentance" means. And with all this there is a growing callousness to the suffering and ruin of unprecedented multitudes of our fellows and frightful outrages upon justice, so long as these are perpetrated against other races, or peoples, or classes, than our own. For much of this the war—once hailed as sure to purify and humanize and ennoble us—must be held to answer. And still there are men who coolly talk of "the next war," the very suggestion of which every decent man should curse!

My brethren, unless we steadfastly set our faces against it our churches and our Christianity will be depraved—perhaps already they are. We need the reaffirmation of the supremacy of Jesus Christ. What the princes of this world have now too long been bidding us to do is to shout with the ecclesiastics of Jerusalem, "We have no king but Caesar!" The war is over. Caesar then assured us that was to be "the war to end war," to save civilization and democracy and the equal God-given rights of oppressed peoples and races and classes. Let us stand upon the promise! Let us preach peace and justice and brotherhood. We must do it as Christians; we must do it as patriots. "America first" is a poor slogan for Americans if it is to mean callous indifference towards others, as we have allowed it to become toward Armenia, to mention no more. Let it not be said that Prussianism has taken possession now of State and Church! Let us not disappoint the generous trust of England's singer in our loyalty to the best:

"But you, O land, O beautiful land of freedom,
Hold fast the faith which makes and keeps you great.
With you, with you abide the faith and hope,
In this dark hour of agonized mankind.
Hold to that law whereby the warring tribes
Were merged in nations, hold to that wide law
Which bids you merge the nations, here and now,
Into one people. Hold to that deep law
Whereby we reach the peace which is not death,
But the triumphant harmony of Life,
Eternal Life, immortal Love, the Peace
Of worlds that sing around the throne of God."

RACIAL RELATIONS.

Bishop Reese, of Georgia, in his late Council address, spoke with emphasis of a matter of grave concern to the South.

"The race question is too complicated and too serious to be disposed of by any off-hand judgment of ignorance and prejudice. It is not only the future of the negro which is at stake, but the future of our own peace and security. For the violence and the domination by force of one race over another race cannot produce anything but loss and disaster to both races. It is not a question of white control. Of the loss of that I have no fears. It is a question of how we shall maintain it—whether by force or by just administration of law and by the inevitable working out of natural law. Every exhibition of threat breeds violence after its kind, and the end is destruction and a scarcely concealed anarchy.

"I hereby protest most solemnly and earnestly against such methods. I protest against the misguided, if not criminal, folly of those who have disturbed the situation and created distrust and apprehension among the better negroes by organizing a secret society under a name which can only recall the lawless violence of those who perverted the purpose of the original society so named a generation ago. No patriotic or sensible man could for one moment consider it anything but folly to organize a Ku Klux Klan at this day. The name condemns it. It is not necessary. It can only be, at the least, a serious error. It canot fail to be perverted, even if in its origin not unlawful, to unlawful and dangerous purposes.

"I think Christian people and good citizens should utter their minds and express their convictions about matters of grave significance to social well-being. I think the Church should bear witness in such matters. It should condemn evil and evil customs. It should stand for law and order against secret or open violence. It should take its stand to protect the weak. And I believe that at this time of serious issues it should proclaim its moral judgment against wrong and injustice."

In one of our churches in Washington recently a Presbyterian woman of education and intelligence witnessed the baptism of several persons, children and adults, and afterwards asked her friend if it were not possible for her to receive the Sign of the Cross. When baptism was next administered her request was granted.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

FINAL REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON PRAYER BOOK REVISION.

Mr. Editor: At the meeting of the General Convention in Detroit, the suggestions for the revision of the Psalter text, which were at that time presented by the Prayer Book Commission, were referred back to the Commission for further study and revision, and it was noted that the report on this matter should be published at least one year before the next meeting of the convention.

The final report of the committee which has had this matter in hand is now in press, and the pamphlet will soon be published by the Macmillan Company. It is the desire of the Commission to call this matter to the attention of the Church, in order that those interested may make a study of the report and send any criticisms or suggestions in regard to it to the Secretary of the Commission.

JOHN W. SUTER,
Secretary of the Prayer Book Commission.
24 Chestnut St., Boston 9, Mass.

The Great Commission.

EDUCATIONAL NEEDS IN CHINA.

"We are being flooded with a rush of students," writes the Rev. Walworth Tyng, of Changsha, China. "Sixty used to be a good enrollment in the upper primary boys' boarding school (St. James). Last term we thought we were swamped with 120 boys. This year we already have over 140. I have advised the headmaster to make some limits to the numbers, as we simply do not have the room, the buildings, or the staff. But he says: 'What can we do? Just as we think we have enough, the Military Governor sends along two of his cousins (one of his brothers was formerly in the school), and we have to take them.' So many boys turn up who present strong reasons for giving them a Christian education. They come recommended by Christian missionaries, church members, or good friends of our school. The government schools are almost out of business. The pressure is very strong. Boys come in 100 or 150 miles from the country with no friends in city. Can pay fees. But nowhere else to go.

"So we are improvising as best we may. The carpenters (for the new house) are shoved out of the shed they were working in; the old shack is patched up to tide over this term. A new teacher or two is picked up, and on we go, so crowded in the class-rooms that there are two to a single desk."

In this emergency Mr. Tyng resourcefully formulated the following plan: He needs $5,000 for a new school. He has $1,500 in special gifts he will contribute. The Chinese who value educations for their sons will raise $1,500. Mr. Tyng hopes that friends in the United States will give $1,500. That makes $4,500. The last $500 Mr. Tyng believes will come somehow.

Those who wish further information about interesting developments at Changsha can obtain it from Mr. John W. Wood, Secretary, Department of Missions, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

HOW THE CHINESE HELP THE FAMINE SUFFERERS.

That the Chinese people are doing considerable in helping provide for the famine-stricken sufferers of the northern part of their country is evident from a letter which found its way to Bishop Charles D. Williams' office this week from Mrs. Gillman, wife of the President of Boone University, the College of the Episcopal Church in Wuchang, China. The letter reveals something of the interest and the assistance which the missionaries and the native citizens in the Yang Tse Valley are giving to the famine problem.

Wuchang, across the Yang Tse River from Hankow, is not far removed from the famine district, the Hankow-Peking Railway running through the devastated portions of China.

President Gillman has been the Treasurer of the Wuchang Famine Fund and has personally directed the campaign for contributions. Great wooden boxes have been placed at street corners of the city into which the people have thrown their money, ranging from copper cash valued at about one-tenth of a Chinese copper cent to bank notes of large denominations.

When the boxes were brought to Mr. Gillman's home and emptied on the parlor floors the committee handled the coins with shovels in order to sift out the ten-cent pieces and bills. Fifty Chinese college boys spent a day counting the coppers and cash.

About $9,000 was raised in this way, with total contributions from Wuchang, Hankow and Han Yang, the industrial city opposite Hankow, amounting to over $185,000.

Dr. Gillman says that the wonderful thing about this great calamity has been the drawing together of all classes, the self-denial which has been practiced particularly among the students in order to give relief to famine sufferers, and the knitting together of China with a sense of brotherhood and into a national consciousness.

NEAR EAST RELIEF CLOTHING CAMPAIGN.

Last year America sent 750 tons of clothing to the Near East, but the supply is exhausted and the clothing worn out. A tremendous need for clothing now exists, as is shown by such recent cablegrams as the following::

Erivan; "Urgent need for food and clothing." Constantinople; "Refugees arriving from Caucasus, escaping persecution, naked, destitute." Beirut; "Aintab still ravaged by battle, cold and lack of supplies. Aleppo refugee problem growing worse. Cargo old clothing welcome for refugees. New tragedies along Turkish frontier. Probable American relief only hope for thousands."

During a three-inch snowfall in Kars on October 30, 1920, fifty thousand Armenian men were stripped of everything by the invading army, to be driven into the plain unclad. Edward Fox, district manager of Near East Relief, had no clothing to give the men. He did have in his warehouse twenty thousand empty flour sacks. These he distributed as far as they would go, and the men were driven off to the wintry plain with only these for covering.

The recent deportations and the great influx of refugees to the Near East Relief stations places an added burden upon these stations which were already in desperate need of clothing for the 100,000 orphans under their care.

The clothing cast aside as worthless by our people here in America would provide comfortable covering for every unclad one in the Near East, and would be an untold blessing to thousands who have been stripped of all their possessions.

It is such a little thing to dig those cast-off garments out of the clothes' box and send them down to the bundle station, but to at least one, and perhaps several, human beings in that far-off land, it may mean the difference between life, hope, strength and almost certain death.

On June 1st Near East Relief bundle stations will be opened, for one day only, in all the larger cities. Please leave your bundle at the station, or send by parcel post to Near East Relief warehouse, 549 West Thirty-ninth Street, New York City, N. Y.

IS IT WORTH WHILE?

Is it worth while with life's fierce storms to wrestle,
To face and fight the drifting wind and rain;
To stretch and strain each bone and nerve and muscle.
O'er flaunting foes a victory to gain—
Is it worth while?

Is it worth while the steep ascent of heaven
To climb with aching limbs and weary feet,
By hope and duty ever onward driven,
Deaf to the siren ease, with songs so sweet?
Is it worth while?

Is it worth while to sow beside all waters
The precious seeds of faith and hope and love,
To rest not till earth's many sons and daughters
By righteous fruits make glad e'en heaven above—
Is it worth while?

O gracious Christ, at Thy dear feet low falling,
In Thy dear wounds our trembling hands we press,
And Thee our Pattern and our Lord now calling,
We lose the doubts our hearts at times confess—
Is it worth while?

For Thou didst bravely give Thy life for others,
Didst bear the cross and walk the way of shame,
So naught for men whom Thou didst call Thy brothers
Should daunt the hearts that bear Thy blessed name.

—Rev. L. M. Gordon.

Church Intelligence

Meeting of the Presiding Bishop and Council.

The regular meeting of the Presiding Bishop and Council of the Church was held April 27, preceded by meetings of all the departments as well as the Committee on the Priority of Funds, twenty-one of the twenty-six elected members of the Council being present.

A request had been received from the World Alliance for International Friendship through the churches to appoint delegates to the sixth annual Conference to be held in Chicago from May 17-19 of this year. The Council very gladly appointed the Bishops of Chicago, Western New York and Southern Ohio, the Rev. Drs. Wilmer, of Atlanta; Freeman, of Washington; Phillips, of St. Louis, and Washburn, of Kansas City; and Messrs. George Foster Peabody, Robert H. Gardiner and B. C. Howard as such delegates.

It was learned that the United Society of Christian Endeavor was to hold a conference in New York City on July 6th. The Council adopted a resolution conveying to the Board of Trustees of the Christian Endeavor a cordial welcome to the members who will be present.

The Treasurer submitted an interesting report showing that the total received from dioceses and districts on account of 1920 amounted to $3,071,401.06, as against receipts from the same sources in 1919 of $1,411,771.69, being a gain of 117 per cent. The receipts on account of the 1921 quota to March 31 from the same sources amount to $375,457, as compared with $330,010 for the same period last year.

It was noted with appreciation that the contributions to the China Famine Fund through this office up to the close of business April 25 amounted to $108,570.

The Department of Religious Education reported that it had appointed a commission of nine members with the Rev. E. L. Sunderland, of New York, as chairman to take charge of the development of the Daily Vacation Bible School Movement in our Church. Messrs. Burton Easton, of New York, and the Rev. Charles W. Findlay, of Massachusetts, had been added to the Commission on the Church School Service League. In this connection the Council was addressed by President Sill, of Bowdoin, and President Ogilby, of Trinity, and Vice-Chancellor Bishop Knight, of the University of the South. The Council, at the request of the Department of Religious Education, adopted resolutions urging all Church members to recognize, assert and defend the principle that the maintenance of Christian educational institutions is one of the first indices of the vitality of Christian convictions. That means be provided by which the undoubted Christian convictions of Church men and women today may be manifested, as our forefathers manifested their convictions, i. e., by the maintenance of Christian educational institutions as one of the best contributions of the Church to the national well being. That the means be as follows: the establishment by the Department of Religious Education of a commission of six persons (men or women) of recognized ability, who, with the President and with the co-operation of all existing organizations of the Council, will formulate a policy for the support and development of Church colleges and other Church educational institutions, this commission to report to the Council. The term "Church college" is defined as meaning an institution of higher learning, of college or university rank, organically or traditionally and avowedly connected with the Protestant Episcopal Church. That the Presiding Bishop and Council commends the work of such colleges and their appeals for financial support to the people of the Church.

The Department of Missions nominated the Rev. Carroll M. Davis, D. D., of Christ Church Cathedral, St. Louis, as Domestic Secretary. Dean Davis is now a member of the Department of Missions, and is an Assistant Secretary of the General Convention. The Council confirmed the nomination.

It was reported that an anonymous gift of $20,000 had been made for a theological school in Brazil. A very desirable property was available in Porto Alegre, and the Bishop was authorized to use this money to purchase this property.

St. John's Church in Christiansted, in the Virgin Islands, had made a most remarkable record in the Nation-Wide Campaign, increasing its contributions to the Church's Mission from $187 to $3,747. The work had increased to such an extent that an assistant was necessary, and the Council voted an appropriation of $600 from the proceeds of the Nation-Wide Campaign for this purpose.

The Department of the Nation-Wide Campaign asked that Bishop Johnson, of Colorado, be made an additional member of the department, which request was adopted.

The American Church Institute for Negroes made a most interesting report through its General Secretary, Dr. Patton. There are now 2,844 pupils in the ten schools under the direction of the Institute. Fort Valley School, in Georgia, which came under the influence of the Church, has now 603 students.

Meeting of the Department of Missions and Church Extension, April 26.

This department had a meeting at which a great deal of important business was transacted. In addition to the items reported in the proceedings of the Council, the following appointments were made:

Deaconess Muriel A. Thayer, Miss Katherine W. Bridgeman, Miss L. J. Hanes and Mr. J. B. Bentley to Alaska; Miss Grace E. Sherman to the Philippines; the Rev. and Mrs. F. E. A. Shepherd, who have been employed in the field, were regularly appointed to Hangkow.

The Rev. Warren A. Seager and Dr. J. K. Snoke to Shanghai. Dr. Snoke had been a physician employed in the field in Shanghai, and had done such splendid work that the Bishop asked for his regular appointment.

Miss Gladys G. Spencer and Miss Rosalyn Wells Andrews were appointed to Tokio. Miss Andrews is a daughter of one of our missionaries in Japan.

Through a special fund known as the Jane Boland Fund, the income of which was given for the promotion of Church knowledge, by means of books and tracts, the department was able to make a small appropriation to the District of Kyoto to aid in the publication and circulation of Church periodical literature among the teachers and students of Japanese government schools. From the same fund it was also enabled to assist in the publication of a hymnal in Spanish and one in Italian.

Dr. Joseph L. McSparran, our missionary physician in the District of Kyoto, accompanied by Mr. Wilson, our building expert in Japan, appeared before the department in the interest of the rebuilding of the new St. Barnabas' Hospital in Osaka. Most of the money for this enterprise is in hand as proceeds from the sale of the old St. Barnabas' Hospital, which had become utterly inadequate for our purposes. $25,000, in addition to that which is in hand, is needed, and the department gave its consent to Dr. McSparran endeavoring to enlist the aid of friends in this country in behalf of this enterprise.

In El Paso, Tex., there is a Mexican population estimated at 52,000. $25,000 has practically been guaranteed by the people of El Paso to start a humanity center among these people. The help of the Division for Foreign-Born Americans was asked that a like sum might be contributed to aid in the securing of property and payment of the stipend of a missionary who would take charge of this work. The department voted this sum from the appropriation to the Division for Foreign-Born Americans, with the understanding that an equal amount would be raised locally.

Mr. Herbert Lee Upjohn, a New York architect, had offered plans for a portable chapel which would serve as a model for the building of such a chapel which could be used in any part of our mission field. The department accepted these plans with an expression of its appreciation.

The Executive Secretary reported that he had received work from the field that Christ Church, Osaka, one of the self-supporting congregations, had just raised the salary of its rector and secured an assistant clergyman as well as increasing the salary of the Bible woman connected with the parish. Bishop Tucker considers that this is an indication of the value of providing a church with good equipment in the way of building. The congregation is now paying salaries twice the size of those paid three years before the church was completed.

Presiding Bishop and Council to Meet in Washington July 13.

The Council at the February meeting decided to hold extended sessions at the time of its July meeting for the purpose, among other things, of (1) studying the policies, work and expenditures of the several departments, with a view to making definitions and any necessary revaluations, and (2) considering and defining the general policies of the work of the Church, such as, for example, the development of the provincial system and the increased powers of the provinces.

In order that the members of the Council might be entirely freed from any interruption in their work, it was determined to meet at a place distant from New York, and therefore the cordial invitation of the Bishop of Washington to meet in the close of the Washington Cathedral was accepted. The sessions will begin on July 13.

Workers Among the Foreign-Born to Meet.

The Division for Work Among Foreign-Born Americans has issued a call to all Church workers among foreigners to attend the National Conference of Social Work in Milwaukee, June 22 to 29. Problems arising from the foreigner will occupy a large place in the proceedings of the National Conference. In addition, special lectures on the distinctive work of the Church will be given on June 23, 24 and 25, under the auspices of the Foreign-Born Division of the Church. These lectures will be arranged at hours not conflicting with the proceedings of the National Conference.

This special conference will follow immediately after the National Conference of our Church's Social Service Workers, who meet from June 20 to 23. It is expected that many who are interested in the social service will remain for this other conference on the social and religious problem of the foreigner which complicates so many of our social troubles.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Unusual Service at Virginia Seminary.

An unusual and beautiful funeral service was held on Friday, April 29, at the Virginia Theological Seminary, when Miss Helen Somerville Packard, who died at Saranac, N. Y., was buried with full military honors. Miss Packard, who was the daughter of Rev. Thomas J. Packard and granddaughter of Rev. Dr. Joseph Packard, for many years dean of the Seminary, went to France as a nurse with the Johns Hopkins Unit in June, 1917. She was sent home in May, 1918, ill with tuberculosis contracted during her arduous labors, and remained at Saranac until her death. There are twenty-four men studying at the Seminary who had been in the service, and when these men heard the circumstances they insisted on giving her a burial fitting for one who had died for her country. The full military ritual of a soldier's burial was carried out in a most impressive manner. The service was read by the Rev. Dr. W. C. Bell, who went to France as chaplain in 1917, and who wore his uniform, and the organist, Mr. Kirkland, wore the Canadian uniform in which he served from 1914 on. The pall-bearers, all in uniform, were a striking body of men: Captain Jensen, of the Canadian Black Watch, from 1914, gassed at Ypres, badly wounded, wearing a Mons medal and other decorations; Major Sanborn, Canadian Army from 1914, U. S. A. from 1917, staff officer in both armies, wounded at Ypres, wearing the King's medal given only for special services not to be mentioned in dispatches; Captain Cox, U. S. A. 1917, who fought in three battles; Captain Bentley, U. S. A.; Captain Ridout, U. S. A.; Private Baker, wearing the Croix de Guerre. All were overseas men and all had been in battles, and wore various decorations, wound-stripes, etc. The coffin, covered with a flag, and with a Red Cross nurse's cap resting on it, was carried high on their shoulders into the chapel, after the student choir, nearly all of them service men, had sung the national hymn. The prayers used were those for a soldier's burial, and the coffin was carried out of the church to the solemn strains of the Dead March. After the interment in Ivy Hill Cemetery, Major Sanborn formed the men into a firing squad, and three volleys were fired over the grave of the young girl who had given her life in the service of her country. It was a fitting and beautiful tribute to one who had made the supreme sacrifice, rendered with full hearts by those who had been her comrades in the war.

Successful Meeting of Valley Convocation.

Two facts will stand out in the minds of those attending the Valley Convocation in Harrisonburg, on April 19, 20 and 21, one the unbounded hospitality of the Harrisonburg people; the other the splendid showing of the Auxiliary and the inspiration of "Auxiliary Day."

Dr. Berryman Green, D. D., of the Theological Seminary, was to have been the preacher at the opening service of Convocation, but illness prevented him from being present. The Rev. Charles T. Warner, of St. Alban's Parish, Washington, very kindly consented to take his place, and the whole Convocation feels indebted to him for the timely message which he brought.

On Wednesday morning the preacher was the Rev. Malcolm S. Taylor, of Berryville. A large congregation listened with deep appreciation to a sermon on the text, "The letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life." Following the sermon, Holy Communion was celebrated by the Rev. W. H. Compston and the rector, the Rev. Walter Williams.

The business session Wednesday afternoon dealt with the missionary work of Convocation, and how best to forward Mountain Missions. A resolution was adopted expressing regret that the Rev. Josiah R. Ellis had retired from his work at Yancey and wishing him God's richest blessing in his new field.

The meeting at night was addressed by the Rev. Norman Binsted, returned missionary from Akita, Japan, who presented conditions in Japan to his audience in a way that made every one feel that Christianity has taken a strong hold in that kingdom, and that the yeast is working its way in many ways and through many agencies.

Thursday was "Auxiliary Day," and in spite of the fact that most of the delegates had to come a long distance, nearly a hundred assembled for celebration of the Holy Communion in Emmanuel Church at 11 o'clock. A busy day's program followed this service. Miss Davis, President of the Auxiliary in Virginia; Miss Sallie Dean, of Richmond; Miss Mann, and the Rev. Norman Binsted, of Japan, all made addresses that were crowded with inspiration and helpfulness.

A feature of the day was the series of splendid reports from the different Valley branches, showing that the work of the Woman's Auxiliary is taking a deeper and deeper hold upon the imaginations and hearts of the young women of our Church.

A telegram was sent by the Auxiliary to Mr. and Mrs. Ellis, expressing regret at their absence.

The invitation of the dean, the Rev. B. Duvall Chambers, to hold its fall session at Boyce, was accepted, and the Convocation adjourned, to meet at Boyce, October 4, 5 and 6.

G. B. P.

Meeting of Piedmont Convocation.

The Piedmont Convocation held its one hundred and seventh semi-annual meeting in St. Timothy's Church, Herndon, April 27 and 28.

Wednesday, Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Messrs. Everett and Rudderow. A careful conference was then held discussing the proper material for a booklet for rectors to give their confirmation candidates in training for that service, where prevented from attending the class instructions.

At the afternoon business session parochial reports were heard, and at night a missionary service was held, when the Rev. Cary Montague described in detail the work of the Richmond City Mission.

Thursday morning the Quiet Hour was conducted by the Rev. B. J. Rudderow. The dean, Dr. Woodward, was celebrant at the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Burwell. The Rev. Mr. Bowden preached from the text, 2 Tim. 1:7.

The business session was held in the afternoon, the dean presiding. By rising vote, a letter of sympathy and good fellowship was ordered sent by the secretary to the Rev. Dr. Morris, now in Brazil, who was formelry a member of this Convocation. Dr. Woodward and Mr. J. T. Ramey were elected delegates from the Convocation to the Diocesan Missionary Society. Conferences were held on the needs of the vacant parishes. An invitation was accepted for the autumnal meeting in St. Mark's Parish, Culpeper, to be held in September in association with the Centennial of St. Stephen's Church. At night a service was held, with addresses on Christian service.

Send In Your List.

The Rev. W. Roy Mason, Christ Church, Charlottesville, Va., member of the Committee on Entertainment for the Diocesan Council, has issued an urgent appeal to rectors throughout the Diocese to forward without delay the names of delegates who will attend the Council. Up to the present time, Mr. Mason states, very few lists of delegates have been received. The Council meets at Charlottesville May 18.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Mr. Hall Called to St. Paul's, Alexandria.

The Rev. Percy Foster Hall, one of the clergy of Epiphany Parish, has been called to become rector of St. Paul's Church, Alexandria, Va. He has accepted, to take charge about June 1.

Mr. Hall was born in Leeds, Eng., in 1863, and came to New York in 1879. He is a graduate of Columbia University, holding the degree of Master of Arts. He studied at the General Theological Seminary, New York, and was ordained as deacon by Bishop Littlejohn in the Cathedral at Garden City, L. I., in 1889, and as priest in 1893. He served as assistant minister of Grace Church, New York, under Dr. W. R. Huntington, and was at the same time instructor in the New Testament in St. Faith's Training School for Deaconesses.

Other charges of Mr. Hall's have been St. Timothy's Church, Catonsville, Md., and churches in Oakland and Cumberland, Md., and Wheeling, W. Va. He was appointed first assistant minister of the Church of the Epiphany under the late Dr. McKim in October, 1914, which position he has held until the present time.

Meeting of Church School Service League.

A meeting for all members of the Church School Service League of the Diocese was held on Saturday, April 30, at Epiphany Parish Hall, when the special speaker was Mrs. Harrington Littell. This meeting was held in place of the "annual meeting of the Junior Auxiliary" of former days. The Church School Service League, embracing all Sunday school children, holds great possibilities for the children of the Diocese, and given a few years for growth and better understanding by the Church people, will prove its worth and right to a hearty co-operation by all.

The annual convention of the Daughters of the King of the Diocese of Washington was held on Thursday, April 28, at the Chapel of the Good Shepherd, beginning at 10 o'clock with a Quiet Hour conducted by Rev. C.

Dexter Weeden, followed by a celebration of the Holy Communion by Bishop Harding, assisted by Rev. C. S. Abbott, vicar of the chapel.

After luncheon the afternoon was given over to business, and in the evening there was a very helpful and inspiring service, when the Rev. C. T. Warner, of St. Alban's Parish, was the preacher.

By the will of Susan B. Ferguson, St. John's Episcopal Orphanage has been left $1,000 to purchase shoes and stockings for the children.

The Episcopal Eye, Ear and Throat Hospital is also to have $1,000 for free beds. The Rev. E. S. Dunlap, assistant rector of St. John's Church, Sixteenth and H Streets, is to receive a bequest of $2,000.

M. M. W.

NEW YORK.

Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop-Elect.

Hospitality for Wounded Soldiers: Work of Churchwoman's League for Patriotic Service.

As a result of the regular monthly meeting of the Churchwoman's League for Patriotic Service, an organization of the Episcopal Church, founded in April, 1919, to continue the spirit of helpfulness and self-sacrifice called out by the war, held in the Plaza Hotel, New York City, on the afternoon of April 27, the Patriotic Welfare Committee succeeded in raising the sum of $4,000. This amount insures the continuance of the League's activities in connection with a dormitory for wounded soldiers at 153-155 East Thirty-sixth Street, New York. Here men discharged from hospitals can have a good bed, breakfast and the use of an attractive reading room for a small weekly payment.

The Rev. Dr. Herbert M. Shipman, of the Church of the Heavenly Rest, New York City, made a touching appeal on behalf of the wounded ex-service men alone in New York City, urging his audience to let religion and patriotism join hands, and individual sympathy, tact and kindness supplement government aid. He cited individual cases of ill and destitute men gathered in the metropolis from all parts of the Union, imploring the men and women before him to extend hospitality to all.

The speakers who followed Dr. Shipman were Dr. John Erskine, Mr. Russell E. Sard, Past Commander, American Legion, New York State; Mr. Stephen H. P. Pell, and Lieutenant-Colonel Garnett Lee Day.

The utmost enthusiasm was evinced by members of the Churchwoman's League, and the appeals in the name of the Church were responded to instantly and liberally, one member pledging one thousand dollars towards the humane work of the Patriotic Welfare Committee.

The officers of the Churchwoman's League for Patriotic Service include the National President, Mrs. Hamilton R. Fairfax; the Diocesan President, Mrs. Henry Gansevoort Sanford; First Vice-President, Miss Agnes Emily Warren; Second Vice-President, Mrs. Richard Aldrich; Secretary, Miss Emie S. Day, and Treasurer, Miss Violet Bennett. The League in New York is maintaining headquarters at 8 West Forty-seventh Street.

New York Bible Society's New Home.

At the New York Bible Society's dedication of its new building the Rev. Dr. William T. Manning made the prayer of dedication. The occasion was a picturesque one, for the first part of the service took place in the Collegiate Church of St. Nicholas, and clergymen in robes, followed by a large congregation, marched across Fifth Avenue, traffic stopping meanwhile, to complete the service in the society's building. Others to take part included the pastor of St. Nicholas', the Rev. James M. MacLeod, a Presbyterian and a Congregational pastor, and the secretary of the society, the Rev. Dr. George William Carter.

The new building, standing on only a twenty-five foot lot, cost with the land $250,000. It is a memorial of the late James Talcott, who was a business man, but who, in early life, was ordained a Presbyterian minister. It is a marvel of completeness as well as of beauty, with a striking front, a hall seating two hundred and fifty, and meeting rooms for allied organizations. The society has no connection with the American Bible Society, but co-operates with it, and its chief work is the free distribution of Bibles at the Port of New York.

New Dean of St. John's University, Shanghai, Well Known in New York.

Professor John A. Ely, who has just been elected dean of St. John's University, Shanghai, that the president, the Rev. Dr. F. L. H. Pott, may be relieved of administrative details, was for seven years treasurer of the Seabury Society of New York, and, more than any other man, he made financially possible the early Summer Conferences at Cambridge, inaugurated by the society, and now grown into many other summer meetings for Church workers. As Seabury man and lay reader, Mr. Ely founded Holy Nativity Mission, now parish, in Bronx Borough, New York City. Mr. Ely went to China at his own cost.

Sunday School Lenten Offering Presented.

Swarms of children from almost every part of the Diocese, with their elders and teachers, filled the cathedral on the last Saturday in April and presented $27,600 for general missions. It was the Lenten offering. The Rev. Dr. Manning made the address and presented the banner for largest gifts. Nearly 1,000 vested choir boys and girls, from forty-nine parishes, filled the cathedral stalls and sang missionary hymns. The heavy rain did not dampen the ardor a bit.

Anniversary of Washington's Inauguration Observed.

On April 30 the one hundred and thirty-second anniversary of the inauguration of President Washington was observed in St. Paul's Chapel of Trinity Parish, in which the President had a pew. Upwards of forty patriotic societies were represented. The Rev. Dr. McComas gave the address and the Rev. Frank W. Goodman read the lesson from Washington's Bible—the one on which he took the oath of office. New flags were blessed and placed in the chancel to remain there one year. St. Cornelius' choir, from Governor's Island, led a vested procession from St. Paul's House, following the route taken by Washington, and members of Congress of his day.

The Church Club of New York has issued invitations for May 16 to a dinner at the Waldorf Astoria in honor of the Rt. Rev. Dr. William T. Manning, Bishop of New York. The invitation states that the cover charge will be $7. A reception will precede the dinner.

C.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Meeting of Woman's Auxiliary.

Thirty-seven delegates, representing fifteen parishes and missions, attended the twenty-ninth annual meeting of the Georgia Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, in St. Mark's Church, Brunswick, April 20 and 21. At the opening service of the Holy Communion the Bishop was the celebrant, assisted by the Rev. William Johnson, rector of the parish. The Bishop addressed the delegates at the business session which followed, urging greater zeal and enthusiasm, reminding them that it is through prayer that their work must be accomplished. The reports of the four district vice-presidents showed a total amount of $2,190 in contributions from twenty-seven parochial branches. This is an increase over the year 1919 of $400. A resolution preparing the way for a Diocesan Council of the Church Service League was passed authorizing the president in consultation with the Bishop to take the initial steps. Pledges to the amount of $201 were made to the Emery Fund. Resolutions of greetings were exchanged with the Colored Woman's Auxiliary meeting at the same time. The meeting closed with a Quiet Hour conducted by the Rev. Mr. Johnson, the second afternoon. Mrs. A. B. Hull, of Savannah, was re-elected diocesan president.

Meeting of Colored Council.

The sixteenth annual Council of the Colored Churchmen of the Diocese was held in Brunswick, at St. Athanasius' Church, April 19, 20, 21. The Bishop presided and gave his annual address. The Rt. Rev. H. B. Delaney, D. D., Suffragan Bishop of North Carolina, was present at all sessions, delivered an address, and assisted in the services. Before the Nation-Wide Campaign the Colored Council gave for missions $250. After the campaign, $1,-885.61. This represents paid pledges of 822 negro communicants. The Colored Council is now building a new church at Waycross and a new school building at Albany.

An annual offering of $190 was made by the Colored Woman's Auxiliary of the Council of Colored Churchmen of the Diocese at their meeting held in St. Athanasius' Church, Brunswick, April 19, 20, 21. The appropriations were as follows:: Liberian work, $50; school building, St. John's, Albany, $25; scholarship for girl at St. Athanasius', $60; building fund for St. Ambrose, Waycross, $10; United Thank Offering, $5; Archdeacon's fund, $10; Pennick School, $10. The total appropriations for missionary work after the second year of its organization amount to $315.

Correction: The name of the Rev. H. H. Barber, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Augusta, should have been given as a member of the Executive Council, instead of that of the Rev. James B. Lawrence, of Americus, as reported in the issue of April 23.

E. D. J.

NEWARK

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

New and Larger Diocesan Offices.

The large house at 21 Washington Street, which has been for many years the home of Bishop Lines, has been given up by him in order to take a small house, and it has now been fitted up for the offices of the Diocese to be a center of all diocesan work, the rooms at 49 Halsey Street having become entirely inadequate. The large library of the Diocese will now have sufficient room, and the Bishops, the Secretaries for Missions, Social Service and Religious Education, the Nation-Wide Campaign, the Church Mission of Help, the stenographers, will all have separate rooms. A little chapel has been made near the entrance. The work of the Woman's Auxiliary, the G. F. S., the City Mission, the Registrar, etc., will be provided with workrooms and offices, and in connecting rooms as many as two hundred people may be seated, and so it is hoped that present activities and new ones also will find sufficient room for development.

In the death of the Rev. William J. Tilley the Diocese has lost one of its most faithful and best loved clergymen. He was for many years the rector of Christ Church, Harrison. His earlier ministry had been especially in Vermont and at Amherst, Mass. He was compelled last year, on account of failing health, to give up the chaplaincy of the Old Soldiers' Home.

Ordinations of men to the diaconate who will proceed no further have been approved by the Standing Committee in order to meet the great need of ordained men for mission churches or assistants in large parishes.

A new rectory has been planned for Trinity Church, Newark, on Mt. Prospect Avenue.

MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. Chas. D. Williams, D. D., Bishop

Lay Preaching Organization Formed.

A lay preaching organization, with an initial membership of almost fifty men, was formed and a meeting held this week at St. Paul's Cathedral under the auspices of the Church Club of the Diocese of Michigan. There were more than twenty men from Detroit present at the meeting, and the other members of the organization, who come from all parts of the eastern portion of Michigan, will be kept in touch with the organization through branches which will be formed in two or three central places. Lawrence Midworth, who was appointed by the Church Club to organize the League, presided at the meeting and explained the purposes of the organization. He said that throughout the Diocese there are a large number of small missions and parishes which are from time to time without regular clergymen to conduct services. In these cases a lay reader will be sent regularly who will hold the service and carry on all the activities of the mission except those which are expressly forbidden him, such as solemnizing marriages, administering the Holy Communion, etc. He also explained that the men will be used as supply preachers and lay readers at parishes in and around Detroit, where the clergy are absent on summer holidays.

A regular course of study will be followed by the men, who will meet weekly at St. Paul's Cathedral and at the other branch centers of the League, and there will be a faculty, including Archdeacon H. K. Bartow, of Detroit; the Very Rev. Warren L. Rogers, dean of St. Paul's Cathedral; Archdeacon Charles L. Ramsay, of the Southern Archdeaconry; Mr. Francis Mackay, master of the choristers of St. Paul's Cathedral, and the Ven. E. B. Jermin, Archdeacon from the northern part of the Diocese, each of whom will have charge of different courses.

It is expected that later in the year, after the members of the League have been engaged in active work for a considerable period, a large public service will be held, at which they will be set apart by Bishop Charles D. Williams for the special work they will perform.

Practically all of the men who have undertaken the work in the League are men prominent in business and professional life in their own community.

The Rev. Otey R. Berkeley, assistant minister at St. Mark's Church, Toledo, O., has accepted the call to the rectorship of St. Columba's Church, on Jefferson and Manistique, Detroit, Mich., and will enter upon his new charge on May 15, immediately following the Diocesan Convention in Ann Arbor.

St. Columba's Church has been without a rector since the resignation of the Rev. C. L. Ramsay, who gave up parish work on January 1 of this year upon his election as Archdeacon of the southern part of the Diocese of Michigan.

I. C. J.

ERIE.

Rev. Jno. C. Ward, Bishop-Elect.

The Rev. John C. Ward Accepts Election.

In the following letter to the Rev. Dr. Aigner, President of the Standing Committee of the Diocese, the Rev. John C. Ward accepts his election to be Bishop of Erie:

Buffalo, April 23, 1921.

The Rev. Martin Aigner, D. D., President of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Erie:

Reverend and Dear Sir:

Since the surprising announcement of the action of the special committee of your Diocese came to me, I have done my best to gain by thought and prayer a clear vision of my duty.

My love for Grace Parish and my other Buffalo ties have made it most difficult for me to come to the decision which I have reached. Slowly, however, the conviction has forced itself upon me that this call to serve the Church as Bishop in the Diocese of Erie is in reality an order which I have no right to disobey.

I therefore accept this election, subject to the approval of the Bishops and Standing Committees.

Most sincerely yours,

John C. Ward.

MAINE.

Rt. Rev. Benj. Brewster, D. D., Bishop.

Successful Mission in Presque Isle.

The Rev. Walter E. Bentley, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Port Washington, L. I., and National Secretary of the Actors' Church Alliance, held a very successful ten days' mission at St. John's Church, Presque Isle, Me. (the Rev. Lewis Chester Morrison, rector), from April 7 to 17. Services were held every evening (except Saturday), and on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons for women and Wednesday and Friday for chilren. On both Sundays mass meetings were held in the Opera House at 3:30 and 7:30 P. M., and the attendance was phenomenal. At the evening service the Methodist pastor closed his church and brought his people to the mission, taking part in the service. Both the Advent and the Baptist pastors attended several of the services, and the Roman priest prayed for the success of the mission. With this fine Christian spirit the mission naturally gripped the town.

There were many special requests for prayer. The question box was a big feature, so many questions being received it took the missioner nearly an hour each evening to answer them. As a result the influence of the Church in Presque Isle has been greatly strengthened. On Tuesday, April 12, the Protestant clergy of Arostook County held their regular monthly meeting in the town, and by request Mr. Bentley addressed the body on "The Relation of Amusements to Religion," and on the following Saturday evening, in answer to an unanimous appeal, he gave a lecture on "The Relation of the Church to the Theatre," in the Berry Theatre, following it with Shakespearian selections.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.

Mr. Ira W. Stratton, of Reading, was elected Secretary of the Diocese of Bethlehem, to succeed the late David Jarvis Pearsall, at a meeting of the Standing Committee in Wilkes-Barre on April 19. Mr. Charles J. Smith, of Honesdale, was elected a member of the Standing Committee, to succeed the late Joseph N. Welch.

The Rev. H. P. Walter, Executive Secretary of the Diocese, has lately conducted missions at Christ Church, Forest City (Mr. F. A. Van Sciver, minister in charge), and at Christ Church, Slatington (the Rev. O. P. Steckel, rector). The former resulted in the organization of a parish council and the reorganization of the Church school, while the latter resulted in the introduction of the Duplex envelope system and the promise of the mission to contribute toward the rector's salary and the organization of a Woman's Auxiliary.

The Lenten Offering of the Church schools of the Diocese presented recently at the Pro-Cathedral, Bethlehem, amounted to $6,300, an increase of $500 over last year.

WESTERN MICHIGAN

Rt. Rev. J. N. McCormick, D. D., Bishop.

Death of Three Good Church Women in One Day.

St. Paul's Church, Grand Rapids, suffered the sad loss of three of the oldest active women workers of the parish on the same day, Sunday, April 24. These were Mrs. Emma A. Konkle, a member of St. Paul's for forty years; Mrs. Eunice M. Rockwell, for several years choir mother, and energetic in guilds and all Church affairs, and Mrs. Anna Kurkjian, born in Palu, Armenia, and the mother of the first Armenian family to settle in Grand Rapids. Unable to speak English fluently, she yet enjoyed the services of the church

(Continued on page 21)

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

AN AWAKENING.

It is gratifying to note that the Governor of Georgia is taking cognizance of the tremendous injustices that are practiced in that State upon the negroes.

At a recent conference of the Interracial Committee, Governor Dorsey read a booklet on the subject which he had prepared upon information voluntarily sent to him by citizens of his State.

In presenting this matter to the committee the Governor classified these injustices as falling under four heads, as follows: (1) Lynching, (2) peonage, (3) organized lawlessness against the negroes, (4) individual cases of cruelty and injustice.

He does not stop at pointing out evils, but offers a constructive program to remedy conditions, as will be seen from the following suggestions:

"(a) Establishing a State constabulary under proper safeguards and authorizing the Governor, upon his own motion, to send members of such force into any county of the State to quell disorder or to protect the life and property of any citizen.

(b) Imposing a financial penalty upon any county in which a lynching may occur.

(c) Authorizing the Governor of the State to appoint at any time any three judges of the Superior Court to act as a commission to investigate any lynching occurring in any county of the State and empowering the Governor to remove from office any public official found by such commission to have failed to enforce or uphold the law.

(d) Giving the Governor the discretion and power in any case of mob violence or lynching to authorize and direct any judge of the Superior Court to draw grand and petit juries from the State at large for the consideration and trial of such cases, and authorize the Governor to designate the place at which the trial or trials shall be held."

We also quote some of the Governor's comments on conditions:

"In some counties the negro is being driven out as though he were a wild beast," writes the Governor. "In others he is being held as a slave. In others no negroes remain. No effort has been made to collect the cases cited. If such an effort were made, I believe the number could be multiplied. In only two of the 135 cases cited is crime against white women involved.

"If the conditions indicated by these charges should continue, both God and man would justly condemn Georgia more severely than God and man have condemned Belgium and Leopold for the Congo atrocities. But worse than that condemnation would be the continued toleration of such cruelties in Georgia.

"I place the charges before you as they came to me unsolicited. I have withheld the names of counties and individuals because I do not desire to give harmful publicity to these counties, when I am convinced that, even in those counties where the outrages are said to have occurred, the better element regret them. I believe that the better element in those counties and in the whole State, who constitute the majority of our people, will condemn such conditions and take the steps necessary to correct them when they see and realizee the staggering total of such cases, which, while seemingly confined to a small minority of our counties, yet bring disgrace and obloquy upon our State as a whole and upon the entire Southern people. The investigation and the suggestion of a remedy should come from Georgians and not from outsiders."

In his booklet the Governor refers to some specific cases, which we also print, because, when they come from such good authority, we feel that they must be true:

"October, 1919, a negro was taken from the sheriff, who was carrying him from one county to another for safekeeping, and lynched. The negro was a preacher and teacher. Schools and churches were closed on account of influenza, and the negro went to work for a farmer.

In a dispute about extra work the farmer attacked the negro with an axe. The negro raised his gun. The farmer turned and received a load of birdshot in the back. The negro fled, but was brought back.

The sheriff heard a mob threatening, and removed the negro to another county. The sheriff of this county, hearing of a mob, started with the negro to another county, but was overtaken, as described above.

The man shot by the negro is alive."

These statements are not cited for the purpose of bringing discredit upon one of our Southern States, but because we know that most of our Church people have no idea of the reality of the position in which negroes find themselves in many parts of the South, and an honest and impartial investigation will bring to light facts and conditions which it is the duty of all Christians to try to remedy.

MOTHER'S DAY.

A custom has grown up in recent years, which bids fair to become as much a universal practice and a day of national importance as has Thanksgiving Day. Already in most of our States Governors have issued proclamations calling attention to the second Sunday in May and setting it aside as a special day, on which to pay tribute and honor to our mothers if living, or to their memory if dead.

It is natural and proper that Mothers' Day should be a Sunday, for when we turn to the pages of Holy Writ we see coming towards us a long procession of sacred women, who have all distinguished themselves in the capacity of maternity.

We are told that the first consolation and joy that came to Eve, after the expulsion from the garden, was in the birth of her first son.

The greatest tribute that is paid to the beautiful Rebecca is that she "entered into the tent of Isaac, her husband, and consoled him for the loss of his mother."

When we come down into the land of Egypt, with God's chosen people, we find perhaps the greatest tribute in all history, paid to the resourcefulness and ingenuity of motherhood. In the face of the opposition of a monarch backed by all the wealth and resources of a vast domaine, the mother of Moses was able, not only to save her son alive, but to procure for him both the best possible bringing up and the most efficient training in leadership for his subsequent career.

The book of Ruth presents a charming Biblical romance built around one of the mothers of our Saviour.

We are told of Hannah, the mother of Samuel, that she "made him a little coat and brought it to him from year to year," when he was serving with Eli, the priest and judge of Israel, thereby typifying the way in which every mother weaves a garment for her children, from year to year, out of the loving thoughts and tender care which she bestows upon them

We may well pause on the second Sunday in May to think whether we are keeping clean and pure that sacred garment that has been woven for us, and placed about us by the tender hearts of those in whose honor this day is kept.

It is fitting that this long line of mothers should have its last and greatest figures in the gospels, where we find that sweet scene, presented to us by St. Luke in the interview between Elizabeth, the mother of the eloquent forerunner of the Master, and Mary, the mother of our Lord and Saviour—when the latter gave to us that melodious chant which rings through our churches from Sunday to Sunday, as our choirs render the Magnificat.

It is equally appropriate that the day for commemorating the love of the woman to whom we owe the most in life should occur in the month of May—when the universal mother, Nature, is daily producing for us new treasures of beauty and fragrance, from the inexhaustible resources of her treasure house.

The following lines combine a tribute to this quality of nature and to the same attribute in the human race—to motherhood:

"I know a dimple in the mountain side,
Where winds the road and moss-clad boulder hide,
And here in perfumed fellowship I find
A goodly company of all of nature's kind.
Only a dimple in the mountain side, you say,
Yet holds a hint of all the world's array.
I know one woman's mind so high and pure,
That here all strongest faith and hope have store.
Only one small human mind, you say,
Yet holds enough of God to point me out the way."

Family Department

MAY.

1. Fifth (Rogation) Sunday after Easter. SS. Philip and James.
2, 3, 4. Rogation Days.
5. Thursday. Ascension Day.
8. Sunday after Ascension Day.
15. Whitsunday.
18, 20, 21. Ember Days.
22. Trinity Sunday.
29. First Sunday after Trinity.
31. Tuesday.

Collect for Sunday After Ascension Day.

O God, the King of Glory, Who hast exalted Thine only Son, Jesus Christ, with great triumph unto Thy kingdom in heaven; we beseech Thee, leave us not comfortless, but send to us Thine Holy Ghost to comfort us; and exalt us unto the same place whither our Saviour Christ is gone before, Who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end. Amen.

For the Southern Churchman.

Such Was Thy Courage, Lord.

Jane Dalziel Wood.

Alone in lands where ruled by the foe,
Who tempted Him in vain,
He proved to Satan, once for all,
It is His right to reign,
And later at His mere command
His hosts fled one insane.

Addressed His Father's worshippers—
(Though Him they did not know),
He called Himself the Son of God,
And frankly told them so;
Denounced the worship of their lips,
And classed them with the foe.

When challenged by traditions old
That were at best hearsay,
Proclaimed the Spirit's liberty—
Healed on the Sabbath day,
Urged mercy for the folk whom they
Would sacrifice alway.

Confronted by the Moral Law—
Revealed it to the soul,
Laid claim to all that hearts of men
Have need to make them whole;
Unflinchingly declared the cross
The way to heaven's goal.

Accused of treason and of sin,
Nor law nor friend claimed He,
But dared to leave the record here,
"HE DIED UPON THE TREE":
Then overcame the power of death
And set His people free.

Exalted to the throne of God,
Left fishers to record
The life, the death, the saving grace
Of Jesus, Son of God;
And what they wrote, men have proved true;

. . . . . .

—SUCH WAS THY COURAGE, LORD.

The Inverted Bowl.

"Cheer up, Daisy. There's no day without its bit of sunshine," sang Rob as his sister started out grimly for the office.

"I guess you don't have to sit all day taking dictation from a man who is cross enough to bite a nail in two," Daisy Reynolds retorted, as she fastened on her small velvet hat. It was becoming, that was one comfort, and the knowledge almost brought a smile to her set lips.

"No, but I have to sit here," was the quiet reply.

Daisy cast a quick, repentant look at the figure in the rolling chair and went up to Rob to kiss him on his cheeks.

"I'm sorry," she whispered. He held her hands fast.

"I was reading something the other day and I wanted to tell it to you, dear. It is a very ancient Chinese proverb. I expect that the old Mandarins in their round caps and scarlet gowns used to say it. 'The sun cannot shine into an inverted bowl.' "

"You mean that I am like—a bowl turned upside down so that it cannot receive anything from the outside into itself?"

"Something like that, or a flower that shuts its petals tight together and does not let in the cooling raindrops or the fine beak of a humming-bird, or a stray sunbeam."

"I must be off. Now, Bob, have you everything that you need?"

"Yes, my pitcher of milk and a plate of bread, a basket of rosy apples, and two fresh eggs, and the egg-beater. Oh, I'll not starve before you get back, little sister; never fear."

Daisy was late. She hurried along the slippery street to catch the car, and when she reached the proper corner, alighting, she rushed on through snowflakes that were whirling in the air as lightly as if they were indeed, as the old legend tells us, the feathers out of the witches' bed thrown down upon the earth.

Turning the corner, she ran plump into a big man in a rough coat who helped her to regain her footing. The surprise was mutual. Mr. Podgett looked into the face of his stenographer, and Daisy Reynolds, for the first time in the year that she had worked for him, caught a smile of amusement on her employer's face.

He lifted his hat courteously and walked on, while she slipped into a side entrance, and when he entered the office was already busy at the machine, copying some delayed work. Her face was as stern as ever. Mr. Podgett had often wondered whether she was more than a human automaton who entered at nine and left at five, who spoke to no one and resented any attempts at conversation on the part of the two other girls in his employ.

All the morning the words spoken by Rob kept repeating themselves—the Chinese proverb—"The sun cannot shine into an inverted bowl. Daisy Reynolds wanted the sunshine so much, her life was so dull and gray. She could remember her father as a prosperous business man; that was five years before. The crash came and broke his courage, so he gave up hope and life. Her mother died. Rob had a good place as shipping clerk in government employ. He was struck down one day by an immense derrick, spent months in the hospital, and was now, though regaining strength, apparently helpless.

On Daisy devolved the support of them both, and she worked—as Mr. Podgett had said—like a machine. At home she was all sweetness; outside she was as sour as a persimmon and as prickly as the strange fruit that grows on the Sicilian cactus.

Yet Daisy Reynolds dearly desired sympathy and friends; she wanted to know the other girls who laughed and joked, but who had long ago given up trying to thaw out "that cold Miss Reynolds, with her head in the air." Daisy's head was not in the air at all. Part of her coldness was caused by shyness, part by a desperate fear that she would not do her work well and might lose her job. That would be a disaster, for good jobs were hard to find, and Mr. Podgett, big all over, ungainly in figure, with immense hands, a large nose and thick lips, was at least a gentleman. He had a very pleasant voice and remarkable eyes. Daisy had now learned that he could smile, a real discovery, and one which attracted her.

She ate lunch at the noon hour in the intervals of copying letters, and meditated. Was she an inverted bowl? Was that the reason why so little sunshine, so few friends, had fallen to her lot? She had blamed Providence and fate, everything but herself. Now, Rob's words had cut to the very core of the whole trouble. Rob had a way of doing this; he was clear-sighted and he lived—yes, he lived very close to God. Maybe he had plenty of chance to do this because he was alone all day and could think.

"I'll take an interest in other people," Daisy resolved, and before she had time to grow timid and draw back into herself she spoke aloud to the only other person left in the office, a slender, pale girl in black.

"It's going to be quite a storm, isn't it?"

If the sphinx in Egypt should suddenly speak, it could scarcely have made more impression than those simple words of "silent Miss Reynolds."

Ruth McCabe smiled. She, too, longed for friends.

"The flakes are coming down fast. Do you live far from here?"

"Not so very. I guess I can go home all right, even though it does drift. Maybe you have further to go?"

"Clear the other side of town, and I didn't bring any rubbers." Ruth laughed cheerfully and Daisy wondered why she had never noticed before what a sweet face she had. Ruth was a young girl, not more than eighteen. "I live in a boarding-house since Janey died. She was my sister. Do you—do you live at home?"

Neither girl knew that Mr. Podgett had returned earlier than usual on account of the storm, and, hearing the girlish voices, waited outside the door. He could not help hearing the words, either. Surely that was Miss Reynolds' voice! Could it be possible that she was willing to make friends with that poor little Ruth McCabe?

Mr. Podgett was a good man and a kind employer, though he had such an unfortunate cast of face that it made any one who did not know what a tender heart he had think that he was cross and ill-natured. Like Daisy, he was timid, except in business matters, and he made friends slowly. Even his employees did not realize that their employer was a friend to the unfortunate and helpless. Had they realized it, they would have trusted him more.

Here were three people longing for friends—Daisy, Ruth, and rich Mr. Podgett, who lived in a great house filled with works of art, of which he was very fond, alone with a woman who had kept house for his mother and called him Tom.

"I live with my brother. He's a cripple, but we hope that some day he'll walk, only it costs so much to have specialists that we must wait till I can earn enough money. I put by a little each week, but it's so little."

Decidedly the bowl was right side up now, and Ruth's comforting hand laid on Daisy's was some of the sunshine coming into her soul.

"I know just how it is, dear. But it's so nice to come home to somebody you love! I'm all alone, and in the evenings I read—study, but it's—well, not lively." She laughed again, but the tears were near the surface.

The men began to come back in. Daisy returned to her place, feeling strangely exhilarated. Sunshine has a splendid effect on the nerves, and in spite of her loneliness Ruth McCabe was full of sunshine and she emanated it. Mr. Podgett sauntered in, as if he had heard nothing, and went on monotonously dictating letters to Daisy. Outside the snow fell constantly until the whole town was covered with a white mantle. The wind arose and whistled around the building. Ruth looked out anxiously as the darkness fell early. How was she to get home? Her coat was none too heavy and she had no rubbers.

Daisy saw that she was anxious, noting it with her new sense of interest. It was five o'clock and she closed the machine. Mr. Podgett seemed to be engrossed in reading and signing letters, and one by one the men were leaving.

She went to Ruth's side.

"Don't you want to come home with me We can wade that far through the drifts. I think that the cars have stopped running. It isn't very far."

Ruth's face was illuminated with pleasure.

"Oh, I'd love to, if you'll let me."

"Of course I will, and be glad to have you." Daisy scarcely knew her own self as she spoke. She, the girl who kept herself apart from others, was actually inviting some one to visit her. What would Rob say?

The two put on coats and hats and started toward the door.

A man's voice—could it be Mr. Podgett's—said, "Young ladies, it is a bad night. My car is waiting for me. If you will come with me, I think that I can guarantee you a safe arrival."

Had the heavens fallen?

"Thank you," they murmured, clinging to each other as they entered a large car, warm, sheltered, lit with a tiny electric lamp. Through the snow they went, pitying the poor pedestrians who were fighting their way along. Mr. Podgett, out of office, was a different man. By a few questions he found out all about Rob and his illness. When he left them at Daisy's door he went on his way, smiling as he had not done for some time, as if something very pleasant lay before him. He knew a doctor who could do marvelous things He could try his skill on Rob. And Daisy should have her salary raised. He'd find some way to help Ruth, too. Maybe, in seeking for happiness outside, he had neglected the opportunities for giving happiness to those whom he saw every day.

"Oh, Rob!" exclaimed Daisy, bursting into the room where her brother sat reading. "I've brought Ruth, my new friend, home to stay all night. And we came in Mr. Podgett's car. He wants to know you and will pay you a visit soon."

Rob stretched out a welcoming hand to Ruth.

"And, Rob, dear, you were right. When the bowl of one's heart is inverted, the sunshine cannot come in. Mine's right side up now, and it's going to stay so."—Felicia B. Clark, in Western Christian Advocate.

The Three C'S.

The three C's will carry you through almost any situation.

I will be cheerful.—The grouch never gets anywhere. If he happens to have an idea, no one is willing to help him work it out, and one cannot do much all alone. It takes cheerfulness to grow success, just as it takes sunshine to grow flowers.

I will be courageous.—Courage begets confidence. Face one difficulty and you will gather confidence to face a greater one. And there is nothing to be afraid of, if we only knew it. If you set out to do a thing that is right, and worth doing, man cannot stop you unless you are a coward and let him.

I will be creative.—This does not mean that you must paint a great picture, or write a great book, or build a great building. It means that you must think your own thoughts, plan your own plans, work out your own ideas. The individual that never tries anything except what some one else has tried before will soon get into a hopeless rut. Strike out along new lines occasionally. Create something for yourself.—Selected.

On the Wycombe Road.

Singing he took the Wycombe Road,
When all the earth with May was sweet—
To travel down to London town,
And youth and courage winged his feet.

White was the hawthorn hedge, but he Saw evermore the mighty state,
The river, and the palaces,
Where the great queen in glory sate.

Clear was the linnet's call, but he Heard evermore the minster bell;
Beheld the magic web of life,
And dreamed the dreams youth dreams so well.

High hope and daring thought of fame
Wrought in his blood with the sweet May—
So, singing down the Wycombe Road
Went young Will Shakespeare on that day.

—Eva Mabel Sadler, in American Poetry Magazine.

The Tired Little Hamal.

On the sleeping porch for tubercular patients I ran across a case—one of those products of the deportations which still drift into Near East Relief hospitals—which left me heartsick.

Gray blankets covered the child completely from head to foot, so that indeed you might not have guessed there was any one in the bed at all, so thin, so emaciated was she. The chart informed me that she was Hunazant Kevorkian, fifteen years old, of Paloo, a nearby town, the diagnosis—creeping paralysis.

Except for an uncle in America, by name Merscob Fushdian, and one ten-year-old brother who is a slave in a Turkish home, she has no one. Her mother died before the deportations and her father was killed at that time. The little girl, then ten years old, was seized by a Turk and used by him for a hamal, a porter, a little dray animal, for five years. She wore on her back the hamal's saddle, whereon she carried loads of wood and the tall wicker baskets which the farmer brims with fifty or sixty pounds of fruit or vegetables. That was her daily burden, over the hills and to the Harpoot bazaar. Her shoes wore out in the course of this daily trudging and were not replaced by her Turkish master. She did not even have what horses and packasses have—shoes. Horses and packasses cost gold liras; Armenian children cost nothing in 1915.

After a year the little dray animal began to stagger under her loads. Sometimes she fainted, and would have to rest for hours, during her climb up Harhoot hill. Instead of half a day, the round trip would take her until evening, when she would be beaten for having loitered on the way. Sores appeared on her back, where the saddle rested; these turned to ulcers.

One morning she could not get up from the mat on which she slept. Her master stirred her with his heavy foot, but she only lay there, looking at him with strange, puzzled eyes. For though she had seen his foot touch her, she could feel nothing. The Turk did not know what paralysis was, but he saw one thing plainly enough, that it would be stupid to waste food on one who could no longer work. Next morning the Near East Relief nurse found her lying on the hospital steps. She had been left there, just as railroad hands will shunt a worn-out locomotive off the track of its daily run and into the junk-heap.

"She will live about ten days more," said the nurse, "and I hope the end will come even sooner, for she suffers a great deal, notwithstanding that half the spine is paralyzed."

I cannot describe, cannot convey to you the look on that little brown face, nearing its last sleep. Long sufferings had effaced all suggestion of childhood and had stamped thereon a great sweetness, a great wistfulness, and a premature womanhood. So sweet, so grave, she might have been a Madonna of Sorrows. Yet she was nothing but a little dray animal, long an alien to all earthly affection. Hopeless suffering had been the Via Crusis where her face had caught that gleam of divinity. One could most truly say of her that which, long ago, was said of all children—of such is the kingdom of heaven.—The New Near East.

The Prayer of Faith.

The most wonderful thing in our daily life is prayer. It may sink into the merely trivial and commonplace through the vain repetition of familiar words. The light and splendor of communing with God, may have passed by imperceptible degrees into the light of common day, and become merely a part of the daily routine.

But whether we realize it or not prayer is the most wonderful of the daily happenings; and if the scene of wonder has been lost, if the eye of the soul has become dimmed by the too close contact and communion with earthly things, then we must recover for ourselves the lost wonder, we must look and look away from earth till the hidden realities become once more clearly visible.

Prayer without faith is a mere formula. Prayer with faith added can enable us to reach out and lay hold of the divine strength which will make us almost equal with the angels Angelic service we can render here on earth for we need not wait till we have passed within the veil, but we must have the faith to make prayer a real grasping of the power which we need to do the things which need doing, but which are not done. Yes, not done because they are beyond our own strength, and we have not had the faith to believe that we could use more power than we naturally have.

We read of many besides Elias in the Bible, who while "subject to like passions as we are," yet flame out from the pages of history, as a result of the prayers of faith. They were men and women like ourselves, and we are men and women as they were, but without that which made their lives so different, so many worlds apart from our own.

But we, too, have the key that unlocks the treasure house, which places at our complete disposal all that made them what they were and enabled them to do and attain to what they did—Rev. F. W. Neve.

For the Young Folks

His Loving Care.

Jesus takes care of the little birds
'Way up in the treetops tall;
He helps the mother bird care for them
So that they will not fall.

Jesus takes care of the little flowers
That grow in the earth so brown;
He gives them the sun to keep them warm
And sends the raindrops down.

All day He cares for the little child
Till the stars begin to peep;
He bends His head to hear its prayer,
And His angels guard its sleep.

—Sunbeam.

The Path of the Sky.

PART I.

Deacon Jimmy Wadsworth was probably the most upright man in Cornwall. It was he who drove five miles one bitter winter night and woke up Silas Smith, who kept the store at Cornwall Bridge, to give him back three cents over-change. Silas' language, as he went back to bed, almost brought on a thaw. The deacon lived on the tip top of the Cobble, one of the twenty-seven named hills of Cornwall, with Aunt Maria, his wife; Hen Root, his hired man; Nip Root, Hen's yellow dog, and—the Ducks. The deacon had rumpled white hair, a serene, clear-cut face, and, even when working, always wore a clean white shirt with a stiff bosom and no collar; while Aunt Maria was one of the salt of the earth. She was spry and short, with a little face all wrinkled with good-will and good works, and had twinkling eyes of horizon-blue. If any one was suddenly ill or had unexpected company or was getting married or buried, Aunt Maria was always on hand helping. As for Hen, he cared more for his dog than he did for any human. When a drive for the Liberty Loan was started in Cornwall, he bought a bond for himself and one for Nip, and had the latter wear a Liberty Loan button in his collar. Of course, the farm was cluttered up with horses, cows, chickens and similar bric-a-brac, but the Ducks were part of the household. It came about in this way: Rashe Howe, who hunted everything except work, had given the deacon a tamed decoy-duck who seemed to have passed her usefulness as a lure. It was evident, however, that she had been trifling with Rashe, for before she had been on the farm a month, somewhere in sky or stream she found a mate. Later, down by the ice pond, she stole a nest, a beautiful basin made of leaves and edged with soft down from her black-and-buff breast. There she laid ten blunt-ended, brown eggs which she brooded until she was carried off one night by a wandering fox. Her mate went back to the wilds, and Aunt Maria put the eggs under a big, clucking brahma hen, who hatched out four soft yellow ducklings. They had no more than come out of the shell when, with faint little quackings, they paddled out of the barnyard and started in single file for the pond. Although just hatched, each little duck knew its place in the line, and, from that day on, the order never changed. The old hen, clucking frantically, tried again and again to turn them back. Each time they scattered and, waddling past her, fell into line once more. When at last they reached the bank, their foster-mother scurried back and forth, squawking warnings at the top of her voice; but one after another each disobedient duckling plunged in with a bob of its turned-up tail, and the procession swam around and around the pond as if it would never stop. This was too much for the old hen. She stood for a long minute watching the ungrateful brood, and then turned away and evidently disinherited them upon the spot. From that moment she gave up the duties of motherhood, stopped setting and clucking, and never again recognized her foster-children, as they found out to their sorrow after their swim. All the rest of the day they plopped sadly after her, only to be received with pecks whenever they came too near. She would neither feed nor brood them, and when night came they had to huddle in their deserted coop in a soft little heap, shivering and quacking beseechingly until daylight. The next day Aunt Maria was moved by the sight of the four weary, but still pursuing the indifferent hen, keeping up the while a chorus of soft, sorrowful little quackings which ought to have touched her heart—but didn't. By this time they were so weak that if Aunt Maria had not taken them into the kitchen and fed them and covered them up in a basket of flannel, they would never have lived through the second night. Thereafter the old kitchen became a nursery. Four human babies could hardly have called for more attention or made more trouble or have been better loved than those four fuzzy, soft, yellow ducklings. In a few days the whole home-life on top of the Cobble centered around them. They needed so much nursing and petting and soothing that it almost seemed to Aunt Maria as if a half-century had rolled back and that she was once more looking after babies long, long lost to her. Even old Hen became attached to them enough to cuff Nip violently when that pampered animal growled at the new-comers and showed signs of abolishing them. From that moment Nip joined the brahma hen in ignoring the ducklings completely. If any attention was shown them in his presence, he would stalk away majestically, as if overcome by astonishment that humans would spend their time over four yellow ducks instead of one yellow dog.

During the ducks' first days in the kitchen, some one had to be with them constantly. Otherwise, all four of them would go "Yip! yip! yip!" at the top of their voices. As soon as any one came to their cradle or even spoke to them they would snuggle down contentedly under the flannel and sing like a lot of little tea-kettles, making the same kind of a sleepy hum that a flock of wild mallards give when they are sleeping far out on the water. They liked the deacon and Hen, but they loved Aunt Maria. In a few days they followed her everywhere around the house and even out on the farm, paddling along just behind her in single file and quacking vigorously if she walked too fast. One day she tried to slip out and go down to the Sewing Circle at Mrs. Miner Rogers' at the foot of the hill, but they were on her trail before she had taken ten steps. They followed her all the way there and stood with their beaks pressed against the bay-window, watching her as she sat in Mrs. Rogers' parlor. When they made up their minds that she had called long enough, they set up such a chorus of quackings and so embarrassed Aunt Maria that she had to come.

"Those pesky ducks will quack their heads off if I don't leave," she explained shame-facedly.

The road uphill was a long, long trail for the ducklings. Every now and then they would stop and cry, with their pathetic little yipping note, and lie down flat on their backs and hold their soft little paddles straight up in the air to show how sore they were. The last half of the journey they made in Aunt Maria's apron, singing away contentedly as she plodded up the hill. As they grew older they took an interest in every one who came, and, if they did not approve of the visitor, would quack deafeningly until he went. Once Aunt Maria happened to step suddenly around the corner of the house as a load of hay went past. Finding her gone, the ducks started solemnly down the road, following the hay-wagon, evidently convinced that she was hidden somewhere beneath the load. They were almost out of sight when Aunt Maria called to them. At the first sound of her voice they turned and hurried back, flapping their wings and paddling with all their might, quacking joyously as they came.

Aunt Maria and the flock had various little private games of their own. Whenever she sat down they would tug at the neatly tied bows of her shoe-laces until they had loosened them, whereupon she would jump up and rush at them, pretending great wrath, whereat they would scatter on all sides, quacking delightedly. When she turned back they would form a circle around her, snuggling their soft necks against her gown, until she scratched each uplifted head softly. If she wore button shoes, they would pry away at the loose buttons and pretend to swallow them. When she was working in her flower-garden they would bother her by swallowing some of the smallest bulbs and snatching up and running away with larger ones. At other times they would hide in dark corners and rush out at her with loud and terrifying quacks, at which Aunt Maria would pretend to be much frightened and scuttle away, pursued by the whole flock.

All three of the family were forever grumbling about the flock. To hear them, one would suppose that their whole lives were embittered by the trouble and expense of caring for a lot of useless, greedy ducks. Yet when Hen suggested roast duck for Thanksgiving, Deacon Jimmy and Aunt Maria lectured him so severely for his cruelty that he was glad to explain that he was only joking. Once, when the ducks were sick, he dug angleworms for them all one winter afternoon in the corner of the pig-pen, where the ground still remained unfrozen, and Deacon Jimmy nearly bankrupted himself buying pickled oysters, which he fed them as a tonic. It was not long before they outgrew their baby clothes and wore the mottled brown of the mallard duck, with a dark, steel-blue bar edged with white on either wing. Blackie, the leader, evidently had a strain of black duck in her blood. She was larger and lacked the trim bearing of the aristocratic mallard. On the other hand, she had all the weariness and sagacity of the black duck, than whom there is no wiser bird. As the winter came on, a coop was fixed up for them not far from the kitchen, where they slept on warm straw in the coldest weather with their heads tucked under their soft, down-lined wings up to their round, bright eyes. The first November snowstorm covered their coop out of sight; but when Aunt Maria called they quacked a cheery answer back from under the drift.

Then came the drake, a gorgeous mallard with a head of emerald-green and snow-white collar and with black-white-gray-and-violet wings, in all the pride and beauty of his prime. A few days and nights before he had been a part of the far north. Beyond the haunts of men, beyond the farthest forests where the sullen green of the pines gleamed against a silver sky, a great waste-land stretched clear to the tundras, beyond which is the ice of the Arctic. In this wilderness, where long leagues of rushes hissed and whispered to the wind, the drake had dwelt. Here and there were pools of green-gray water, and beyond the rushes strefched the bleached brown reeds, deepening in the distance to a dark tan. In the summer a heavy, sweet scent had hung over the marshland, like the breath of a herd of sleeping cattle. Here had lived uncounted multitudes of waterfowl.

As the summer passed a bitter wind howled like a wolf from the north, with the hiss of snow in its wings. Sometimes by day, when little flurries of snow whirled over the waving rushes; sometimes by night, when a misty moon struggled through a gray rack of cloud, long lines and crowded masses of water-birds sprang into the air and started on the far journey southward. There were gaggles of wild geese flying in long wedges, with the strongest and the wisest gander leading the converging lines, wisps of snipe and badlings of duck of many kinds. The widgeons flew, with whistling wings, in long black streamers. The scaup came down the sky in dark masses, giving a rippling purr as they flew. Here and there, scattered couples of blue-winged teal shot past the groups of the slower ducks. Then down the sky, in a whizzing parallelogram, came a band of canvasbacks, with long red heads and necks and gray-white backs. Moving at the rate of a hundred and sixty feet a second, they passed pintails, black duck and mergansers as if they had been anchored, grunting as they flew. When the rest of his folk sprang into the air, the mallard drake had refused to leave the cold pools and the whispering rushes. Late that season he had lost his mate; and lonely without her and hoping still for her return, he lingered among the last to leave. As the nights went by, the marshes became more and more deserted. Then there dawned a cold, turquoise day. The winding streams showed sheets of sapphire and pools of molten silver. That afternoon the sun, a vast globe of molten red, sank through an old-rose sky which slowly changed to a faint golden-green. For a moment it hung on the knife-edge of the world and then dipped down and was gone. Through the violet twilight, five gleaming, misty-white birds of an unearthly beauty, glorious trumpeter swans, flew across the western sky in strong, swift, majestic flight. As the shadows darkened like spilt ink, their clanging notes came down to the lonely drake. When the swans start south it is no time for lesser folk to linger. The night was aflame with its million candles as he sprang into the air, circled once and again, and followed southward the moon-path which lay like a long streamer of gold across the waste-lands. Night and day and day and night and night and day again, he flew, until, as he passed over the northwestern corner of Connecticut, that strange food sense, which a migrating bird has, brought him down from the upper sky into the one stretch of marshland that showed for miles around. It chanced to be close to the base of the Cobbie.—Samuel Scoville, in St. Nicholas.

Playthings for Kittens.

You purchase toys for girls and boys;
Perhaps you do not know
That kittens need some playthings, too;
But, listen, it is so!

We like some spools to roll about,
Some strings and things to catch;
Just tie a paper to one end
And hang it from the latch.

Please help us frolic, romp and chase;
Our wants are very small,
Though sometimes we would like the loan
Of your nice knitting ball.

—Florence Stirling Laight, in Christian Advocate.

Dogs of the Far North.

To those who are blessed with the benefits of modern transportation facilities it is hard to realize that there are parts of the continent where nature is so wild and rough that it is almost impossible for man to travel. In broad sections of the forest and mountain districts of Northern British Columbia this is particularly true, travel being possible in any season only to men on foot and to the most agile of animals. Horses or others of the usual beasts of burden can make no progress through the tangles of fallen timbers, swamps, rocks and jungle. Yet man's best friend has proven his ability again to come to the assistance of his master. In summer, spring and fall he is the pack-dog, bearing on his back such supplies as his master cannot carry; in winter he is the sled-dog, drawing the loaded sled. Dogs and men live on the game killed and on the essential tea and sugar and bacon carried in the packs.—Selected

The South's Best Book Store

HUNTER & CO

105 E. Broad Street
Richmond, Va.

Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen
Prompt and Reliable Service

SILK HOSE
DIRECT TO YOU

Saves you 25c to 60c a pair. Our leader—Ladies' full-fashioned, highest grade pure silk stockings, five-thread linen spliced heel and toe: $2.60 a pair, three pairs $6.00. Strongest and best wearing hosiery on the market. Money back if not satisfied.

Free Samples showing colors and quality of silk.

Write for these today with new descriptive Price List of our full line of Silk, Silk Lisle, Fibre Silk and Cotton hosiery for women, misses, men and children—all at our direct-to-you money-saving prices.

HARTLEY HOSIERY CO., Louisville, Ky.

NICK BULL'S MARKET,

Richmond's Leading Dealer in

FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME

312 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.

Phone Randolph 1680

WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

Spring Styles
NOW READY
Have Your Old Hat Fixed Like New

Many customers use their old hats by having them made over for their children. We specialize on children's hats.

PARCEL POST DEPARTMENT
AT YOUR SERVICE.

VERRA HAT WORKS
211 NORTH FIRST STREET
RANDOLPH 90

The Richmond Mica Co.

Oldest Ground Mica Factory in the World

Manufacturers of

GROUND MICA OF UNSURPASSED PURITY AND LUSTRE

BY EXCLUSIVE PROCESS

Factory, 321-323 S. Ninth St.
Office, Cor. Eighth and Main Sts.

RICHMOND, VA.

Central National Bank
Cor. 3d and Broad Sts., Richmond, Va.

Banking Hours-
Monday to Friday. ...9 A. M. to 2 P. M.
Saturday..... 9 A. M. to 2 P. M.
6 P. M. to 8 P. M.

3% Allowed on Savings Accounts

Leake Printing Co.
ENGRAVING, PRINTING, EMBOSSING.
Special attention to out-of-town orders.
Samples sent upon request.
615 East Main Street, Richmond, Va.

DISTANCE

Makes no difference to Berry patrons—our Mail Order Department can serve you anywhere; delivery free.

Write for our new catalogue of MEN'S and BOY'S CLOTHING.

The South's "Old Home" store with new blood and best values!

O. N. Berry Co.
ESTABLISHED 1879

Main and 11th Sts., Richmond, Va.

R. Geissler, Inc.
56 West Eighth Street, New York
Memorials
FOR THE CHURCH
Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

FAMINE RELIEF.

For the convenience of our readers we publish the addresses of the treasurers of the various Relief Funds whose appeals for the starving, and especially for starving children, are so urgent and touching. The Southern Churchman will forward contributions to any of these, but to save time, postage and possibility of miscarriage, checks would better be sent directly to the treasurers as below:

Near East Relief (formerly "Armenian and Syrian Relief")—Cleveland H. Dodge, No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York City.

European Relief (Central and Eastern Europe)—Franklin K. Lane, 42 Broadway, New York City; or locally for Virginia, Desoto Fitzgerald, 218 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.

Chinese Famine Relief—Remit through Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer. Presiding Bishop and Council, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

Acknowledgments.

Miss Maude Hill, Ivor, N. Y.....$5.00
Mrs. P. T. Hayne, Greenville, S. C..... 2.00

PIPE ORGANS

The purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID in building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York

SPECIAL NOTICE.

DON'T TRY ON YOUR NEW DRESSES over your old corset. Let us help you select and fit to you the corset that does greatest justice to your figure. The Corset Shop, 317 N. Fifth St. Mrs. A. J. Pyle, Prop. Phone Ran. 3397.

Doll Skirts Accordion Pleated Free. ASHBY B. PYLE, 315 N. 5th St. Hemstitching, Pinking and Button Covering.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER

Invites you to inspect her line of GAGE Tailored HATS. Also the ADVANCE Showing of Spring Hats in the most attractive shapes.
209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

NIAGARA METAL WEATHER STRIPS

Saves 25 per cent. Fuel, Prevents Rattling Windows, keeps out Dust, Dirt and Storm.

CINCINNATI REWIRABLE METAL AND WOOD FRAME SCREENS.
L. F. HEROLD,
2 N. 11th St., Richmond, Va.
Phone Randolph 3550.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon. Va., R. F. D. 2.

CATHEDRAL STUDIO, ENGLISH Church embroideries and materials. Stoles with crosses, $7; plain, $5.50; handsome gift stoles, $12 up; burse and veil, $15, $20. Surplices and exquisite altar linens. L. V. Mackrille, 2604 Thirty-sixth St., N. W., Washington, D. C. Tel. Chev. 1915.

SUMMER BOARDERS.

WANTED—IN BEAUTIFUL COUNTRY mansion, two and a quarter miles from University of Virginia, summer boarders. Address "E. C. G.," Rio, Albemarle County, Va.

CLERICAL SUPPLY.

WANTED—CLERICAL SUPPLY FOR ST. Paul's Church, Newport News, Virginia, months of June and July. Address Rev. H. G. Lane.

HELP WANTED

YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCATION AND refinement wanted to enter the St. John's Hospital Training School for Nurses (Episcopal), Brooklyn, N. Y. Applicants required to have one year of high school or its equivalent. Course three years. A registered school of high standing. Nurses receive remuneration. Many social privileges. Home life pleasant. Graduates are now receiving $6.00 per day. Apply to St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED—TO EMPLOY A CLERGYMAN as superintendent of small orphanage in North Carolina. Correspondence solicited. Address Rev. E. A. Penick, Jr., Charlotte, N. C.

WANTED—RELIABLE WHITE NURSE for two little girls. References required. Pleasant home for right party. Write Mrs. A. M. Tyree, 151 South Prospect Street, Hagerstown, Md.

SITUATIONS WANTED.

A LADY—CHURCHWOMAN WITH BEST references—wants position as traveling companion for all, or part of summer, on very reasonable terms. Address "T," Southern Churchman.

A YOUNG GIRL, HIGH SCHOOL GRADUate, desires a position for the summer months. Address "M.," care of Southern Churchman.

SUCCESSFUL TEACHER, FOND OF children, desires position to teach small children, or as companion to lady. A pleasant home the desideratum. References. Address, stating terms, "Teacher," Powhatan, Va., R. 1, Box 38-A.

YOUNG LADY OF REFINEMENT wishes position as companion or housekeeper in school. Best references. P. I., care Southern Churchman.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

Tarry: On February 27, 1921, HENRIETTA MARIA HAMILTON, widow of Samuel Tarry, of Ivy Hill, Mecklenburg County, and eldest daughter of Charles Hamilton and Jane Coleman. She was born in 1843 at "Nine Oaks," N. C., adjoining Burnside, the home of her grandfather, Patrick Hamilton, who came to America in 1807 from Burnside, Scotland. She was a member of the Episcopal Church from early girlhood, was deeply interested in all good works, and did what she could. She leaves three children, Charles Hamilton, Lucy Davis and Samuel Tarry.

"Blessed are the pure in spirit, for they shall see God."

Lee: Entered into rest at the home of his brother, Loxley Simkins Lee, in Philadelphia, March 3, 1921, GOODWIN LEE, aged sixty-four (real gentleman and scholar), first son of Major Baker P. Lee and his wife, Mary Esther Simkins. Interment in the Lee family lot in St. John's Church yard, Hampton, Va.

"To live in hearts we leave behind is not to die."

Carter: Entered into rest from her home at Haymarket, Va., on April 28, 1921, LUCY MEADE CARTER, beloved wife of the late Charles Shirley Carter and daughter of the late Ann Randolph Meade and Hugh Holmes Hite.

McIver: "Safe in the arms of Jesus," April 7, 1921, little MARIANNA IRVINE, fourth child of Mittie Hayne and Henry McIver. Born in Albany, N. Y., March 19th. Interment among many relatives in the beautiful church yard of Christ Church, Greenville, S. C.

"There's a home for little children
Above the bright blue sky,
Where Jesus reigns in glory,
A home of peace and joy,
No home on earth is like it,
Nor can with it compare;
For every one is happy,
Nor could be happier there."

MISS JENNY NELSON.

The death of this dear lady has brought sorrow to many. The daughter of the Rev. George W. Nelson, Sr., whose father had been General Washington's private secretary, and sister of the Rev. George W. Nelson, Jr., she grew up from early childhood at "Mont Air," in Hanover County, where, after her father's death, her mother had married Philip Nelson, Esq.

There, in a home of culture and refinement, among books and educated people, she grew to love all that was good. Graduated from the Virginia Female Institute (Stuart Hall), ever afterwards a faithful student, she became in some branches the most learned Virginia woman of her day. When her brothers were graduated from the University she was their equal in classical scholarship.

When the war ended, in which, like so many other women, she bore a noble part, she opened a school at her home and taught some of the best-known citizens of the Commonwealth. To them she was ever a devoted friend and the model of all that was charming. As teacher of Latin in Wellesley College, she matched the high standards of that institution. Resigning under the protest of the college authorities, that she might assist in the education of those dear to her, she attained a great measure of success and made learning loved for learning's sake.

Deeply religious from childhood, knowing the Bible thoroughly, living the life she taught, her sympathy with suffering humanity was a marked characteristic. The inmates of the jails were her especial charge. In 1865 she had built on the corner of the plantation, and taught the first negro school perhaps in the South. Wherever she was a colored Sunday school was her mission, and when laid to rest at the old Fork Church in St. Martin's Parish, where her Aunt Thomasia Meade (the Bishop's second wife) had also been buried, there was no more beautiful floral tribute than that sent more than a hundred miles by "her colored friends who loved her."

Free from fads and affectation, and enjoying in the fullest degree perfect health, her great intellect and lovely life of service and devotion cheered and gladdened all who came within its influence. In her eighty-fourth year, in the full possession of her wonderful mental faculties, overborne by a sudden attack which required the aid of a surgeon, this cheerful, happy woman, whose life had blessed so many, fell asleep in the sure confidence of a blessed immortality through the merits of the Saviour, Whom she had so faithfully followed and served.

A brother with whom she lived in Campbell County, Judge Frank Nelson, and many relatives and friends, survive to mourn their loss.

ROSEWELL PAGE.

Each day is a new life and an abridgement of the whole. I will so live as if I counted every day my first and my last: as if I began to live but then, and should live no more afterwards.—Bishop Hall.

---

not live to save them? He died for all, but "all" do not know it. Two of every three of the world's population live in lands where His love has never been told.—Homer-Dixon.

Absenting myself from the Holy Communion is a crime against my spiritual life for which I am accountable to Christ as well as to His Church.

If Jesus simply gave you life, and then left you to sink or swim, there can be no doubt what the issue would be.—W. G. Blaikie.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

(Continued from page 12)

at which she was a regular and devout attendant.

Mrs. Konkle was the mother-in-law of the Rev. Edward M. Duff, rector of St. James' Church, Grosse Ile, Mich., at whose home she died.

Holy Trinity Church, Manistee, Mich., the Rev. Dr. Wilkinson, rector, by the will of the late E. Golden Filer, millionaire lumberman, is the recipient of a legacy of $5,000. All the other religious and philanthropical societies of the city were likewise remembered. The Methodist and Congregational churches received $10,000 each; the Baptists, $5,000, and twelve other bodies, Danish, Swedish, German and Norwegian, $2,500.

F. O. G.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Duncan H. Brown, rector of Christ Church, New Brighton, Staten Island, N. Y., has accepted the call to become dean of St. John's Cathedral, Denver.

The Rev. R. Wyndham Brown has resigned the charge of Newton Parish, Front Royal, Va., to take effect May 31. Mr. Brown, having passed the age of retirement, will retire from the active work of the Church.

The address of the Rev. William Schouler is changed from 3507 Springdale Avenue to 2809 Mount Holly Street, Baltimore, Md.

The Rev. W. Russell Bowie, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, was elected a member of the Board of Trustees of the John F. Slater Fund, at the annual meeting held in New York last week. Dr. Bowie will fill the vacancy on the board caused by the death of Mr. Francis Lynde Stetson. Dr. James H. Dillard, of Charlottesville, was re-elected president.

The Rev. George McKinley has been appointed to take charge of St. Paul's Church, White Haven, Pa.

St. Stephen's Church, Wyandotte, Mich., has extended a call to the Rev. F. K. Hughes, of Paquette, Can., to succeed the Rev. E. N. McConomy, who resigned to accept a rectorship in the South. Mr. Hughes expects to arrive and assume his new duties on May 15.

The Rev. C. S. Sargent has found it necessary, on account of ill health, to resign the charge of Trinity Church, Marshall, Tex.

The Rev. Murray Bartlett, president of Hobart College, spoke at the commencement exercises of the Episcopal Church Normal School, of the Diocese of Long Island, on Wednesday, April 27.

The Rev. Arthur R. Price, rector of Grace Church, Monroe, La., has accepted the call to Genito Parish, Powhatan and Cumberland Counties, Diocese of Southern Virginia. Mr. Price took charge of this work the first of April.

The Rev. Francis Van R. Moore, rector of Trinity Church, Vineland, N. J., has been called to the rectorship of Nelson Parish, Jefferson County, W. Va.

The Rev. Wythe L. Kinsolving has completed six months of ministry at St. Paul's Church, Jackson, Mich., during the illness of the rector, the Rev. W. H. Poole. Mr. Kinsolving has served most successfully and the work of the church has progressed along all lines during these six months.

The Rev. Joseph Groves entered upon the rectorate of St. Clement's Church, Wilkes-Barre, Pa., on April 1.

The address of the Rev. Dr. W. T. Manning is changed from 4 Washington Square to Bishop's House, Amsterdam Avenue and One Hundred and Tenth Street, New York City.

The Rev. Edgar Jones, of Newfoundland, has accepted the call to St. Thomas' Church, Newark, Del., and will take charge about June 1. Newark is seat of the University of Delaware.

The Rev. George S. Southworth, of Worcester, Mass., has accepted a call to the rectorship of Holy Trinity Church, Harkwell, Cincinnati.

Bishop Talbot has appointed the Rev. J. A. Winterstein to head the Associate Mission of the Diocese, Leonard Hall, Bethlehem, Pa.

The Rev. Harold I. Fair has left Emmanuel Church School, Boston, where he has been assistant, and will become rector of St. Mary's Church, Reading, Pa., on June 1.

The Rev. Harmon C. St. Clair, for over twelve years curate of Holy Innocents' Church, Hoboken, N. J., has accepted the rectorship of St. Stephen's Church, Ferguson, Mo., and has taken up his new duties.

Ordinations.

On St. Mark's Day, April 25, Mr. Herbert E. Catlin was ordained to the diaconate in Mt. Calvary Church, Baltimore. The Rev. Herbert S. Hastings was the preacher. The Rev. William A. McClenthen, D. D., rector of the church, presented the candidate.

At the pro-cathedral, Baltimore, on May 1, St. Philips' and St. James' Day, Mr. Edmund L. Gettier and Mr. Victor S. Ross were ordained deacons. The Rev. W. Weir Gilliss presented Mr. Gettier; the Rev. W. B. McKinley, Mr. Ross. The preacher was the Rev. William Dunbar Gould, rector of Great Choptank Parish, Cambridge, Md., and

JUST READY

More "FIVE-MINUTE TALKS"

By Walter R. Bowie, D.D.

SUNNY WINDOWS

Author of "The Children's Year"

AND OTHER SERMONS

Here is another volume of Dr. Bowie's talks to youngsters, all attractively suited to the child mind. The subjects are arresting themes, calculated to almost invariably catch the attention of boy or girl—while the treatment thereof is simplicity itself.

As the Record of Christian Work said: "Dr. Bowie's talks are capital—straight to the hearts of children, clever, interesting, helpful."

Cloth, $1.25 net

For Sale by

Southern Churchman Co., Richmond, Va.

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor

Richmond, Va.

formerly rector of Holy Trinity Church, Baltimore.

An ordination of unusual interest occurred at St. Paul's Church, Norfolk, on the morning of the First Sunday after Easter, when Mr. Robert McDonad Kirkland, of the Theological Seminary in Virginia, was ordained to the diaconate by Bishop Tucker. The Rev. Bland Tucker, of Lawrenceville, Mr. Kirkland's classmate at the Seminary, presented the candidate. The Rev. Dr. Green, of the Theological Seminary, preached the ordination sermon. Three other classmates were present. The Rev. Dr. Covington, rector of St. Paul's, took part in the service.

Mr. Kirkland was transferred to Southern Virginia from the Diocese of New Jersey, and has been assigned to the four churches at Surry, Dendron, Wakefield and Waverly, and expects to take charge of this interesting field in June.

On Thursday, April 28, 1921, the Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, Bishop of Bethlehem, ordained to the diaconate at St. Mark's Church, Dunmore, Mr. Jacob Ashton Winterstein, presented by the rector, the Rev. E. A. Heim. The Rev. W. B. Beach preached the sermon.

In St. Luke's Church, Rochester, N. Y., Raymond H. Fuller was recently ordained to the diaconate by the Rt. Rev. David L. Ferris, Suffragan Bishop of Western New York. The Rev. Samuel Tyler presented the candidate, the Rev. William C. Compton read the Litany, and the Rev. Frederick C. Lee read the Epistle. Bishop Ferris preached the sermon. Mr. Fuller is a graduate of Cornell University, 1911, and a senior at the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge.

Deaths.

The Rev. Dr. George F. Breed, retired, died April 18 at his home in Mt. Airy, Philadelphia, after a long illness. He was seventy-two years old. Bishop Rhinelander officiated at the funeral Wednesday morning in Grace Church, Mt. Airy.

The Rev. G. F. G. Hoyt, for fourteen years rector of St. Paul's, Columbia, died suddenly April 18, 1921, aged fifty-four.

Funeral services for the Rev. Edward J. d'Argent, a non-parochial priest of the Diocese of South Dakota, were held on Monday afternoon, March 14, in St. Thomas' Church, Sturgis, S. D., by Bishop Remington and the Rev. William R. Campbell, and interment was at the cemetery there.

The Rev. Francis F. Rice entered into life eternal on Thursday, April 7, 1921, at his home, Montour Falls, N. Y., in the eighty-third year of his age.

The Rev. George N. Eastman, rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Walnut Hills, Cincinnati, for twenty-two years, and rector-emeritus of the same parish eight years, died April 20 in his home in that suburb, aged seventy-one years.

The Rev. Charles Hamilton Brown, minister in charge of Christ Church, Mandan, N. D., died on April 8, at the Deaconess' Hospital, Mandan, after a brief illness of pneumonia. The funeral was on April 11 from Christ Church, with interment at Mandan Cemetery. The burial service was read by Bishop Tyler, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. C. G. Fox, Thomas Dewhurst, H. H. Welsh and Alexander Coffin.

The Best of the New Things for Springtime

In the enthusiastic seeking of "lower prices" which seems to have become so general during recent months, there is danger, we think, of overstepping the bounds of true economy and mistaking the cheap and tawdry for the low-in-price.

This is one reason why you will find a visit to this store particularly helpful at this time, in fulfilling your plans for the new season.

No unworthy goods may find a place among the stocks, and we think you may safely rely upon our taste and good judgment in selection.

And while everything here is of the same high, dependable quality that has always been characteristic at MILLER & RHOADS, prices are now materially lower.

To-day the store is gaily decked out in its spring-time dress, splendidly ready to serve your every need, whether for articles of apparel and personal adornment or for the home.

Miller & Rhoads

"The Shopping Center" Richmond, Va.

Unwise Handling of Money

There are still some people who either thoughtlessly or deliberately keep their money in secret places of their own, trying to protect it themselves instead of keeping it where money belongs, namely, in a strong bank.

The National State and City Bank—for over half a century a progressive Bank of the South—invites your accounts, small or large.

National State and City Bank

1111 E. Main Street, - - Richmond, Va.

HICKORY HILL DAHLIA FARM

QUALITY DAHLIA

Box 227-C, Richmond, Va

Send for a Catalogue

HOT WATER HEAT

For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars

ARCOLA SYSTEM

R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.

9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

Service

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE

CARPETS DRAPERIES

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health and, above all,

Provide yourself with Travelers Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank

Richmond, Virginia

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS

FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG

S. T. Beveridge & Co

Office: 1217 East Cary Street

Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd

Richmond, Va.

R. L. Christian & Company

514-16 E. Broad St.

Richmond, Va.

Leading Fancy Grocer

AGENTS FOR

PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.

Catalogue mailed on application.

Not Merely

a counting house, but a people's bank and a useful servant in this community.

We believe that it is the duty of any company which serves the public to be a builder of good will in its community, and that its success depends upon the efficiency of its service.

3% interest on savings and dormant accounts. Interest figured on daily balances.

Irrespective of its size, we invite your account.

Richmond Trust Company

Capital and Surplus, $1,200,000

Main and 7th Streets

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary
J. M. Leake, General Agent

E. B. Addison, Vice-President
J. C. Watson, Treasurer
Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

You Can Send Your Boy or Girl to Any College in This State

At but small sacrifice to yourself through our "COLLEGE PLAN"

Ask or write for booklet

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK

Tenth and Main Sts. Richmond, Virginia

"The Bank with the Three Doors of Opportunity"

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

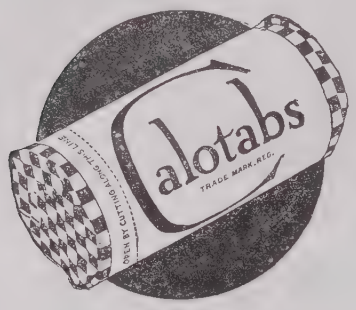
W. Fred. Richardson
Security Storage Company, Inc.

Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage

Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 843

Cuticura Soap Clears the Skin and Keeps it Clear

Soap, Ointment, Talcum, 25c. everywhere. Samples free of Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. V, Malden, Mass



O. Luetke's Art Works

Church Furnishings

IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.

Est. 1886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

Renew your health by purifying your system with

Quick and delightful relief for biliousness, colds, constipation, headaches, and stomach, liver and blood troubles.

The genuine are sold only in 35c packages. Avoid imitations.

Spring and Summer Suits $25 to $50

They are Suits made to hold their own against any competition. They are the best values offered for a long time. Examine their woolens, their skillful workmanship, their style, and you'll need no further encouragement for a selection.

Shoes, Hats,

Furnishings,

and Boys' Clothes.

Mail orders solicited.

Horace S. Wright Co.

Broad at First,

RICHMOND, VA.

Johnson's Foot Soap

(On market for over fifty years)

Made of Borax, Iodine and Bran, is a sure and safe relief for those tired, aching, tender swollen, burning that have been causing you so much pain. 25c, ALL DRUGGISTS. If unobtainable at your druggist, sent direct on receipt of price.

FEET

Thomas Gill Soap Co.

711-719 Kent Ave., Brocklyn, New York

Stevens Anti-Ameb'c Dentifrice

For Prevention and Treatment of PYORRHOEA OR RIGG'S DISEASE

Guaranteed to contain 3% fluid extract of Ipecac

Price, 50c per Tube, Postage Paid

Stevens Medical Mfg. Co.

e717 Knt Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

LADIES. HELP SCATTER THE SUNSHINE by selling Christmas Cards. I am now ready to take orders for my 1921 Christmas book. Easy way to raise money. No investment and splendid profits for your society. For particulars write MRS. C. W. UPSON, 234 West Park Ave., Mansfield, O.

STAMMERING CAN BE CURED

YOUR MONEY BACK IF NOT SATISFIED

First case, boy 11 years old, bad stammerer, cured in three weeks. Last case, boy 20 years old, had to write what he wanted to say, cured in two weeks. Names furnished on request. Anybody can be cured. Write for booklet and references.

SCHOOL FOR STAMMERERS, Tyler, Texas

THE BEST ANTHOLOGY OF SACRED VERSE

The New Hymnal with words only follows the Prayer Book in its literary standards, arrangement and historic development.

Full provision has been made for varied needs of devotional expression. Out of this book all types of parishes should find the expression of their praise.

Beautifully bound in blue cloth, matching the Prayer Book in size and appearance.

Price, 40 Cents a Copy

THE NEW HYMNAL

With Words Only

Published by the

CHURCH PENSION FUND

14 Wall Street, New York

The Evangelical Education Society Of the Protestant Episcopal Church

Office: The Church House, Twelfth and Walnut Streets, Philadelphia

AIDS STUDENTS FOR THE MINISTRY AND DISTRIBUTES EVANGELICAL LITERATURE

President: WILLIAM S. HARVEY, ESQ.

Active Vice-President: The Rt. Rev. THOMAS J. GARLAND, D. D.

General Counsel HAROLD GOODWIN, Esq. Treasurer ALFRED LEE, Esq. General Secretary Rev. S. LORD GILBERSON, M A.

FORM OF BEQUEST

I give and bequeath to "THE EVANGELICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH," incorporated by the legislature of Pennsylvania, the first Monday in November, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine, ———— dollars, or ———— real estate, to be used for the general purpose of the Society

CHURCH PEWS

PULPIT FURNITURE

SUNDAY SCHOOL CHAIRS, BLACKBOARDS, ETC.

Virginia School Supply Company

2010-12 West Marshall Street, Richmond, Va.

Southern Churchman

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., MAY 14, 1921. No. 20.

A Prayer to the Holy Spirit

Stay, gentle spirit, stay!
Keep near me, close beside!
'Tis easy here to stray,
The world is wide.

Strange paths oft cross our own,
We know not where they lead,
Oh, leave me not alone,
'Tis thee I need.

Stay, gentle spirit, stay!
The distance is not far
Where lies that silent way
Vnd shadows are.

Soon I shall enter there
And light no longer see;
Hear Thou my last low prayer,
And comfort me.

Geo. Henry Spease

EDUCATIONAL

SEWANEE MILITARY ACADEMY

53rd year. In an ideal spot, heart of the Cumberland mountains, 2,000 feet elevation. College preparatory; also equips for citizenship. Military instruction secures regularity, neatness, respect, promptitude. Student body are boys of character who are developed into manly men of purpose. 40-acre added domain. Vigorous outdoor life; all athletics R. O. T. C. Episcopal. Early registration advisable. Catalog. Address The Principal, Sewanee, Tenn.

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to
REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean
Petersburg, Va.

The Virginian Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-third year of this School for Boys opens September 15, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

The Divinity School of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Philadelphia.

Founded by Bishop Alonzo Potter in 1862.

Special students admitted. Privilege of attending course of special study at the University of Pennsylvania.

For information address the Rev. George G. Bartlett, S. T. D., Dean, 5904 Woodland Avenue.

Virginia, Chatham. Box 13.

The Chatham Episcopal Institute for Girls

Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Thorough preparation for all colleges. New buildings. Ten-acre campus. Athletics. Gymnasium. Terms moderate. Catalogue and views.

B. D. Tucker, D. D., President; Rev. C. O. Pruden, D. D., Rector; Miss Annie Marian Powell, A. B., Sweet Briar, A. M., Columbia, Prin.

St. Christopher's School

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND, VA.

A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.

Eleventh session begins September 21, 1921. Tuition in boarding department, limited to twenty-two boys, $650. For catalogue, address

REV. C. G. CHAMBERLAYNE, PH. D., HEADMASTER

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

They conquer who believe they can.—Virgil.

There is no such person as an idle Christian.

A Christian life is the most commanding pulpit.

To find a dozen faults is easier than to mend one.

A man who yells at the top of his voice seldom wins an argument.

Having a little rightly used brings better returns than having more poorly used.

God never disturbs the joy of His children but to prepare them for one more certain and durable.—Manzoni.

Only to trust, and do our best, and wear as smiling a face as may be, for others and ourselves.—Robert Louis Stevenson.

The community of confession before we go to the Lord's table has a quickening influence on us all, and strengthens us in the assurance of our cleansing.

Blessed are the happiness makers. Blessed are they who know how to shine on one's gloom with their cheer. —Henry Ward Beecher.

Who is thy neighbor? It is the sufferer, wherever, whoever, whatsoever he be. Wherever thou hearest the cry of distress, wherever thou seest any one brought across thy path by the changes of life (that is, by the providence of God), whom it is in thy power to help—he, stranger or enemy though he be—he is thy neighbor.—A. P. Stanley.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,

REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.

A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. College preparatory. Boarding department 503 W. Franklin Street. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health; out-door life.

MISS ROSALIE H. NOLAND, Principal

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLES TOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

HOBART COLLEGE For Men
William Smith College for Women

GENEVA, N. Y.

100th Year Opens September 20, 1921

Hobart offers a large number of scholarships to students preparing for Holy Orders.

RT. REV. CHARLES H. BRENT, D. D., LL. D., CHANCELLOR

RET. MURRAY BARTLETT, D. D., PRESIDENT

For information address the President

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

The Ninety-ninth Session Open Wednesday, September 21, 1921

For catalogs and other information, address The Dean, Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia.

ST. MARY'S

AN EPISCOPAL SOUTHERN SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

Founded 1842. Four-year preparatory and two-year collegiate courses. Music, Art, Elocution, Domestic Science, Business. Gymnasium. Mild climate makes outdoor life possible the year round. 25-acre campus of old oaks. Fourteen electrically lighted, steam-heated buildings. Moderate rates. Catalog.

REV. WARREN W. WAY, RECTOR
Box 19, ST. MARY'S SCHOOL, RALEIGH, N. C.

ST. ANNE'S SCHOOL

Boarding and Day School for Girls under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. Charlottesville, Virginia. Location healthful and beautiful. General and College Preparatory Courses. Music and Art. Intermediate and Primary. Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Pres.; Rev. W. R. Mason, Rector

Third term begins April 1st. Catalogue sent on request.

(Miss) EMMA YERBY, Principal.
Charlottesville, Va.

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to

REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D.,
Rector

EDUCATIONAL

FAUQUIER INSTITUTE

FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES WARRENTON, VA.

The 62nd session begins September 29, 1921. Situated in Piedmont region of Virginia, 55 miles from Washington. A limited and thorough home school. Modern buildings, 5-acre campus. Catalog.

MISS NELLIE V. BUTLER, PRINCIPAL, BOX 17

Have You Selected Your School?

Enrollments are now being made for the ensuing school year. Many institutions already have a waiting list. If you find it difficult to make a choice, the Southern Churchman will be glad to assist you. Address

Southern Churchman School Bureau
815 East Grace St.
Richmond, Va.

"The Store That Pleases"

FOR FURNITURE

JONES BROS. & CO.

INCORPORATED

1418 East Main St. :-: Richmond, Va

The Norfolk Convention

Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States
The thirty-sixth annual national gathering of clergy and laity of the Church

NORFOLK, VA.

Wednesday to Sunday, October 12 to 16, 1921
The first convention in the South since 1914

The program and speakers will be announced later
For information, address

BROTHERHOOD OF ST. ANDREW
CHURCH HOUSE, 202 SOUTH 19TH STREET
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

The Latest Translation Most Exact — The Coming Version Consistent Incomparable

The Concordant

VERSION OF THE SACRED SCRIPTURES
(Two Parts Ready)

Revelation, 75c; Ephesians-Philemon, 75c with Notes, $1 each
Subscribe Now

CONCORDANT PUB. CONCERN, LOS ANGELES, CAL

No man in daily life ought to be satisfied with what his life now is. He ought every day to be looking forward to some of the possible improvements. —E. E. Hale.

They live with us, the deeds that we have done,
Become a part of heart
And being and of brain,
Woven among the past with subtile thread,
A power of possibility for joy or pain.

We are quick to criticize, and criticism has its own place in life; we are slow to cheer, and therein we waste one of the resources of power given to us by God, and we lower the temperature of life. Believe me, men and women round us are hungering and thirsting for a friendly world and a kindly greeting, and I care not whether they be high or low, they would count it a benediction.—John Watson.

Thou Who bestowest sevenfold grace
Evermore replenish us.
As the wind is Thy symbol
So forward our goings.
As the Dove,
So launch us heavenwards.
As Water
So purify our spirits.
As a Cloud
So abate our temptations.
As Dew
So revive our languor.
As Fire
So purge out our dross.
—Christina Rossetti.

Surrender is what we may call the human side of faith. We cannot surrender to Christ till we have faith in Him, nor can we believe that His grace is sufficient until we have yielded to Him completely. Christ is able to meet every need of the life under the one condition that the life be put into His hands. His grace is sufficient because His power is made perfect in weakness. So long as there is a conviction that self has some strength there will not be the surrender, and the grace of Christ is hindered. Full surrender is testimony to the fact that we are weak, utterly helpless to control the life. The right place for self is at the bottom. Surrender is not the annihilation of self, but putting self into the control of the One Who alone can regulate the life that He has created.—C. G. Trumbull.

Sacramental Wine

Absolutely Pure Grape Wine

Made expressly for use at the Communion Table

Established 1857

Phone, Write or Call
Tel. Cortlandt 3001

H. T. Dewey & Sons Co.

Address Either
138 Fulton Street, New York City
or Cellars, Egg Harbor, New Jersey

SUMMER CAMPS

The growing popularity of camps for young people attests the benefit to mind and body of open air and well regulated exercise. Select your camp now. The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN will help you to make a choice.

CAMP NAVAJO FOR GIRLS

7-16 years. On beautiful Lake Thompson, Maine. (Via Bar Harbor exp. from New York, one night.) Rate $200 (no extras). Mid pines and birches on hill sloping down to lake. Full program of water and land sports taught by experienced councillors. Handicraft, folk and interpretative dancing. Excellent food. Physician and nurse. Catalog. Register before June 1st. CLARA HENDERSON, Dir., 1530 Linden Ave., Baltimore, Md.

CAMP JUNALUSKA,
LAKE JUNALUSKA, N. C.

The finest "all-around" camp in the South for girls, near Asheville, in the "Land of the Sky." Girls from eighteen States and two foreign countries last season. July 6 to August 31. Send for illustrated booklet. Miss Ethel J. McCoy, Virginia Intermont College, Bristol, Va.

Trail's End

The Kentucky Camp for Girls
Write for Booklet

MISS M. D. SNYDER
363 S. BROADWAY
LEXINGTON, KY.

Many pens have attempted to write a Life of Christ since Canon Farrar wrote his famous volume. The difficulty with most of them is that they give so much attention to technical details they do not hold the interest of the general reader. For some time there has been need of a book that would make its appeal through its clearness and charm of treatment.

This need has now been filled by

PATERSON-SMYTH'S
NEW BOOK

A PEOPLE'S LIFE OF CHRIST

Told in a way that will be read again and again for the solid enjoyment it affords.

The Churchman says: "A book which the average man will read for the pleasure of reading it—a new and popular version for the day and generation."

ONLY $3.50 NET
THE SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO
RICHMOND, VA.

Jno. L. Williams & Sons

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565)
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds

Earn Extra Dollars in Your Spare Hours

You need no experience to be successful—You can learn as you earn. Let us tell you about our plan.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN is the oldest Episcopal Church Paper published in America. Every dollar received in subscriptions will be devoted to the improvement of the paper and the extension of its service in the work of the Church.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

Street.....

Have You Made Your Will?

See G. Jeter Jones, Vice-President, about this now. All conferences confidential. Phone or write for appointment.

Merchants National Bank

11th and Main Streets, Richmond, Va.

"SAFEST FOR TRUSTS"

The Incas of Peru

had no equivalent to our modern safe deposit vault, so their treasures were looted by the rapacious followers of Pizarro.
Don't keep your valuables where they can be stolen, burned, or lost.

An individual box in our new steel vault will assure perfect protection.

PLANTERS NATIONAL BANK

Main and 12th Streets, Richmond, Va.

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor
Richmond, Va.

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS

Largest stock in the South
We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival
The Couper Marble Works
(Established 65 years)
264-268 Bank St., Norfolk, Va

J. & K. Lamb
23-25-27 SIXTH AVENUE NEW YORK
MEMORIALS IN STAINED GLASS
MOSAIC · MARBLE · STONE · GRANITE
CARVED · WOOD · METAL · ETC.

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., MAY 14, 1921. No. 20.

THE BAPTISM OF FIRE

With the coming of Whitsunday there should awake in the minds of Christian people one clear remembrance from the past, and one supreme question for today. On Whitsunday the spirit of power came upon the Church. To the baptism of water was added the baptism of flame. Christians who had received the knowledge of their Master were given the inner gift of the Holy Spirit that they might live His life with overcoming strength.

Today, as in those days at the beginning, the Church needs power. We do not lack for knowledge. We do not lack, either, for the things of this world that ordinarily are accounted the materials of power. We have among our people ability and influence. We have the accumulated prestige of the centuries of organized Christendom. We have wealth. But what we need is the flaming baptism of tremendous purpose which will set all these latent energies free in irresistible expression.

In order that this power may come upon us, we must first of all desire it. That means that we must look upon the facts of our world that cry for a Christianity made effective. The trouble with many of us is that our church loyalty tends to become an absorption with small routine and trivial particularities so that though we may be "good churchmen," we are, in the crusading meaning of that word, very ineffective Christians. We tend to become satisfied if our congregations seem reasonably successful in their small enterprises—if bills are paid, and the pews fairly well filled on Sunday, and the choir singing well, and everybody comfortable. But when we lift our eyes and see the fields white with harvest, when we think of all the mighty service that might be rendered in the world today by a Christian Church really on fire with the ideals of Jesus, we cannot be satisfied with pettiness, but we cry for a strength that shall make us measure up to the Master's purpose. The reason so much of our industry is hard and pagan, and our international relationships still are governed mostly by motives of barbarians, is because we have not sufficiently either dreamed or desired the application in power of the ideals of Jesus to the problems of the whole of life.

When we do begin to desire the power of a vital Christianity, we shall begin to feel, as we said last week, the pitifulness of our Christian divisions. The Christian Church will never be the mighty army which we sing of until we can say in truth that > "We are not divided,

> All one body we."

The challenge of Whitsunday could lead to no finer result than to make us all consider with prayerful earnestness the lamentable fact of our Christian divisions, and the hope of bringing these to an end. We should like to believe that every reader of these words might study the three books which have been reviewed in the Southern Churchman—two of them, "Christian Unity, Its Principles and Possibilities," and "The Call to Unity," reviewed this week; the other, "The Problem of Christian Unity," reviewed a week ago. If the message of these books came home to Christian consciences, we should have the atmosphere of a great desire into which the tongues of flame might come with heavenly power.

THE LAW OF THE SABBATH

Several letters have lately come to our desk indicating misunderstanding or perplexity in regard to this subject, and one, at least, asking specifically "whether the Church considers the Fourth Commandment now binding." The subject is, of course, too wide for comprehensive treatment in this place, but a few considerations thereon may prove suggestive.

The Fourth Commandment, in its essential character, is no exception to that moral law applicable alike to Jew and Gentile, "written on their hearts, their conscience bearing witness therewith," of which the Ten Commandments are an epitome. This may be seen, we think, if we turn back to that wonderful "Hymn of Creation" as it has been well called with which our Bible opens. It is a tragedy that this piece has been marred, and its meaning almost obliterated for the ordinary reader, by an arbitrary division between chapters which runs through the midst of it, cutting off the conclusion and climax from the rest of the sacred poem and attaching it, as part of chapter 2, to another document altogether which begins with chapter 2, verse 4. This story of creation and its meaning runs through the third verse of the second chapter of Genesis, and forms the introduction to that book of "Generations" and to the whole Bible. It contains, not a modern scientific account of the creation (which would have been meaningless at the time of its composition and probably would be almost as meaningless today), but a marvellously concise and logical presentation of the fundamental facts upon which all religion is based. God, the One original and supreme, in Whom all powers subsist, author and Father of all things, working by methods of progress and development, created Man in His image and after His likeness (with spiritual, in addition to his animal, endowment and faculties), and so not only His creature but His child, providing for his social nature also, to subdue, enjoy and have dominion over the physical creation, therefore not to be dominated by it, but to grow up like his Father, as the plant or the animal grow "after their kind," and to this end, by example and precept as a Father should, God appointed for him and gave him a recurring Day of Rest which He blessed as well as hallowed for his use. So the inspired poem culminates in its seventh stanza.

The unspoiled religious instincts even of primitive man could not fail to interpret the intent of this sacred institution of the sabbath-rest nor its consonance with the facts of his own nature. It told him that while his world-work was appointed to him he was not to be enslaved by it—he should have his "day off" and still not fail to win and maintain his mastery over material things. It broke in upon his work-day routine lest by force of habit he become too engrossed in the inferior things of life. It insured for him the necessary element of time both for physical recuperation and for the exercise of religion. It was divinely "blessed and hallowed" for worship and communion with God and the cultivation of the spiritual. He would realize that "the Sabbath was made for man" by the Maker of man, as a necessary provision for his needs and both an incentive and an answer to his spiritual aspirations as a child of God.

Long after a fallen world in its fleshly wisdom had forgotten God the tradition of the Sabbath day lingered, at least in some parts; though its highest significance was not recognized, save perhaps by a small remnant who preserved the sacred history of their race, of whom the family of Abraham was representative. The land of Egypt, however, so far as discovery has gone, knew nothing of such a beneficent institution, and its religion therefore was peculiarly materialistic and degrading. Doubtless to the Israelites during the centuries of their sojourn there, and particularly during the long years of cruel bondage, the Sabbath had become little more than a tradition and its uses were forgotten. Immediately after their deliverance, however, its observance was enjoined upon them as a national ordinance, and, very significantly, in connection with a divine provision for their daily bread. When they went forth to gather the manna on the first day that it fell in the wilderness they were bidden to gather an omer for each person, that being sufficient for a day's supply. Of course in gathering it far afield and in sufficient measure for a whole household they could only guess at the exact quantity secured; but when they came home and measured it up they found that each had just the omer required. "He that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack." So it went for five days; but on the sixth day, either because the manna was much more plentiful and they were advised what to do, or, as some think, not without reason, because it was miraculously increased in their hands, it measured up two omers to a person. And Moses explained that this was Jehovah's word to them that "Tomorrow is a solemn rest, a holy sabbath unto Jehovah," and commanded a continued observance of the seventh day of rest, promising God's provision that they should not be the losers thereby. It was their first lesson in the fundamental principle, "Man doth not live by bread only, but by everything that proceedeth out of the mouth of Jehovah doth man live." Note that this was not the institution of the Sabbath, but a re-institution of its observance by this peculiar people of God. Moreover, it fixed the day in their calendar which should be recognized by them as the "seventh day"; namely, the seventh day after the manna began to be given as Jehovah's pledge of His care and provision for them as His Covenant people.

A little later (see Exodus 31:12-17) a very strict law of Sabbath observance was incorporated in the national code of Israel and was reinforced with the severest penalties. The Sabbath was peculiarly "a perpetual covenant," a "sign" between them and Jehovah, a token and acknowledgement that God had sanctified or set them apart for Himself and they had accepted this covenanted distinction; so that a disregard of this day and its sanctions was distinctly a violation of the covenant, an act of disloyalty and high treason punishable with death. So it was considered by the prophets. In the time of our Lord the Sabbath law was, by many, considered "the first commandment of the law," and was hedged about with so many artificial and burdensome regulations that its real significance was quite obscured.

To this Jewish law as such we, as Gentile Christians, are under no obligations. But it deserves our reverential study that we may be the more impressed with the dignity, the purpose and the supreme importance of the original institution of the Seventh Day of Rest, the observance of which is of such universal application and necessity that it was incorporated in the code of moral law which we know as the Ten Commandments proclaimed from Sinai. But these did not originate then or there. They had been impressed upon the very constitution of man from his beginnings as the conditions of his well-being and progress religiously and socially. Always experience has borne witness to their necessity and reason has testified to their righteousness, the Fourth Commandment with the rest. That, too, is needful if man is to attain his spiritual statue, to fulfil his duty to himself and to God and, in so doing, to his neighbor also. As it stands in the first table of the law it is emphatically a part of that law which the Master came not to destroy, but to fulfil, and which we are assured shall never pass away. Those, therefore, if any there be, who speak of the Fourth Commandment having been "read out of the Decalogue," or not being of force for Christian people, have utterly mistaken its meaning and the teachings of our Lord.

The Christian Church among the Gentiles has from its beginnings kept the first day of the old Jewish week, the day of its birth and of its baptism by the Holy Ghost, as its Seventh-day of Rest or of Sabbath (Cessation). This fills the requirement of the Commandment, viz.: that it shall follow six days of labor. It is peculiarly fitting also, since it adds to all former associations and meanings attached to this day the memorial of the resurrection, the completion of our redemption and the pledge of that "sabbath-rest that remaineth for the people of God." The civil government also, so far as it speaks on the subject, and by common consent the community in general, recognizes Sunday as our day of rest.

How, then, shall the Christian "keep" his Sunday, and the Fourth Commandment?

To lay down minute rules and hard and fast limitations as of general application is as futile here as it would be in regard to the Fifth Commandment or the First, though, wisely made, they are useful in the household for the guidance of children and formation of their habits, and the mature Christian will have certain established rules to govern his own conduct. There are, however, three words indicative of the Divine purpose which ought to go far in determining the proper observance of the day.

The Day of Rest is "given" to us, not imposed upon or required of us. It was "made for man." It should not be lightly esteemed or disposed of as a gift of no value, but be received gratefully and spent in accord with the spirit of the Giver.

It was, above other days, "blessed" of God and "hallowed"; to be a blessing to His people and to further their holiness. It should be regarded not with superstition, yet not without a feeling of its sacredness, and so spent that God may be glorified and worshipped, our own souls be refreshed, strengthened and enlightened and the world about us be made better, purer and happier by whatever means and opportunities may be given us.

"ANXIETY OR CARE?"

It is human to be "anxious," or, as we say, to worry. The person who has never woried is deficient in the sense of responsibility. Anxiety disappears as we approach that higher conception of life which rests in the belief that amid all its changes and chances God does "care," and that a wisely ordered plan is part of His loving purpose for us. Our strength is in quietness and in confidence. So, if by nature we are subject to anxiety, if freedom from anxiety comes only as we approach the Divine, then we should understand as best we can what it means to cast upon God all our anxiety. Does it not mean such a habit of living as can come only through constant practice in the little things of life as well as the big? We are creatures of habit, and with reason we speak of its force. More processes in life are habitual. Without this power we would make little progress. Sometimes we overlook the fact that it is just as easy to form good habits as it is to form evil ones. The apostle admonishes us to form the good habit of getting rid of our anxiety by casting it "all" upon God. Life is a discipline; we are in school; we have a lesson to learn, of which this is a part, and which takes both time and practice; and the goal for which we strive is a Christ-like character.—Bishop D. L. Ferris.

Book Notices

Great Leaders of Hebrew History From Manasseh to John the Baptist. By Henry Thatcher Fowler. Macmillan Company, New York. Price $2.50.

This book, by the professor of Biblical Literature and History, in Brown University, is the third of a series of volumes made up each one of short biographical studies of leaders in successive periods of human history. As the preface by the general editor of the series states, "These books aim to meet the needs of moral and religious secondary education. Adolescence is preeminently the period of idealism. . . . Most biographies of great leaders appeal strongly to the adolescent. . . . The Great Leaders' series will include a large number of volumes devoted to the study of some of the greatest moral and spiritual leaders of the race. Although designed primarily for use in the class-room, they will serve admirably the purposes of a general course of reading in biography for youth."

The present volume contains studies of the kings, prophets and statesmen in the history of Israel from the time of Manasseh through the rest of the period of the Jewish nation, including the great struggle under the Maccabees, down to the time of the coming of the Romans and the period of Herod the Great. The style is simple and interesting, and the thread of Jewish history is linked with the history of the rest of the world in a way that should excite the imagination and lead to wider study.

B.

Christian Unity, Its Principles and Possibilities. By the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook. Association Press, New York. Price $2.85.

This book is the fourth volume in the series of reports issued by the committee of able leaders from many associated Churches who, while America was at war, were constituted by the joint action of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, and the General Wartime Commission of the Churches "to consider the state of religion as revealed or affected by the war, with special reference to the duty and opportunity of the Churches, and to prepare these findings for submission to the Churches." As the editorial preface in the present volume states: "The peculiar significance of the Committee lies in the fact that it was appointed to do nothing except to study. It has proceeded on the assumption that the Churches need to do serious thinking and to think together."

Previously there have been in this same series of reports volumes on "Religion Among American Men," "The Missionary Outlook in the Light of the War," and "The Church and Industrial Reconstruction." For those who have read these former issues, it will be enough to say that the present volume under review maintains the extraordinarily high standard already set. It is an extensive survey of the facts in our present Christian world which bear upon the hope for Christian unity, authoritative in the accuracy of its statement, clearly written well arranged, and admirable in its catholic emphasis upon those things which belong to our common Christianity, rather than upon its divisions.

After the introduction, which is written by Professor William Adams Brown, of Union Seminary, New York, the book is divided into three parts. Part One deals with "The Present Situation," and under this heading there is a chapter by Dr. Robert E. Speer, on "The War and Christian Unity," a long chapter divided into sub-sections, written by representatives of the different communions of Christendom, on "The Present Situation in the Denominations," a third chapter on "The Present Status of Local Co-operation," a fourth on "The Present Situation in the Church as a Whole," and a fifth on "Present Problems in the Movement Toward Union."

Part Two deals with "The Historical Background," surveying the forces that made, on the one hand, for division, and on the other for unification, in the Christian Church prior to the American period, the development of the denominations in American Christianity, undenominational movements in America, and inter-denominational movements.

Part Three deals with "The Future," and a discussion of the principles which underlie further progress.

In the Appendices is a chapter on "Movements Toward Union in Other Countries," "The Plan of the American Council on Organic Union," "The Lambeth Statement on Reunion," an account of "The Geneva Conferences in 1920," and a selected bibliography.

Every thoughtful Christian who feels the weakness and inefficiency of our present divided Christendom, who wants to see a better reorganization of the army of Christ, and who wonders whether this desire is only an impossible dream or whether there is hope of its realization, should read this book and take courage. It sets forth with clear truthfulness the obstacles, past and present, in the way of Christian union, but it is, nevertheless, full of the fine optimism of a belief in spiritual powers in Christendom capable of grappling with the task of its larger consolidation. "We desire to record the conviction," say the committee of men who are responsible for this book, "which has been formed in us as a result of this investigation, that the movement toward union is an irresistible movement. It may be delayed; it cannot be permanently checked."

B.

The Call to Unity. By William T. Manning. The Macmillan Company, New York. Price $2.

This small volume of 162 pages is another valuable contribution to the number of books which have recently been published on the subject of Christian unity. It is a happy index to the living quality of this whole question that books upon it are thus multiplying.

As the author of the original resolution, eleven years ago, which called for the appointment by our General Convention of the Commission to prepare for a World Conference on Faith and Order, Dr. Manning has long been known as a deeply interested advocate of Christian reunion. The fact that the World Conference is now an assured development is an achievement the honor for which Dr. Manning and the indefatigable secretary, Mr. Robert H. Gardiner, share between them.

The present book of Dr. Manning's is made up of four chapters on these subjects: The Call to Unity, The Present Outlook for Unity, the Approach to Unity, and The Call to the Anglican Communion. The theme is treated with great earnestness and generosity of spirit. It is good to know that Dr. Manning's high position as the new Bishop of New York will give him enlarged opportunity to work for the cause he has at heart.

Of much value for reference is the appendix to the book, which includes the texts of the chief pronouncements and propositions for Church reunion which have recently been made.

B.

BARABBAS.

By Mary Day Winn.

"So this is where He died, the Nazarine?
Thou sayest, Micah, that they took His body
And laid it in a new-made sepulchre?
I hear it said that He hath prophesied
That He will come to life again today;
Such power smacks of witchcraft. If indeed
He spoke the truth, surely one might have thought
He would have saved Himself from such a death
Had He but had the power so to do."

"And yet, one thing I noticed, Micah, when
We two stood bound upon the palace steps,
And that pale-livered Roman washed his hands,
Afraid because his wife had had a dream!
The Nazarine stood with a face so calm
And pitying, I scarce could look away,
When my own pulse was beating to the tune
Of Pilate's words, 'Which one shall I release?'
When the rabble yelled, 'Give us Barabbas!',
What a surge of gladness filled my body,
And made me feel a living man again!
Then I looked at the Nazarine, and saw
His face as calm and pitying as before,
As tho' the cry He scorned, and then forgave.

"O, Micah, if He be Jehovah's Son
As He hath claimed, I know not; this alone
I know, and never shall forget—that He Hath died here on the cross they built for me!"

LEADERSHIP.

There are two classes of leaders. In the first class are those who stand out distinctly from the crowd, and speak bravely for new principles, which, as a rule, are rejected in their own day, but eventually are accepted for the greatest good. In the second class come those who keep their ear close to the ground, and, having determined what the crowd, or, at least, a majority of the crowd, wants, stand forth and lead the crowd in the direction it wishes to go.

Young men in the colleges of the country must determine squarely in their own minds whether they wish to be leaders or merely followers. If they wish to be leaders they must be willing to speak out truthfully their own convictions, despite criticism and abuse which may result from such action. They must be ready, possibly, to suffer crucifixion. If they will be mere followers of the crowd, then ruined lives and disaster will result.—Bishop Brent.

THE HOLY SPIRIT IN THE CHURCH

Extracts from the Sermon of Bishop Gailor at the Consecration of Dr. Manning as Bishop of New York.

"Take heed unto yourself and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the Church of God, which He hath purchased with His own blood." (Acts 20:28.)

This text is taken from the passage of Scripture appointed to be read as an alternative epistle in the office for the consecration of Bishops—the very beautiful and moving farewell of St. Paul to the Elders of the Church at Ephesus.

It declares the responsibility, the meaning, the purpose of the Christian Ministry: and the words to which I particularly desire to call attention are these, "In which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers." The commission comes from the Holy Spirit, and this Holy Spirit is not a mere influence, not a vague expression of divine favor, but a definite Person who fulfils and carries on the work of Christ. We must insist upon this truth as the differentiating claim of the Christian religion. There is a Holy Ghost, the Eternal Spirit, the Lord, and the Giver of Life.

Into this Holy Spirit Christians, by Christ's command, were baptized, and it was the Lord Who said, "When the Holy Ghost is come upon you ye shall receive power." And it was this power that transformed a little band of timid, disheartened disciples into courageous, heroic leaders, whose preaching shook the Roman Empire to its foundations and made the cross of Jesus Christ the symbol and witness of victorious sacrifice and redeeming love.

It is this power of the Spirit which has given Christianity every victory it has ever won in creating the ideals of human civilization. It has revealed a moral and internal holiness in the lives of plain men and women. It has made heroes and prophets and saints and martyrs for the truth. It has inspired men and women of the noblest genius and the most exalted station to forsake all to imitate Christ in his self-sacrifice for the betterment of the conditions of the world. And it still manifests itself in the lives of many thousands, who in the discharge of daily duties, in the routine of the common life, shed a light upon the world about them, which we who have seen it know to be a light from heaven. As our Lord said, "It is the Spirit that maketh alive." This is the very essence of the gospel.

. . . We may indeed believe that the kingdom in its ultimate scope, its eternal significance, transcends the visible Church: but for us men and women in our mortal life, as we deal with that which we see and know and not with that of which we dream, the kingdom is here, the Church is the Body of Christ, the kingdom in the making, the organic medium of the Spirit. As Clement of Alexandria expressed it 1,700 years ago, "As the will of God is His work and this is called the Kosmos: so also His purpose is the salvation of men, and this is called His Church." Or to translate this into our modern mode of speech, the Holy Spirit is the Spirit of love, as it is written, "The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost." Therefore the Spirit is, in His very nature, not individualistic but social: and the Church, which is the organ of the Spirit, as a recent writer says, "Is the institution where the life of service is systematically cultivated: where the principles of the kingdom are systematically taught; where the motives of loyalty are systematically inculcated."

We are assembled here today to consecrate one of our brethren, who was elected by the free votes of the clergy and laity of this Diocese, to be a Bishop and Chief Shepherd in the Church of God. The solemn rite and ceremony which we use in this service has come down to us through more than fifteen centuries; and it is worth our while to reflect for a few moments upon what the Church stands for and what this rite and ceremony means:

I. And first of all, we must insist that Christianity from the first claimed to be a revelation; not a new religion in competition with other religions, but a revelation of the source and significance and satisfaction of all religions. As Bishop Temple says: "The Christian does not go to Christ with preconceived notions of who God is and what man is, to see whether Christ's views coincide with his: but he goes to Christ to learn about God and man and to take His word for it," and this makes all the difference in the world.

In the conflict of varying opinions about God that are prevalent in our time, we are more and more reminded of the Gnosticism of the first and second centuries, which embroidered its terminology with Christian phrases and tried to parade as a Christian philosophy. One of our most popular American writers on religious subjects told us the other day that "The modern man will submit to no God Who exercises authority. God is love, that is, He is being kind and good to one another." In other words, this preacher turns the Christian precept round and says, "Love, that is, kindness and benevolence, are God"; but he says nothing of worshipping that kind of God. We might as well worship gas or electricity.

The same criticism is true of much popular literature which speaks about the "Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man," about immortality and the forgiveness of sins. They are Christian phrases, indeed, but all the pith and marrow and substance are eliminated from them. In the effort "to justify God's ways to man" to accommodate the teachings of Christ and the facts in the life of Christ to the demands of modern psychology, it would seem that the objective reality of Christian truth has faded away into a mist of conjecture, and we are told that dogma is discredited and has disappeared. In other words, there is nothing about God or the eternal world that we can know certainly, and we ourselves

> "Are such stuff as dreams are made of
> And our little life is rounded by a sleep."

As a contrast to this, it is worth while to heed the recent warning of one of the leaders of Modern Philosophy, Professor Taylor, of St. Andrew's, who says, "It is high time that philosophers ceased to treat the gospel history as a fable. We must be prepared to reckon with the possibilities that the facts recorded in the gospel happened and that catholic theology is, in substance, true. We cannot afford to have any path leading to the heart of life's mystery blocked for us by placards bearing the labels 'reactionary' and 'unmodern.' That what is most modern must be best, is a superstition strange in an educated man."

So the Church of Christ, unterrified by that kind of New Testament criticism which begins in misbelief and ends naturally in unbelief, and which ignores the witness of the Spirit in the living Body, still maintains that there is a faith which was once for all delivered to the saints. And that faith is not an unknown quantity. It is declared in the two great creeds, which are built up on the central dogma of the unique sonship and divinity of Jesus Christ. It is not a question whether this attitude is popular with "the intellectual proletariat of the moment" or not—whether it attracts or repels them. Christianity began as a paradox and must ever be a challenge to faith. As St. Paul said to Timothy: "Guard that which is committed to thy trust"; "Take heed unto thyself and unto the doctrine," and again, "No man can call Jesus the Lord but by the Holy Ghost."

II. Once more, the Church stands for the gospel of the grace of God, because grace as well as truth came by Jesus Christ: and that grace of God through the agency of the Holy Spirit brings salvation. Man cannot save himself. "By grace ye are saved through faith, and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God." And here again the teaching of the Church runs counter to much of the intellectual religion of the day. In fact, we are boldly told that "religion contains no real perceptions of extra-human force or person." "It is only the effect of the super-individual collective consciousness that we share." "Humanity idealized" is all we need: and "we shall not brook an eternally perfect Being."

I think that it can be demonstrated that the true significance of the imminence of God and the divine birthright of man grew out of our fuller understanding by the Holy Spirit of the dogma of the incarnation of God in Jesus Christ, and these truths have certainly widened our vision of responsibility and privilege, as children of God, to believe in and render service to our fellowmen. But by a strange perversity in some quarters these sublime truths have been so exploited as to lead to a denial of the incarnation and seemingly to exalt man into the place of God.

And of course humanity so exalted needs no salvation, and is independent of the grace of God. As one of our leading American professors has told us, reinterpreting his German teacher, "To distinguish works of grace from works of nature is sheer superstition, so also is the belief in miracles, the belief in mysteries and the belief in the means of grace." And this confidence in the natural sufficiency of humanity is asserted in spite of the manifest decadence of moral standards, the degradation of marriage and the home, and, as Professor Fitch reminds us, in the face of humanity's "latest debauch of bloody self-destruction in the recent war."

This philosophy has no place for sin or redemption or salvation; only for the mere machinery of social service without regard to the nature or quality of the service. And although the names of many of those who in greater or less degree are preaching this philosophy are widely advertised, and although they claim that this kind of Christianity is the only reasonable and up-to-date Christianity, it is certainly not the Christianity of history nor the Christianity of the New Testament. "No man cometh unto the Father but by Me," said our Lord, and "I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God." "Whoso eateth My flesh and drinketh My blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day." "I came that ye might have life and that ye might have it more abundantly." "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." This is the Christian gospel.

If it were true that man is sufficient for himself, needing only the influence of a great example to evoke his own inherent moral and spiritual power, then the gospel might be a poem or a picture of incarnate goodness, and it would satisfy all his needs. But if man is not sufficient for himself—if, as a down-right fact, he is weak and helpless, if there be such a thing as sin—sin which is more than "maladjustment to environment," sin which is wilful lawlessness, which means that man has "missed the mark," missed the end for which he was made, and that so deeply as to have drawn the very purpose of God into his finite failure—if this be so, and we believe that it is so, then man needs more than example. He needs Help. Redemption, Rescue, Healing.

All the painful, passionate yearning of forty centuries of heathenism cried out for this, and it was given to us in Christ. "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world," and "while we were yet sinners Christ died for us." This is the creed of the Church: the Divine Father and forgiveness, the Divine Son and redemption, the Divine Spirit and abundant life. Therefore the Church still insists upon the creation of moral rectitude and spiritual character as the end and purpose of religion, aye, as the basic problem underlying all questions relating to human life—social, industrial, civic and political. The Church still preaches the gospel of the grace of God. . . .

There are some important lessons that we may all take home to ourselves this morning.

In the first place, we should realize that Christianity is not a mere intellectual system, a philosophy or interpretation of life. On the contrary, it is primarily an agency for conveying the grace of God and for developing in men and women the capacity for worship and communion with God. Ideas alone do not save men. Sermons, messages, brilliant utterances do not save men. Salvation comes by the power of the Spirit and not by mental pyrotechnics. This is the more abundant life that all men need. . . .

We shall not be content to criticize and find fault with our own age and time, but rather we shall pray for the power to see within its questionings and unrest and discontent, aye, its recklessness and apparent failures, the strivings of the Spirit of God. But each man has to win for himself the conviction of the reality of the spiritual order and the spiritual life. Therefore, let us believe in and practice the worship of God, "praying always," as St. Paul says, "with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit"; or as St. Jude, "Building up yourselves on your most holy faith, praying in the Holy Ghost."

THE FARM VERSUS THE JAIL

By the Hon. Louis Brownlow, City Manager of Petersburg, Va.

I believe that the jail should be displaced by the farm in the prison system of the country. But because I believe that, it does not follow that I consider any prison farm better than any jail, for I have seen farm prisons that were far inferior to some jails. I do mean that I believe that the properly planned and properly conducted prison farm offers opportunity for actual rehabilitation of men and women that cannot be found in even the best of the prisons of the jail type.

Almost everybody nowadays is engaged in searching out and loudly explaining the causes of the sag in the morale of the people. There are innumerable theories of what caused a reaction from the wartime exaltation of the spirit, and curiously enough not a few of these theories lay the blame on everything that is either spiritual or exalting.

In the particular field of municipal or State government it is becoming every day more fashionable to ascribe every evil thing of the hour to what are represented as the misguided efforts of impracticable idealists, and so we must face a reactionary influence that is striving to turn back the clock and to undo everything that has been done to humanize the practice of penology in this country. A sensational chief of police attributes a crime wave to the parole system; a choleric correspondent of the morning newspaper writes to the editor that crime is encouraged because prisoners are not sufficiently punished; the whipping-post survival again attains front-page prominence.

Now I believe that the best way to combat this reactionary tendency, the most efficacious method of saving the good that has already been done, is to press forward with renewed vigor for further reforms. I believe that most men who have studied the problem will agree with me that the one thing that most needs reform in our penal system is the jail, the city and the county jail.

My suggestion is that all of us who are at all interested in the problem should agree on this end to be worked for: That the county jail be abolished and that there be substituted for it a series of district prison farms under State supervision and control so disposed geographically as to meet the convenient needs of the cities and counties of the Commonwealth.

If we can agree upon that proposition, I think that next we can agree that it is impractical and even impossible to attempt to install such a radically different system over an entire State at one time. Those who will not agree to this second proposition we would do well to drop at this stage of the game. Probably they wouldn't be of much use anyhow.

Is it not, then, clear that we should endeavor to enlarge the scope and usefulness of prison farms already established by bringing together several neighboring counties and cities to share in the work; and that we should endeavor to obtain the establishment of at least one or two district farms for the express purpose of displacing the jails in a certain area?

If so, we shall have to be able to show to the people and to city and county governments and to legislators that a farm really is better than a jail.

When we begin that exposition we should remember that we are under a peculiar psychological handicap. Approach the average citizen. Say to him, "Mr. Jones, I believe it would be a good thing to abandon the jail and take the prisoners out to a farm in the country so that—" but you can't get any farther. Mr. Jones interrupts. Mr. Jones has a sudden flare of enthusiasm. Mr. Jones takes you up. Mr. Jones proceeds for you, "So that they could raise their own grub and make a little something more and not be an expense on the public." Now Mr. Jones is all hot for the change and for his own reasons, and he is almost sure to add, "I have been saying so for years, but nobody would listen to me. It's an outrage to keep those able-bodied, good-for-nothing, lazy scoundrels up there in jail feeding them up."

Then you have to explain to Mr. Jones that the farm would most probably not be self-supporting. And he cools off. Then you have to go on and explain to him that you think the farm would be better than the jail not solely because it would be cheaper, but mostly because it would be better for those good-for-nothing, lazy scoundrels who are locked up. Mr. Jones becomes frigid. There is nothing to do but begin all over again and try to convince him that your idea of a change is a good one, and your task is all the greater because he has suffered an affront of a kind that no one of us relishes—a gentle contradiction of a pet notion evolved out of a flash of thought without basis in fact or inquiry.

I have no objection to a prison farm that becomes self-supporting. I am absolutely opposed to a prison farm conducted with the purpose of showing a profit. Except under very unusual conditions I do not believe there is a chance to make such a place self-supporting unless there is first a definite abandonment of a purpose to make a profit for the State. If you will begin by saying that after the expenses of the institution are met the prisoners will be paid wages out of the surplus, then you will have a chance to see a surplus, and you will have furnished your prisoners with a motive for working.

Almost anybody who has had to do with prison labor will tell you that it is inefficient, that it takes two or three prisoners to do the work of one free laborer, and the like. There is a good reason, of course, for much of this inefficiency. It is a result of mental or physical deficiency, the very self-same mental or physical lack that made the man a prisoner instead of a free worker. But much of the comparative inefficiency is the result of a lack of motive. Let him who has never drawn a lazy breath cast the first stone.

Give your prisoners a wage, even if it be only a contingent wage, and you will have supplied a motive to induce him to work. And if you can get him to work as a man works on a farm, not as a man who works in a prison contract shop; if you can get him in the habit of working, you have done the biggest thing you can do for the average prisoner. You have given him something that he may carry beyond your prison gates that will keep him from returning to you.

At one time at Occoquan, the farm in Virginia which is the workhouse of the District of Columbia, there were eighty employees, and of that eighty no less than thirty-eight had first come to that institution as prisoners. That a man might have a chance to get a job right on the very farm where he was doing time furnished the motive to many men to work. No wages were paid or promised, but the Penal Commission of the District of Columbia, after a study made in collaboration with the National Committee on Prison Labor, last summer recommended to the President of the United States that a wage system be installed at Occoquan.

What are the substantial reasons for the change from jail to farm? Let us first consider the problem as it affects the community and then as it affects the individual. In the first instance, I do not know of a jail that has a wholesome effect upon its immediate surroundings. I do know of prison farms that have been a distinct advantage to the vicinity. Occoquan is a case in point. I have a jail for a close neighbor in Petersburg. My office and the jail are about fifty feet apart. It is a better jail than some I have seen. But I am too close to it to permit myself to believe that it is doing much good for its inmates, or that it is "punishing" them for the good of the community to any effective degree. It is simply confining them, that's all.

The prisoner serving a term in jail under ordinary jail conditions has nothing to think about but his quarrel with the society that has deprived him of his freedom. He takes the thirty, the ninety or the hundred and twenty days that the judge has given him in which to repent of his offense, and employs them in cultivating a habit of thought that brings him each day into increasing hostility to society.

The prisoner on the farm has work to do—work in the open air that makes for him a good appetite and sound sleep. He has his work to think about and his hunger. The days of his confinement are devoted to inculcating the habit of work. And when he gets through it is likely that he will try to find a job and turn that newly-formed habit into a thing profitable for him and profitable for the community.

Of course most of the people we put in jail are there because they think things that we don't think. Their mental gears do not mesh in with ours. They are defective. Now there is no use in punishing them for that defect. But we ought to find them out and do what we can for them. It would be difficult, indeed, if not impossible, to provide psychiatric examinations throughout a State at city and county jails under diverse and purely local control, but it would be comparatively easy to provide that service at a series of district prison farms under unified State control.

Objection will be made that jails must be maintained in any event to serve as places of detention for persons awaiting trial. I do not believe the objection is valid. If the Legislature will authorize the detention of such persons at prison farms, the telephone, good roads and the motor vehicle will produce the body of the prisoner at the bar of the court without undue inconvenience or expense.

There are now as many methods of penal administration in our jails as there are jails and the office of jailer is still an office to be sought for because it pays a living. A series of district farms would permit the development of a uniform method of administration applied by a personnel selected with no other end in view.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

THE PURE GOSPEL.

Mr. Editor: We re-echo heartily the Southern Churchman's recent editorial exhorting the Church, in view of the world's pitiful plight, to preach a gospel that is militant and aggressive, dealing openly and directly and courageously with present day conditions, as against a gospel segregated and constricted and which, like the stony-hearted Levite, passes by on the other side. But it is certainly wide of the mark to say the latter attitude is what we mean by the "pure gospel," and the writer has missed the true content of that term when he says, "By this they mean a gospel which confines itself to personal morality and holds aloof from the problems included in a wider civic consciousness." If there is an abused word in the English language it is the word "gospel." People often say, "That was a good gospel sermon," when there was perhaps not a line of gospel in it. "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." What saith the Scripture It defines the gospel. In the fifteenth chapter of I Cor. St. Paul says, "I declare unto you the gospel," and then proceeds to define it—"how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures, and that He was buried, and that He rose again, according to the Scriptures." These are the basic facts, and in that masterly treatise on the gospel, the Epistle to the Romans, St. Paul develops the great theme of salvation. The gospel, he says, "is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." He grapples with the problem of how a bad man can be made good. He sweeps away the false coverings of morality and even church profession, concludes all under sin, for there is no difference, and all are guilty before God. This is article one of the pure gospel—ruin by the fall. Then comes the remedy, redemption by the blood; "being justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." How vividly this is pictured in the Old Testament. The ark contained the memorials of Israel's sin. But how is it that God says, "He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath He seen perverseness in Israel?" He does not say it was not there, but He does not see it. Surely He could see through the lid of the ark. But a great transaction took place on the Day of Atonement, when the high priest sprinkled the seat of the ark, God's abode, with the blood of the sacrificed lamb. For this reason He cannot see iniquity in Jacob. Hence, "Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord will not impute iniquity, whose sin is covered." The key to this is given in Romans, "Whom (Christ) God hath set forth to be a propitiation (rendered elsewhere 'mercy seat') through faith in His blood; to declare His righteousness for the remission of sins that are past through the forbearance of God."

A little girl was once asked if there was anything God could not do. She replied, "Yes, He cannot see my sins through the blood of Christ." Precious fact. And the apostle goes on to establish the great facts of justification, sanctification and glorification, until mounting step by step, he sees sin wholly vanquished and in exultant tones exclaims, "If God be for us, who can be against us? He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him freely give us all things." That's good news, and it is the meaning of the word gospel. "If any man preach any other gospel, let him be anathema."

If ever we needed to stand for this pure gospel, it is now. Salvation through faith in the atoning blood of Christ is not generally preached. When do you ever hear a sermon on justification? We are being corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ. The preachers of the pure gospel do not preach personal morality as the gospel—far from it. There is a counterfeit gospel of humanitarianism and ethics. "I believe," writes John Ruskin, "that the root of every schism and heresy from which the Christian Church has suffered has been the effort to earn salvation rather than to receive it, and that one reason why preaching is so ineffective is that it calls on men oftener to work for God than to behold God working for them."

According to this, there are a good many heretics in the social service camp. The Church seems to be forgetting that its citizenship is in heaven, but is bent on making a heaven of this earth by civic agencies, often in the hands of unregenerate men who are therefore walking according to the prince of this world, who is the devil. Beecher said, "When the angels want amusement they read commentaries." We might add also they are amused at the unscriptural programs vociferously agitating the air these days. We make a plea for the old gospel. People are hungry for it. Those who preach it are eager to combat all forms of darknss. But they believe the heart is the citadel and the regenerate heart the goal, rather than to get bills through the Legislature or to link up with civic bodies where often Christ is eliminated and the believers unequally yoked with unbelievers. It is the pure gospel the world needs, and preached in all its fulness, it "is the power of God unto salvation."

We want such a message as is given in the following stanza, which has had a remarkable history in transforming lives and bringing comfort and peace.

"In peace let me resign my breath,
And Thy salvation see.
My sins deserve eternal death,
But Jesus died for me."

Buffalo, N. Y. P. W. Reed.

FROM A SCHOOL CHAPLAIN.

Mr. Editor: In an excellent article published in your educational edition about a year ago, Dr. Bowie lamented the fact that chaplains of Church schools frequently failed to notify the rectors of boys and girls who had been confirmed during the school year. Recently I had occasion to notify some ten or fifteen clergymen of girls who had been presented for confirmation by me as chaplain of Stuart Hall, telling each of them that if he would advise me that the name of the girl had been entered on the register of her home parish no further transfer would be necessary.

How many of these clergymen granted me the courtesy of a reply, do you suppose? Just one lone rector. Is it strange, therefore, if we chaplains feel, "What's the use"?

Both the rector of Trinity, the Rev. Mr. Gravatt, and myself try to look after the Episcopal cadets at the Staunton Military Academy. Out of one hundred or more boys from our Church homes we are notified of not more than a dozen each year.

A little more concern on the part of the home rector himself might prevent boys and girls from being lost to the life of their parish during the years they are off at school.

J. LEWIS GIBBS.

Emmanuel Church, Staunton, Va.

"AND SMILE, SMILE, SMILE."

Mr. Editor: In a current popular magazine there is a suggestive and enlightening article on "You Folks in the Audience," by Ellis Parker Butler. He cites three kinds of people he always finds in every audience. There is the "eager young woman" who leans forward smiling—a good listener. Then there is the middle-aged man who, despite his wife's protests, "insists upon going to sleep." Then there is the man who sits solemnly back in the seat and says, "I will not smile, and I dare you to make me smile!"

The last named, says Mr. Butler, used to make him fret, until one day, when he was mentioning this type to the chairman of the Entertainment Committee, that dignitary replied, "Oh! I know who that is; that is our minister!"

Now, the lecturer does not simply mention this as an isolated case, but as a "type." And the editor has this statement in a "box" at the beginning of this article in the May issue of the American Magazine (incidentally an article well worth the parson's reading).

Do ministers not smile? Is it unorthodox to laugh? Do we lack a sense of humor? Are we a class of people who are sober and reserved and unsmiling? The writer in the American does amplify his statement a bit, but the impression he seems to leave with you is that the parson defies any one to make him smile!

If this is a true bill (and I have seen some whose face would all but crack if a good-sized smile or a hearty laugh hit it from the inside)—if it is true that we, as a class, do not smile, or have given the public the impression that we do not smile enough, or even on slight provocation—then is it not time that we "limber up" a little and teach our faces the calisthenics of a smile The psychological effect on both ourselves and those with whom we are thrown will be worth many sober sermons and many "godly admonitions"!

Personally, I have always considered the parsons the greatest "jokesters" and the jolliest "type" of folks as a class that I am thrown with. If there is a more needed business in the world today than to "be cheerful" and to carry good cheer and Christian optimism around with us, I do not know what it is. In fact, I humbly suggest that the very genius of Christianity is cheerfulness, gladness, buoyancy. A man may "smile and smile and be a villain," but I seriously question whether he may "refuse to smile" and be a Christian! Three good, hearty laughs a day would not hurt the dignity of any minister of the glad gospel of Christ, but they would dispel many a lowering cloud for him and his people, too.

THOMAS F. OPIE.

Red Springs, N. C.

If we would love one another as Christ loved us, there is but one effectual instrument, but one genuine spring of such love. No mere admiration will effect it; no mere sensibility will call it forth; no romance of benevolence will keep it up; it can come from nothing but faith in Him; that faith which purifies the heart. It alone is powerful to dethrone self in a man by setting up Christ instead; and until self is put down within, there can be no real presence of love, and none of its genuine fruits; until Christ reigns in a man's heart there can be no imitation of His love, for it will never be understood by me till I behold it as a personal matter; till I measure its height by the depth of my unworthiness of it, its vastness by my own nothingness.—Dean Alford.

The Great Commission.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS IN JAPAN.

Japan is steadily domesticating the Sunday school as an important part of Church work. One of our missionaries at Nara says:

"The most encouraging feature here, I think, is our Sunday school, which is steadily increasing in enthusiasm as well as in numbers. One of the vestrymen attended the Sunday School Convention in Tokyo last autumn and returned with some ideas which he has been working out. . . . As I was passing through the grounds of a Shinto Shrine a few Sundays ago a woman stopped me and asked if I would not take her little girl to Sunday school, that she was crying to go, but didn't know the way, and there stood the child, a little girl of about nine, with the tears rolling down her little face. I grabbed her by the hand and off we both ran, and her name was put on the register. The mother told me afterwards that the elder sister was also going now.

"The Methodists held a series of meetings here the 8th, 9th and the 10th instants. I was told that 800 were present one day. They came from all over Japan, and even from Korea. They seem to have aroused a great deal of enthusiasm, and the Japanese, rich and poor, are giving most generously. One, I am told, sold his auto for 5,000 yen and gave the whole amount. Day laborers, laundrymen and so forth give one or more days' income. I hear the Japanese themselves have raised 60,000 yen."

ST. MARGARET'S, TOKYO.

At the recent entrance examinations for St. Margaret's School, Tokyo, 265 girls applied for admission. Only 120 new pupils could be accommodated. The total number of pupils enrolled for the new term is 450. This is a high-water mark for St. Margaret's. Every nook and corner of the buildings, both in the dormitories and class-rooms, is packed full to capacity. The Educational Department of the Japanese Government is so greatly impressed with the value of St. Margaret's and the quality of its work that it has given Bishop McKim the assurance that no middle school for girls will be established in the ward in which St. Margaret's is located so long as St. Margaret's maintains its present high standards. It is evident that the time is not far distant when St. Margaret's must be enlarged in order to meet the increased demands being made upon it.

Miss Gertrude Heywood, principal of St. Margaret's, asks urgently for a missionary-hearted young woman with experience as a teacher of the piano and of class singing. She also needs at least one additional young woman on the staff who can teach English.

Mr. John W. Wood, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City, is ready to give information about these posts.

GRATEFUL SELF-SUPPORTING CONGREGATIONS.

Contributions for the Church's work in the United States have recently been received from Trinity Cathedral and St. John's Church, both in the city of Tokyo. These congregations follow the example of Christ Church, Tokyo, in sending a yearly offering to the Church in the United States in recognition of the help that has been given to them in the past, and as a thanksgiving for the fact that they have become entirely independent of all foreign assistance. These three congregations, in common with many others in Japan, are now fully self-supporting.

CHINESE DECORATION FOR DR. POTT.

By a presidential mandate dated February 3, 1921, the Government of China conferred upon the Rev. F. L. Hawks Pott, D. D., President of the St. John's University, the third-class Chia-ho decoration for valuable service rendered to the Chinese nation. The alumni of St. John's are jubilant at this honor bestowed upon the president of the institution, of which they are all so proud. The Hon. H. C. Suez, the Chinese Consul in New York, himself a graduate of St. John's and a Churchman, has interpreted the meaning of the decoration as follows:

"I would say the Chia-ho decoration is the civil decoration conferred by the Chinese Government to those who have given excellent service to the nation. It means the Excellent Grain, the Chinese Republican national symbol of prosperity."

Church Intelligence

Consecration of the Rev. Fred Ingley, Coadjutor-elect of Colorado.

The Presiding Bishop has taken order for the ordination and consecration of the Rev. Fred Ingley, Bishop-Coadjutor-elect of the Diocese of Colorado, as follows:

Time: St. Barnabas' Day, Saturday, June 11, 1921.

Place: St. John's Cathedral, Denver, Col.

Consecrators: The Presiding Bishop, the Bishop of Pittsburgh, the Bishop of Colorado.

Preacher: The Bishop of New Jersey.

Presenters: The Bishop of Wyoming, the Bishop of Western Nebraska.

Attending Presbyters: The Rev. Henry S. Foster, the Rev.. C H. Shutt.

Master of Ceremonies: The Rev. F. W. Oakes.

DANIEL S. TUTTLE,
Presiding Bishop.

May 7, 1921.

Publicity.

Announcement is made by the Publicity Department of the Presiding Bishop and Council that three publicity conferences are to be called. One will be held in New York on June 21 and 22, one in St. Louis on June 28 and 29, and one in San Francisco in the early fall, at a date to be announced later.

Each Diocese and Missionary District will be asked to send its publicity director or some other official representative to one of these conferences. The attendance will not be confined to these official representatives. All who are definitely interested in Church publicity will be made welcome. It is hoped that every Diocese and Missionary District will be represented at some one of these conferences.

The Department of Publicity has also announced a change of plans in regard to the Church at Work. It has been decided to omit the May number; the June number will appear as previously announced. In the fall only two numbers will be issued, instead of three as originally planned.

National Committee of the Church Service League.

The spring meeting of the National Committee was held at the Church Missions House on Friday, April 29. Twenty-seven members were present, representing all the seven organizations federated in the Service League, three of the provinces and one of the departments of the Presiding Bishop and Council. The resignation of Mrs. Simkhowitch was accepted with much regret, and a message was also sent to Mrs. Haley Fiske regretting her inability to represent the League for Patriotic Service on the National Committee this year.

Interesting and encouraging reports were made by the various committees, and plans and recommendations concerning the future of the Church Service League were freely discussed and will be considered carefully by the various organizations.

Plans were made to have the Church Service League presented at all the summer conferences by persons duly authorized to do so.

The Church Service League is now organized in about forty dioceses, and is being appreciated and welcomed wherever it is really understood.

General Theological Seminary.

The program for commencement week, 1921, at the General Theological Seminary is as follows:

Monday, May 23.

8 P. M.—Evensong and Baccalaureate sermon by the Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop of Delaware.

Tuesday, May 24, Alumni Day.

7 A. M.—Celebration of the Holy Communion.

10:30 A M.—Business meeting of associate alumni in Sherred Hall.

12 M.—Reading of Alumni Essay in the chapel. Essayist, the Rev. Robert P. Kreitler, '99. Subject, "The Stabilizing of National Character."

Report of Necrologist.

1 P. M.—Alumni luncheon in the gymnasium.

2 P. M.—Meeting of Board of Trustees in Sherred Hall.

4-6 P. M.—Faculty reception to the trustees, the alumni and friends in the gymnasium.

Wednesday, May 25, Commencement Day.

7 A. M.—Celebration of the Holy Communion.

11 A. M.—Commencement exercises. Address by the Rev. John William Nichols, dean of the Theological School, St. John's College, Shanghai, China.

12:30 P. M.—Senior class luncheon in Hoffman Hall (admission by card).

University of Virginia's Centennial.

It is said that the most distinguished and representative, if not the largest, assembly of educators gathered together in the last quarter of a century will take part, as delegates, in the University of Virginia Centennial exercises, from May 31 to June 3, inclusive.

The delegates will come from nine foreign countries and from thirty-three States of the Union. They will represent one hundred and twenty-six universities, foundations, institutes and colleges. Fifty-two of the delegates are university or college presidents and eighty-three have earned the title of "doctor" of law, philosophy or literature.

In addition to the officially credited delegates, one hundred and eighteen statesmen, lawyers, authors and men of letters, many of them college presidents, will be the guests of the University of Virginia during the four-day celebration.

Conneaut Lake Summer School.

Vacation and Vocation. How often are these two associated? The founders and promoters of the Conneaut Lake Christian Nurture School have brought these two ideas together splendidly in their plan. Back in 1914 Bishop Israel and the Rev. E. J. Owen brought the vocation of a Sunday school teacher to the beautiful little Lake Conneaut in their Diocese, and there had a program for instructing and enriching that vocation during the vacation season. Two years later the Rev. Messrs. R. S. Chalmers, R. E. Schulz and R. N. Meade joined in the work of building up this Summer School for Sunday School Teachers. The school has enjoyed a very steady growth and last year nearly two hundred persons were in attendance, some coming fram far off Nebraska.

The circulars for this year's school are now ready. The school begins Monday, June 27, and closes Friday, July 30. Registration is $2.50 and accommodations are $12 to $14 for the school term. Special railroad fares are available to Chautauqua, Niagara Falls and other nearby points. The Bishop of Pittsburgh is president of the school; the Rev. T. J. Bigham, 159 La Belle Street, Pittsburgh, is registrar. There will be four lectures each morning on live topics. Two additional courses will be offered ("The Pupil" and "How to Teach the Life of Christ") for those who desire to secure the credit certificate offered by the General Board of Religious Education. In the afternoons there will be interesting conferences, and in the evenings there will be an Easter mystery play and other entertainments and social features.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Richmond Convocation Meets at Brook Hill.

The Richmond Convocation convened in Emmanuel Church, Brook Hill, Henrico County (the Rev. E. E. Osgood, rector), Tuesday, May 3. The Quiet Hour, which opened the program, was impressively conducted by the Rev. C. C. Randolph. The Rev. J. Haller Giboney preached at the Morning Prayer service immediately following. A business session preceded the luncheon, which was beautifully and bountifully served at "Brook Hill," the home of the Misses Stewart. The afternoon session was entirely taken up with parish reports, which were unusually interesting, and showed a fine state of vitality in the Church throughout the Convocation. At the night service, in the interest of Religious Education, the Rev. J. Francis Ribble, D. D., presided, and gave some interesting information about the Summer School to be held conjointly by the three Virginia Dioceses at the University of Virginia in August. The Rev. Phillips E. Osgood, of Philadelphia, was the special speaker for the evening, and emphasized the importance of modern methods, especially pageantry in Church and Sunday school work. Mr. Osgood was also the preacher at the communion service on Wednesday morning, and delivered an inspiring sermon on the Divinity of Man. A discussion of the new Missionary Canon, led by the Rev. W. D. Smith, D. D., took up the rest of the morning session. Luncheon was served in the parish house on the second day. The essayist was the Rev. B. N. de Foe Wagner, who read an interesting and inspiring paper on the Influence of Art on the Christian Church. The speaker at the missionary service on Wednesday was the Rev. Dr. Yonan, a native Persian, who has done missionary work in Armenia.

The subject of the essay for the next meeting will be "The Place of Woman in the Coming Church," and the essayist will be the Rev. J. Y. Downman, D. D.

Service in Behalf of Religious Education.

On Tuesday evening, May 17, the night before the meeting of the Diocesan Council, a service will be held at 8 o'clock, under the auspices of the Diocesan Board of Religious Education.

A report of the Board of the past year's work will be made by the president, and several short addresses given on important subjects. It is earnestly hoped that all the clergy and lay delegates will try and be present for this meeting.

Improvements in Grace Church, Berryville.

Through the untiring efforts of the rector, the Rev. Malcolm S. Taylor, ably assisted by members of the choir, the chancel of Grace Church has been enlarged, choir stalls and robing rooms built, and the choir, consisting of fourteen members, are in vestments.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robt. C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

Church Activities in Lexington.

Saturday night, March 31, the rector and vestry of Grace (R. E. Lee) Memorial Church, Lexington, entertained at supper the men of the congregation and a number of cadets from the Virginia Military Institute and students from Washington and Lee University. Major W. A. Anderson welcomed the men of the congregation; Judge Burkes welcomed the young men, and General Nichols introduced the Bishop. The Bishop expressed great satisfaction at the revived interest and activities which the men of the church are evincing.

Sunday morning the Bishop confirmed a class of twenty-one and celebrated the Holy Communion. He also confirmed three persons in private, one of whom was sick.

The Rev. G. Otis Mead, rector of Christ Church, Roanoke, who recently underwent an operation at the Jefferson Hospital, is convalescing. His devoted people hope soon to have him in his pulpit again.

The work at Buena Vista and Glasgow is taking new life under the rectorship of the Rev. Normand E. Taylor. The Bishop visited Glasgow March 29 and confirmed thirteen, and Buena Vista Sunday night, May 1, and confirmed ten.

The Council, which convenes in St. John's Church, Wytheville, May 18-20, promises to be particularly interesting. The evening before its sessions are opened there will be a laymen's meeting under the directorship of Mr. W. D. Mount, of Lynchburg. It is expected that the attendance of laymen of the Diocese will be large. The conference, which will be presided over by Mr. C. E Michael, of Roanoke, will be followed by a social hour.

Miss Maria Williams, the beloved deaconess in charge of the work at Dante, who was recently operated on, is making a satisfactory recovery. She is greatly missed, and on her return to her duties will be warmly welcomed.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor

Woman's Auxiliary.

In Trinity Church, Portsmouth, a half-day session of the circles of the Woman's Auxiliary of Trinity and St. John's Churches was held April 8, when representatives from many branches in the vicinity gathered to meet Mrs. Darling, of Hampton, the newly elected Diocesan President. A corporate communion was held, the Rev. Mr. Brown, rector of St. John's, and the Rev. Newton Middleton, rector of Trinity, officiating. After this service an informal conference followed, opening with a greeting to and from Mrs. Darling, who briefly outlined the history of the Woman's Auxiliary, its purpose and achievements; also presenting and explaining the object of the Jubilee (Emery) Fund.

Miss Sallie Dean, of Richmond, spoke of the value and inspiration of the Summer Conference at Blue Ridge, N. C., urging all who could possibly do so to attend the June session.

Miss Martin, of Norfolk, made a short but strong appeal in behalf of the Letcher Memorial, which is intended to perpetuate in some active way the work of the late Diocesan President.

Bishop Thomson spoke briefly on the merit and schedule of the Summer School at Charlottesville, Va.

The Rt. Rev. St. George Tucker, of Japan, had as his theme "The Inspiration of Woman's Work."

Miss Jane Neely talked a short time on the old and the new missionary box system, urging members to observe the rules and avoid confusion.

An offering of $30 was taken up for the Chinese Famine Fund. Bishop Thomson pronounced the benediction.

ALABAMA

Rt. Rev. C. M. Beckwith, D. D., Bishop.

Convocation of Mobile Meets at Fairhope.

St. James' Chapel, Fairhope, is one of the latest additions to the physical equipment of the missionary activity of the Convocation of Mobile. It was purchased from the Baptists in January of this year, and, with a small expenditure, adapted to our uses. It is remarkable that, within a very few days, from the evening that the dean visited the mission for his monthly service, to the consummation of the purchase, 75 per cent. of the cost or purchase and remodeling was pledged by Fairhope and Mobile people, assuming that the Church Building Fund Commission will, when this is paid in, make a gift of the remaining 25 per cent., as is its custom.

The chapel is an attractive little building, erected within the past two years, finished with stucco and having a neat tower at the entrance. It will seat about a hundred and stands upon a lot near the centre of the town, that gives room for enlargement whenever it may be necessary.

Fairhope is a year-round resort for tourists and Mobilians, across the bay from Mobile. It is, next to the county seat, the largest town in Baldwin County and a thoroughfare for travel east and west that must be ferried across the bay.

With the equipment above described, the dean was encouraged to call the annual meeting of the Convocation in Baldwin County instead of the city, where it has usually met, and a most interesting meeting has just been concluded at Fairhope, May 3 and 4. By a remarkable coincidence it was possible to have three visitors representing the larger life of the Church beyond the bounds of the Convocation: The Rev. Cameron F. McRae, of the China Mission; Dr. R. C. Macy, the Church's only medical missionary in Mexico, and Mr. Lionel F. Capers, the field secretary of the Diocesan Laymen's Church Extension organization. Inspiring addresses from these men, a sermon by the Rev. N. C. McMaster, and reports and discussions from the local field, occupied the two days. Dr. Macy is himself a communicant of one of the missions of the Convocation, who responded to the call of the Nation-Wide Campaign in 1919, and has been doing a most valuable service in our sister republic.

A Live Parish.

One of the strongest parishes in the Diocese of Alabama is St. John's, Montgomery. Its church building, which is one of the most beautiful, is also one of the most historic in the South, for when the capital of the Southern Confederacy was located at Montgomery, President Jefferson Davis and many high Confederate officials worshipped there.

For the past two and a half years the Rev. Richard Wilkinson, D. D., has been rector of St. John's. Dr. Wilkinson is not only an eloquent preacher and faithful minister, but he is a man of great energy, and as an organizer he has few equals. He is distinctly a leader, and during his rectorate St. John's has taken on new life, a new spirit pervades, and her services are attended by capacity congregations.

Three hundred and thirty-six names have been added to the church roll during his term, ninety-nine being by confirmation, and the church now has over eight hundred communicants. The old Sunday school building has been completely remodeled and added to at a cost of several thousand dollars, and is now a handsome and commodious parish house. The church building has been greatly improved by the installation of a new heating plant and by the re-decoration of the interior of the church building. Several handsome and useful memorials have also been presented to the church.

The growth of the Church school has been most gratifying, the attendance having increased over 300 per cent. The school is still growing and the young people of St. John's are faithful and devoted in the performance of their church duties.

Under Dr. Wilkinson's leadership the entire membership of the parish has been formed into a group organization. There are twelve groups, each with its own officers and territory, and each responsible for the work assigned them. In this way every member of the parish has some duty to perform, and is thus brought into active touch with the Church and its work. A Good Fellowship Club has also been organized among the men of the parish, which meets twice a month in the parish house, and is largely attended by the men of the parish and their friends. Another club has been organized for the young people of the parish, and an interesting social session is held semi-monthly.

The church has been placed on a solid financial basis, and is fast approaching a realization of the slogan adopted, "Every member a contributor." Although a large number of old debts have been wiped out, many valuable improvements made, and all the obligations and assessments of the church promptly and fully met, the church is practically out of debt, and except for one small note, which will soon be paid, it would be free of all debt.

NEW YORK.

Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D.,
Bishop-Elect.

Dr. Drury Declines Rectorship of Trinity Parish.

Nobody in New York supposed that any ordained man called to the place would decline the rectorship of Trinity Parish. There is no record that any one ever did before. Yet that is what the Rev. Dr. Samuel S. Drury, rector of St. Paul's School, Concord, has done. At this writing his letter to the vestry has not been made public, but word from Concord says that the rector feels his work at St. Paul's is far from completion, and that it is his duty to stay and complete it.

It is now stated that the vestry of Trinity has no man in mind whom it can elect at once, and that it is likely that the Rev. Dr. Manning will remain rector (even until the fall) until a rector can be chosen and can enter upon the work. The word wired from Concord is to the following effect:

"I regard the rectorship of Trinity as one of the most enviable posts in or beyond the Episcopal Church," said Dr. Drury, "but it does not serve the cause of religious progress in America for a man to leave one form of religious activity half done in order to take up work elsewhere. I rejoice that the trustees and friends of St. Paul's School feel that I can be of service here, and, as I am thoroughly aware that my share of the work is incomplete, I gladly undertake to carry forward in better spirit and in better shape than I have done it before."

On Ascension Day Trinity observed the seventy-fifth anniversary of the completion of the present Church at the head of Wall Street. An address was delivered by the rector. The first Trinity Church was built on the present site in 1737. It was burned in 1776, and the second building on the site was torn down in 1839.

C.

Dr. Manning's Consecration.

The consecration of the Rev. Dr. William T. Manning, rector of Trinity Parish, as tenth Bishop of the Diocese of New York takes place Wednesday morning in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, and will be the largest and most impressive consecration ever held in the Diocese, and the first ever held in the Cathedral. Dr. Manning's first address as Bishop will be delivered in the afternoon, at the opening service of the one hundred and thirty-sixth convention of the Diocese.

Twenty-five bishops and four hundred clergymen, together with bishops of the Eastern churches and clergymen representing other churches in New York, will march in the consecration procession. Invitations have been sent to President Harding, Secretary of State Hughes, the British, Italian, French and Belgian Ambassadors, Governor Nathan L. Miller and Mayor John F. Hylan. General Robert Lee Bullard and General John F O'Ryan will represent the Army and Admiral Henry B. Wilson and Rear Admiral House the Navy.

The Rt. Rev. Daniel Sylvester Tuttle, D. D., Presiding Bishop of the Church, and Bishop of Missouri, will be consecrator, assisted by Bishop Boyd Vincent, of the Diocese of Southern Ohio, and Bishop William Lawrence, of Massachusetts.

The Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, D. D., Bishop of Tennessee and President of the Presiding Bishop and Council, will preach the sermon.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Prominent Churchmen Attend American Waldensian Convention.

Great interest centered around the first national convention of the American Waldensian Aid Society, which was recently held in Washington, and in which many clergy and leaders in the community took an active part. Rev. V. Alberto Costabel, of Milan, was the delegate from the Waldensian Church of Italy to the United States, and in ar address told of the growth of the Waldensian Church and the strides which had been made in the last few years toward cementing good will and fellowship among all nations. The Rt. Rev. James H. Darlington, Bishop of Harrisburg, presided at one of the sessions; Rev. Henry C. Sartoris, of the Episcopal Chapel of St. Francis Assisi of Boston, was one of the speakers; Dr. Herbert Welch, of Philadelphia, a layman of the Episcopal Church, addressed one of the meetings; grace was offered at the banquet held at the close of the session by the Rt. Rev. Alfred Harding, Bishop of Washington, and the Rev. Charles Lewis Slattery, rector of Grace Church, New York, was one of the principal speakers. Other speakers of interest were the Rev. John A. Marquis, General Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions; Philander C. Claxton, United States Commissioner of Education, and Rev. Vincent Ravi-Booth, minister of the Congregational Church at Old Bennington, Vt. Dr. Ravi-Booth gave a brief history of the Waldensians from the time of the formation of the order by Peter Waldo in 1175 at Provence, France, until they won their ultimate religious freedom in 1848. The keynote of the convention was the need of a closer relationship between the churches of America and the foreign born for the sake of Americanization. The convention was attended by high Church officials of Italy, together with delegates from every section of the United States.

The Laymen's Service Association of the Diocese of Washington held its annual meeting in Epiphany Parish Hall Monday evening, May 2, when William Mather Lewis, chief of the educational department of the civic development of the United States Chamber of Commerce, delivered an address. Election of officers for the ensuing year was held, after which a social hour was enjoyed.

The Girls' Friendly Society of the Diocese began its annual service and members party on Saturday morning, May 7, with Holy Communion at St. John's Church. The Rev. C. F. Bratenahl was the celebrant. On Saturday evening a pageant, "America in the Making," was given and a silver offering taken, to be used for the Roberts memorial, which is to take the form of a National Girls' Friendly Society rest-room in Washington. The annual festal service was held at Epiphany Church Sunday evening, May 8, when the Rev. Dr. Freeman was the preacher.

Mr. Thom Williamson, Jr., has been called as rector of the Church of the Advent to succeed the Rev. Edward Mott, who has recently retired. Mr. Williamson is now taking a special course at the Virginia Theological Seminary, and will finish in June. He was born at Portsmouth, N. H., the son of the late Rear Admiral Thom Williamson, and educated in the schools of the District and the Virginia Theological Seminary. He held a commission in the supply corps of the navy for more than fifteen years, and served in the World War. He resigned his commission in 1919 and is now enrolled in the fleet reserve. Mr. Williamson comes to Washington for the Sunday services now until June, when he will take over the full charge of the parish.

The Rev. Roland Colton Smith, rector of St. John's Church, Sixteenth and H Streets, has returned after a leave of absence on account of ill health, and was in his pulpit at St. John's on Sunday, May 8. The Rev. George William Douglas, who has been acting rector of St. John's during Dr. Smith, absence, has returned to New York, where he will resume his duties as canon of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. In his farewell sermon to the people of St. John's on Sunday, May 1, he reminded them of his rectorship there almost twenty-seven years ago, and spoke of the renewal during the past six months of the old ties and feelings he had for the parish. Perhaps the most notable services held at St. John's during his stay here were the unity Lenten services, at which ministers of other churches were the preachers, and which were largely attended every afternoon.

M. M. W.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Some of the Important Actions Taken by Diocesan Convention.

The one hundred and thirty-seventh annual convention of the Diocese of Pennsylvania was held in the Church of St. Luke and the Epiphany, Philadelphia, May 3 and 4.

Some of the more important actions taken by the convention were:

1. Favorably reported to the next convention for final action an amendment to the Constitution which would permit women to be delegates to the convention.
2. Defeated immediate action on proposed proportional representation which would give large parishes increased power in the convention.
3. Changed system of election of officers, excepting bishop, and adopted the preferential ballot plan.
4. Established $25,000 trust fund, the interest to go to the Bishop-Suffragan as a "residential fund."
5. Defeated proposal for a referendum vote among women as to their wish for representation in the convention.

The new Church House at 202 West Rittenhouse Square, Philadelphia, was open for inspection by members of the Diocesan Convention on Tuesday afternoon, May 3. The Pennsylvania Branch of the Church Service League invited those who desired, after the inspection, to attend the missionary mass meeting in Holy Trinity Church in the evening, to an informal supper in the new Church House at 6:30 o'clock.

At the missionary mass meeting addresses were made by the Rev. Dr. W. H. Milton, who spoke on the work of the Presiding Bishop and Council; Mr. Edward H. Bonsall told of the work of the Church in the Diocese, and the Rev. Samuel B. Booth spoke of the work of the Diocesan Missions.

The Rev. Harry G. G. Vincent, rector of the House of Prayer, Branchtown, was instantly killed by a motor car near his home early in the evening of May 3. He had spoken at the meeting of the convention of the Diocese late in the afternoon the day of his death. The opening of the convention the next morning took the form of a memorial service, and resolutions of sympathy were offered by the clerical and lay deputies for the family. The burial service was held in the church Saturday morning by Bishop Garland, the Rev. J. O. McIlhenny and the Rev. L. N. Caley, D. D.

The annual service of the Church
Continued on Page 21)

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

CONNECTING THE PAST WITH THE PRESENT.

The date of this issue of the Southern Churchman marks an anniversary which has a value for the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States that should not be overlooked. Just three hundred and fourteen years ago the first English service rendered to God was offered on Jamestown Island by the Rev. Robert Hunt and his companions.

There are those today who object to hearing ministers emphasize the application of Christian methods to business principles, and who seem to think it a modern innovation. It would be well for such critics to cast their eyes back to the days of the first settlement in the United States. Although this adventure was not a religious movement, as was that of the arrival of the Pilgrims a few years later, nevertheless, in those days people were not so averse to mixing religion with business, as some of them profess to be now. In the paper of instructions we find the following words, which well might be borne in mind today, and applied to the United States Steel Corporation, the Standard Oil Company, and other modern business enterprises: "The way to prosper and achieve good success is to make yourselves all of one mind for the good of your country and your own, and to serve and fear God, the Giver of all goodness, for every plantation which our heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up."

The Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities arranges for a "pilgrimage" to Jamestown Island upon this date every year. What a splendid thing it would be if an association could be formed for the preservation and application of the above practical and godly advice to the present industrial world!

A plan is now on foot to make the spot where this first English service was held a place of national importance and of religious significance.

The Colonial Dames of Virginia have secured permission from the Church authorities and of the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities to erect a marble memorial shrine in which will be placed the bronze tablet portraying this first service, which is now in old Bruton Church at Williamsburg. The plan being to place a communion table in this edifice where an annual celebration of the Lord's Supper can be held from year to year.

In view of the fact that the Colonial Dames is not composed exclusively of Episcopalians, the development of this plan and its consummation in a great communion service to which persons of many different Church affiliations will be welcomed, may prove to be a step towards Church unity as well as the beautiful marking of a spot that is already pregnant with sacred and historic interest.

WHAT DO PRISONERS READ?

The following communication is somewhat local, but we feel that what Chaplain Lancaster says is equally applicable in other States, and that often Church people can make good use of unused books by getting in touch with the authorities of their own State penitentiary, so we publish it in full:

"No one has measured the inspirations that have come from good books, and no one can estimate the value of good books as preventives of perverse currents of thought. The statement could be proved that the readers of good books make good citizens and do not make criminals. A taste for good literature is a fine inheritance, and there is an immeasurable loss when circumstances shut one out from access to good reading. Lately, under the inspiration of the Governor and of the president of the Prison Board, much is being done to help the prisoners in Virginia to better things. It is not too much to say that there has been a revolution in the plans and ideals for the men in the penitentiary. We are working along vocational, educational and religious lines for the purpose of making the men better citizens when they leave us than they were when they came to us. We would like, at least, to eradicate the "repeater." One of our new plans is to secure an ample supply of wholesome reading matter for the men. A good book is a great preacher, and an hour of good reading is a safeguard for a whole day. But we are working in the face of a total lack of money for this purpose, and therefore have decided to appeal to the generous spirit of our people to supply the need. We feel sure that if you do not send a book you will send the price of a book.

Books belonging to the following classes will be acceptable: Wholesome clean stories, books of adventure, nature books, books bearing on industrial vocation, elementary science, books of humor, short stories, social uplift, stories of religious life and experience, history, war stories, popular poetry, elementary agriculture, short biographies and books of reference.

These books will not only be used in Richmond, but our plan is to organize a circulating library scheme also, by which the State farm and the road camps may be supplied with reading matter. Most of our men are not very highly educated, and such books as the Henty and Aljer books would come in well.

Address al letters and packages to R. V. Lancaster, Religious and Educational Director, the Penitentiary, Richmond, Va."

HELPING THE CHILD.

Delaware has been very far behind in some of her laws, and it is good to see that she is taking better care of her children from the following clipping from the Survey:

"Delaware has relegated the bound out child to the limbo of the scrap heap. The State Legislature has recently repealed an old law providing for an apprentice system whereby children could be bound out by the justice of the peace. However, of even more moment than the repeal of this old statute is the passage of another bill which strikes at the heart of the child-placing problem within the State. In substance this bill provides that any society or individual wishing to place a child in a foster home in the State must first give a bond of $3,000 to the State Board of Charities. Under the terms of such a bond a child shall not be sent into the State who is incorrigible, of unsound mind or body, or mentally subnormal. The provisions of the bill also enable the State Board to remove a child from a home when it is ascertained that it has been placed in an improper one. The crux of the situation seems to rest in the power of enforcement, $2,000 being appropriated to carry out the provision of the bill. Further, the State Board of Charities is largely made the final arbiter since any person or association placing any child in the State must abide by all rules made by the State Board 'pertaining to the rejection, importation, placing, supervision, education, health, removal and general welfare of all such children.' In spite of the condition of the placed out children in the State as disclosed in the study made by Jessie Logie for the Delaware Children's Bureau, this bill has not as yet been signed by the Governor.

Until 1914 this organization made no mental or physical examination of the child by specialists. Now, such examination is made upon acceptance of the child by the society.

The majority of the 178 children placed in Delaware by the society are boys who have been placed upon farms. In many instances their attendance at school has not been enforced, and they have been allowed to work long hours."

Making Rural Life Attractive.

A conference has just been called to meet in one of our Southern cities for the purpose of discussing plans to make life in the country more interesting and attractive.

The speakers include such prominent men as Hon. Henry C. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, and ex-Governor Harding, of Iowa.

The topics to be discussed carry every phase of rural life, sections being devoted to education, church and recreational activities.

Such a conference has a distinct religious value, because children reared in the country are less exposed to temptations that are too strong for their immature resisting powers than those in the towns.

A recent examination of a State industrial school for boys showed the writer that fully 85 per cent. of the inmates came from the cities, and the same proportion would be found in correctional institutions for girls, so that anything that can be done to prevent the drift from country to town should have the support of Church people everywhere.

Family Department

MAY.

1. Fifth (Rogation) Sunday after Easter. SS. Philip and James.
2, 3, 4. Rogation Days.
5. Thursday. Ascension Day.
8. Sunday after Ascension Day.
15. Whitsunday.
18, 20, 21. Ember Days.
22. Trinity Sunday.
29. First Sunday after Trinity.
31. Tuesday.

Collect for Whitsunday.

O God, Who as at this time didst teach the hearts of Thy faithful people, by sending to them the light of Thy Holy Spirit; Grant us by the same Spirit to have a right judgment in all things, and ever more to rejoice in His holy comfort: through the merits of Christ Jesus our Saviour, who liveth and reigneth with Thee, in the unity of the same Spirit, one God, world without end. Amen.

For the Southern Churchman.

God's World.

Eleanor S. Johnson.

I thank Thee, Lord, that I can read
The message that Thou sendest me,
In quickening seed, in flowering mead,
In every skylark's ecstasy.

I thank Thee for the sweet, wet earth,
The rain on my uncovered head;
For azure mists that bring rebirth
To myriad things a twelve-month dead.

I thank Thee for the budding trees
That bring the busy robins back,
And for the cheerful hum of bees—
Thy creatures all, who nothing lack.

I thank Thee, Lord, that strengthened by
These signs of grace, this gracious Peace,
My coward heart can still its cry,
From doubt that mocks, and find release.

The Second Mile.

Joe's father was to be away a month. During that time it was the boy's place to take over all the chores, to do the errands, to tend furnace, and to save mother all the steps he could. To get this extra work done before school, it was necessary for him to get up quite early.

Joe started out with high spirits, determined to get up without being called, and to surprise his mother with his industry. He took the alarm clock to his room, set it for six, and for a whole week he did surprise and please his mother with his attempt to fill his father's place. The kitchen fire burned brightly when his mother came down, the furnace was ready for the day, the chickens well cared for, ashes emptied, all the little extra morning chores taken care of in good time

But by the end of the week it had become an old story. He was no longer helped out by the interest that came with new and different work. The bed felt so good. He dreaded jumping out into the cold, crisp air. He snuggled under the covers while he dreaded it, and the next thing he knew his mother was calling him for breakfast.

Haven't you noticed that it is harder to keep a good resolution after it has grown cold; after the first fresh enthusiasm has worn off; after it ceases to be new and interesting? It is like the second mile of a hike. Those who are not well hardened to walking often start out with a great deal of vigor and spirit. It seems such a pleasure to walk. The air is so fine. They feel as if they could walk forever. But the first mile wears out this feeling of freshness. Feet begin to tire; the back muscles begin to become weary. The air is no longer a delight.

That is the second mile. Yet all hikers know that if one sticks it out and plods on through the second mile, he comes again to a vigor like the beginning. His muscles have adjusted themselves to the task; they move steadily and with rhythm; he breathes deeply and evenly. There is not so much enthusiasm as at first, perhaps, but there is more real power.

All our good resolutions have the second mile, the time when it is hard to hold ourselves up to the mark we have set. It isn't fun any more. It is just hard work, and we are tempted to give it up, to take the easier way. But if we hold ourselves hard and compel ourselves to keep on with the task we have undertaken, we get past the second mile to the time when it is no longer hard. We do not have to make ourselves do it then; what we resolved to do has become natural to us.

When interest flags, and it seems not worth while to keep our good resolutions; when we think, "Oh, it's too much bother; and I don't believe it matters much, either way," let us remind ourselves that this is the second mile; this is the time to hold strictly to the bargain we made with ourselves; the time to take a fresh grip on our resolution and to stick it out. For when we have passed the second mile we shall find ourselves with new strength.—Selected.

The Life Eternal.

There is no death—
They only truly live
Who pass into the life beyond and see
This earth is but a school preparative
For larger ministry.

We call them "dead"—
But they look back and smile
At our dead living in the bonds of flesh,
And do rejoice that, in so short a while,
Our souls will slip the lease.

There is no death—
To those whose hearts are set
On higher things than this life doth afford;
How shall I their passing leave one least regret,
Who go to join their Lord?

—John Oxenham

The Spirit's Love.

If God is love, then the Spirit is love, because the Spirit is God. He, as one of the parties in the everlasting covenant, loveth His people with an everlasting love. By Him also they are made sensible of the love of the Father and of the Son, when He sheddeth forth His own love upon their hearts. Without the love of the Spirit, they could not know, so they could not come up to, the love of the whole Trinity; for by Him alone it is shed abundantly upon all that are His, both in earth and heaven.—Ambrose Serle.

Any One But Amy!

"Another cup gone! O Amy, you reckless, wretched creature! Now we've not enough left to go round that match!"

"Well, you needn't be so tragic about it, Prue, and anyway, it wasn't my fault. The old thing's been cracked for ages and its time had come—it simply went to pieces in my hand."

"Quite simply—after you'd knocked it against the faucet. It naturally would," said Prue, dryly.

Sally and May, busy putting back glass and china on the shelves of the cozy living-room, after the tea, laughed and exchanged a meaning look.

"Why, Prue, of course it wasn't Amy's fault," said Sally, with over-emphasized reproachfulness. "How could you think it for a minute?"

"No, of course it wasn't!" added May sweetly. "Most likely it was no one's fault at all; but if it was any one's, it certainly was any one but Amy."

That night, as Amy brushed her hair before the glass, there was a worried pucker between her brows. A broken teacup more or less did not matter much, but there had been something in the girls' tone that did matter. They were joking, of course, but it was something she did not like—something different; almost as if they had been talking of some one else—of a girl less popular and petted and admired than Amy Alston. Bother the miserable cup! If Sally or May had broken a dozen cups she would have sympathized with them; she would not have made invidious remarks. What did May mean with her hateful "Any one but Amy!" She had never considered herself as infallible.

Amy paused with her head bent sidewise midway of a brush stroke down her smooth, brown locks. There had been that loaf of cake that was burned, but that never would have happened if Sally had not called her off to consult her about something quite unnecessary. She had hurried back as quick as she could; and they could use most of it by cutting off the bottom and one corner. She brushed again, hard. Sally ought to have known better. Cake required a person's whole attention!

"Any one but Amy!" To be sure, the time she forgot to snap off the store-room light, and it was on for three days, until the next meeting, she had pointed out that, if Isabel had gone the rounds carefully before locking up, it could not have happened; and if the girl who had the key was not responsible for going the rounds, who was? Why, Isabel had acknowledged that she ought to have made sure about every light, even though she did not know any one had been to the store-room. No! Isabel never tried to squirm out of a hole. She accepted consequences.

Just there Amy laid down her brush and sternly addressed the sober young face confronting her in the glass.

"My child," she told it, "you've always considered yourself a pretty good sort, and in particular an all-round, good comrade. Let's hope you are. But there's one thing you've got to learn thoroughly and right away, and that's the art of owning up. You'd be decent enough to take the blame for anything big, I honestly believe, if you deserved it; but it's mean and disgraceful to try to slip out of small responsibilities.

"Now, my dear, you can't drop the best club salad bowl tomorrow and nobly and spectacularly confess the crime, as you'd like to do, because the bowl can't be spared; but you can and will buy six new penitential teacups and present them to the club, to make good with interest for the one you smashed; yes, smashed! That is the word you'll use, and you won't even hint that it was cracked! After this, every blessed blunder, fault and accident for which you are responsible is yours, and yours only; you won't let any one else claim a share if she wants to! Not any one but Amy!"—Youth's Companion.

Providence.

It may be hard at times to believe that one man out of the fifteen hundred millions that are alive upon this world today can matter much to God. And the difficulty seems exaggerated even when we remember the countless generations of men there have been upon our earth, and that perhaps there are thousands of other worlds besides our own. But whether our trouble in so believing is insuperable or not depends altogether on what kind of God we are thinking of. Given a God who could make such a universe as ours is, and who is really the Father of the spirits of the men and women who are born into it, and we haven't much of a problem left. If Jesus was right in the tremendous emphasis He laid upon the Fatherhood of God, and that wonderful thought is to be taken in its living, vital meaning, then a special providence for every man and a place in God's heart and plan for each human child, is not only a possibility, but an inevitable sequence. If God is a real Father, as Jesus claimed, then our difficulty about Providence seems to quite disappear.—The Christian Guardian.

A Tough Customer.

"I was clerk behind the counter of a large retail store in Boston, at a small salary. I had been out of work some time, and when I secured the position in Boston I was thankful, and made a mental promise that I would perform my duties thoroughly. I had been working for two days with poor success; trade had been quiet, and it was difficult to get any customers. I felt somewhat down-hearted because my counter had been idle for some time. A customer making appearance, I tried my utmost to effect a sale, but do what I might, I could not please the man. Everything was either too light or too dark, and if the color was selected for his satisfaction the quality was not what he desired. I have a quick temper, and at times during the transaction I felt that I could strangle the customer, but I quickly curbed my temper. I felt that my reputation as a salesman was at stake, and it was a question of conquer or to be conquered. At last I made the sale, and with it came a great satisfaction; but I was not done with the man yet. I wanted to sell him more. He said something about sending his wife around to look at some dress goods. I promised to send some samples of new patterns as they arrived. The customer thanked me and said:

"'It has taken you a long time to sell me a few goods. Are all of your customers as hard to please as I?'

"'It takes some customers but a short time to make their selections, while others wish to go slower; we are bound to please them all,' I answered.

"'Does it pay your house to devote so much time to so small a sale?' he inquired again.

"'Yes,' I replied. 'I have taken pains to give you what you want. I know you will find the goods as I say. You will have confidence and come again, and the next time it will not take so long.'

"After getting his package he walked out of the store. In three days I mailed samples of the new dress goods to his wife, and the circumstances passed entirely out of my mind. In about a month I was transferred to another counter and received a slight advance in wages. Much to my astonishment, I was taken away from this department after only a month or six weeks' trial, and placed in another position. I could not believe that I was not giving satisfaction, because with each change an increase of wages was made. One morning I was informed that Mr. B. wished to see me. I went to the office with surprise and some fear. I was more surprised when I saw sitting beside my employer my customer of a few months back. He proved to be the moneyed partner of the concern, whose business interests kept him away from the dry goods' store almost entirely, and he was known to but few of his employees, although he knew that I was a new man as soon as he saw me, and thought to see what metal I was made of. That he was satisfied is proved by his making me a buyer of the several departments where I sold goods. My prosperity began with the tough customer, and now I thank goodness that I got him, and that I did not show my disposition to strangle him."—Exchange.

The Peacemakers.

By David A. Robinson.

We who remain shall speak the word of peace,
Its terms—shall they be ours to frame? oh, no;
Graven long since earth's charter of release.
Sealed with the million graves that daily grow.

Ours still the faith that burned in their young eyes,
Who, naught withholding, took the way untried.
Freedom their watchword, liberty the prize,
Honor their only and unquestioned guide.

Not ours their terms to whittle nor increase,
They, giving all, on our sure faith relied—
All valiant dead who warred that war war might cease
What peace seek we save that for which you died?

—The London Chronicle.

America in the East.

A thoughtful Englishman, who has been traveling in the East, makes this observation: "Wherever the Germans go you will find an arsenal; wherever the French go you will find a railroad; wherever the British go you will find a custom house; wherever the Americans go you will find a schoolhouse." He says that 500 American mission schools are scattered between Constantinople and the Nile, and the American teacher is always accorded the right of way in the East. "The leading men and women of that territory are graduates of American schools." America is in the East, whether we will it or not.—Exchange.

The Wonders of Machinery.

A story concerning a conversation between an American and an Englishman, in which the Englishman met the American on his own ground, not without success, was told by General Pershing while he was in London recently.

"My countryman," said the general, "was telling one of yours a tall story about a wonderful sausage-making machine they had in Chicago.

"'It's a big affair,' he explained, 'but quite simple. All you have to do is to drive a pig up a plank, through a hole in the machine, and, five minutes later, out come thousands of sausages.'

"'What becomes of the hide?' queried the Englishman.

"'The hide, sir?' retorted the American. 'Oh, that falls out of another slot in the machine, and out come portmanteaus, purses, or, if you like, shoes or saddles. It's merely a matter of turning a screw.'

"'Oh, is that all?' said the Englishman. 'We've used that machine in England for the last thirty-five years. What's more, we've improved on it. Sometimes we find the sausages not up to the standard. Well, what happened? All we had to do was to put them back in the machine, reverse the engine—'

"'Go, on,' said the American. 'What happened?'

"'Why, out walks the pig, as fit as a fiddle.'"

The Life Beyond.

Although its features fade in light of unimagined bliss,
We have shadowy revealings of the Better World in this.

A little glimpse, when Spring unveils her face and opens her eyes,
Of the Sleeping Beauty in the soul that wakes in Paradise!

A little drop of Heaven in each diamond of the shower,
A breath of the Eternal in the fragrance of each flower!

A little low vibration in the warble of Night's bird,
Of the praises and the music that shall be hereafter heard!

A little whisper in the leaves that clap their hands and try
To glad the heart of man, and lift to Heaven his thankful eye!

A little semblance mirrored in old Ocean's smile or frown
Of his vast glory who doth bow the heavens and come down!

A little symbol shining through the worlds that move at rest
On invisible foundations of the broad Almighty Breast!

A little hint that stirs and thrills the wings we fold within,
And tells of that full Heaven yonder which must here begin!

A little springlet welling from the Fountain-head above,
That takes its earthly way to find the ocean of all Love!

A little silver shiver in the ripple of the river,
Caught from the Light that knows no night forever and forever!

A little hidden likeness, often faded and defiled,
Of the great, the good All-Father, in his poorest human child!

Although the best be lost in light of unimagined bliss,
We have shadowy revealings of the Better World in this.

—Gerald Massey.

No man has come to true greatness who has not felt in some degree that his life belongs to his race, and that what God gives him He gives him for mankind. The different degrees of consciousness are really what make the different degrees of greatness in men.

For the Young Folks

Where Go the Boats?

Dark brown is the river
Golden is the sand,
It flows along forever,
With trees on either hand.

Green leaves a-floating,
Castles of the foam,
Boats of mine a-boating—
Where will all come home?

On goes the river
And out past the mill,
Away down the valley,
Away down the hill.

Away down the river,
A hundred miles or more,
Other little children
Shall bring my boats ashore.
—Robert Louis Stevenson.

The Path of the Sky.

PART II.

All night long he fed full among the pools. Just as the first faint light showed in the eastern sky he climbed upon the top of an old muskrat house that showed above the reeds. At the first step there was a sharp click, the fierce grip of steel, and he was fast in one of Hen's traps. There the old man found him at sunrise and brought him home wrapped up in his coat, quacking, flapping and fighting every foot of the way. An examination showed his leg to be unbroken, and Hen held him while Aunt Maria, with a pair of long shears, clipped his beautiful wings. Then, all gleaming green and violet, he was set down among the four ducks who had been watching him admiringly. The second he was loosed he gave his strong wings a flap that should have lifted him high above the hateful earth where tame folk set traps for wild folk. Instead of swooping toward the clouds, the clipped wings beat the air impotently and did not even raise his orange-webbed feet from the ground. Again and again the drake tried in vain to fly, only to realize at last that he was clipped and shamed and earth-bound. Then for the first time he seemed to notice the four who stood by, watching him in silence. To them he fiercely quacked and quacked and quacked, and Aunt Maria had an uneasy feeling that she and her shears were the subject of his remarks. Suddenly he stopped, and all five started toward their winter quarters; and lo and behold, at the head of the procession marched the gleaming drake with the deposed Blackie trailing meekly in second place. From that day forth he was their leader, nor did he forget his wrongs. The sight of Aunt Maria was always a signal for a burst of impassioned quackings. Soon it became evident that the ducks were reluctantly convinced that the gentle little woman had been guilty of a great crime, and more and more they began to shun her. There were no more games and walks and caressings. Instead, the four followed the drake's lead in avoiding as far as possible humans who trapped and clipped the people of the air.

At first the deacon put the whole flock in a great pen where the young calves were kept in spring, fearing lest the drake might wander away. This, of course, was no imprisonment to the ducks, who could fly over the highest fence. The first morning after they had been penned they all sprang over the fence and started for the pond, quacking to the drake to follow. When he quacked back that he could not, the flock returned and showed him again and again how easy it was to fly over the fence. At last he evidently made them understand that for him flying was impossible. Several times they started for the pond, but each time at a quack from the drake they came back. It was Blackie who finally solved the difficulty. Flying back over the fence, she found a place where a box stood near one of the sides of the pen. Climbing up on top of this, she fluttered to the top rail. The drake clambered up on the box and tried to follow. As he was scrambling up the fence, with desperate flappings of his disabled wings, Blackie and the others, who had joined her on the top rail, reached down and pulled him upward with tremendous tugs from their flat bills until he finally scrambled to the top and was safely over. For several days this went on, and the flock would help him out and into the pen every day as they went to and from the pond. When at last Aunt Maria saw this experiment in prison-breaking she threw open the gate wide, and thereafter the drake had the freedom of the farm with the others. As the days went by, he seemed to become more reconciled to his fate, and at times would even take food from Aunt Maria's hands, yet certain reserves and withdrawings on the part of the whole flock were always apparent to vex her.

At last and at last, just when it seemed as if winter would never go, spring came. There were flocks of wild geese beating, beating, beating up the sky, never soaring, never resting, thrusting their way north in a great black-and-white wedge, outflying spring, and often finding lakes and marshes still locked against them. Then came the strange wild call from the sky of the killdee, who wore two black rings around his white breast, and the air was full of robin notes and bluebird calls and the shrill high notes of the hylas. On the sides of the Cobble the bloodroot bloomed, with its snowy petals and heart of gold and root dripping with burning, bitter blood, frail flowers which the wind kisses and kills. Then the beech-trees turned all lavender-brown and silver, and the fields of April wheat made patches of brilliant velvet-green. At last there came a day blurred with glory, when the grass was a green blaze and the woods dripped green and the new leaves of the apple-trees were like tiny jets of green flame among the pink-and-white blossoms. The sky was full of water-fowl going north. All that day the drake had been uneasy. One by one he had molted his clipped wing-feathers, and the long curved quills which had been his glory had come back again. Late in the afternoon, as he was leading his flock toward the kitchen, a great hubbub of calls and cries floated down from the afternoon sky. The whole upper air was black with ducks. There were teal, wood-ducks, bald-pates, black-duck, pintails, little blue-bills, whistlers, and suddenly a great mass of mallards, the green heads of the drakes gleaming against the sky. As they flew they quacked down to the little earth-bound group below. Suddenly the great drake seemed to realize that his power was upon him once more. With a great sweep of his lustrous wings he launched himself forth into the air in a long, arrowy curve and shot up through the sky toward the disappearing company—and not alone. Even as he left the ground before Aunt Maria's astonished eyes, faithful, clumsy, wary Blackie sprang into the air after him, and with the strong, awkward flight of the black-duck, which plows its way through the air by main strength, she overtook her leader, and the two were lost in the distant sky.

Aunt Maria took what comfort she could out of the three which remained, but only now they had gone did she realize how dear to her had been Greentop, the beautiful, wild, resentful drake, and Blackie, awkward, wise, resourceful Blackie. The flock, too, was lost without them, and took chances and overlooked dangers which they never would have been allowed to do under the reign of their lost king and queen. At last fate overtook them one dark night when they were sleeping out. That vampire of the darkness, a wandering mink, came upon them. With their passing went something of love and hope, which left the Cobble a very lonely place for the three old people.

As the nights grew longer, Aunt Maria would often dream that she heard the happy little flock singing like tea-kettles in their basket or that she heard them quack from their coop and would call out to comfort them. Yet always it was only a dream. Then the cold came, and one night a great storm of snow and sleet broke over the Cobble and the wind howled, as it did the night before the drake was found. Suddenly Aunt Maria started out of her warm bed and listened. When she was sure she was not dreaming, she awakened the deacon, and through the darkness they hurried down to the door, from the other side of which sounded tumultuous and familiar quackings. With trembling hands she lighted the lamp, and, as they threw open the door, in marched a procession. It was headed by Greentop, resentful and reserved no more, but quacking joyously at the sight of light and shelter. Back of him, Blackie's soft, dark head rubbed lovingly against Aunt Maria's trembling knees with the little caressing, crooning note which Blackie always made when she wanted to be petted. Back of her, quacking embarrassedly, waddled four more ducks, who showed their youth by the size and the newness of their feathering. Greentop and Blackie had come back, bringing their family with them. The tumult and the shoutings aroused old Hen, who hurried down in his night-clothes. These, by the way, were the same as his day-clothes, except for the shoes, for, as Hen said, he could not be bothered with dressing and undressing except during the bathing season, which was long past.

"Durned if it ain't them pesky ducks again'" he said, grinning happily.

"That's what it be," responded Deacon Jimmy. "I don't suppose now we'll have a moment's peace."

"Yes, it's them good-for-nothin'—" began Aunt Maria, but she gulped and something warm and wet trickled down her wrinkled cheeks as she stooped and pulled two dear-loved heads, one green and the other black, into her arms.—Samuel Scoville, in St. Nicholas.

IGNORANT MR. TURTLE.

Said Mr. Turtle, "It is queer—
The things I often see and hear;
Some things are hard to quite believe,
And must be told just to deceive.
"Strange things do happen, I'll admit,
I've not a single doubt of it,
They tell me boats 'turn turle,' though,
But they can't make me think it's so."
—Lutheran.

When the Cap Fitted.

Duke looked up from the bone he was gnawing and glared at his little mistress and her visitor. His bushy tail did not even hint at wagging; there was a fierce light in his eyes, and a low growl rumbled down in his throat.

Ruth caught Marian by the arm. "Oh, let's run!" she cried. "He's going to bite us."

"No, he won't, if we don't touch his bone."

Marian felt ashamed of her dog, and vainly tried to think of some excuse for his conduct. "I don't know what makes him act so," she said as the two girls walked on.

"Is he always as cross as he has been since I came?" asked Ruth.

"He didn't used to be," returned Marian sorrowfully. "But now he's getting crosser and crosser all the time."

They had reached the front porch by this time, and behind the woodbine stood Marian's brother, Paul. His face was red with anger and his fists were clinched. "I am going straight to mamma, miss!" he exclaimed as he saw Marian. "We'll see if she lets you talk that way!"

"What way?" asked Marian in astonishment, and Ruth thought of her own brother, and felt very glad he was not as ill-tempered and unreasonable as Paul.

Paul paid no attention to his sister's question, but went into the house and slammed the door very hard. A few moments later mamma's sweet voice called, "Marian, dear, I want to see you."

Marian obeyed quickly. Mamma was waiting for her in the sewing-room, and her face looked puzzled and sad. Paul sat by the window, and it was plain that he had been crying. Marian looked from one to another in astonishment.

"How is this, my daughter?" mamma began. "Paul tells me he heard you saying to Ruth that he is growing crosser all the time."

Marian stared, then broke into a merry laugh.

"Why, mamma, we weren't talking about Paul at all. Duke growled at us, and Ruth asked me if he always acted so cross; and then I said he is getting crosser and crosser all the time."

"Oh!" said mamma, and then she, too, laughed. "Run back to your play, dear," she said cheerily. "It was only a mistake, it seems."

When Marian had left the room mamma looked over at Paul. His cheeks were redder than before, but now it was shame that colored them instead of anger. "I just heard them talking about being cross, and I s'posed that meant me," he explained.

"It was a rather queer mistake, wasn't it?" mamma asked. And Paul made no answer.

"If your father had overheard that conversation," mamma continued, after waiting a moment for Paul to speak, "would he have thought the girls were talking about him?"

"Of course not!" said Paul indignantly.

"But why not?" persisted mamma.

"Because he isn't ever cross, and they couldn't have meant him." Paul spoke earnestly, though he could not help smiling as he met his mother's meaning look.

"Exactly," said mamma, nodding her head. "And it was easy for you to make the blunder, because you have been cross and ill-natured through almost all of Ruth's visit. The cap fitted you, and you put it on without waiting to see if it was meant for you or not. Uneasy conscience, my boy, makes people very sensitive about what they happen to hear.

"A boy who tries his best to do right doesn't need to worry over what people say about him. And that sort of boy will not be likely to think that all the unpleasant things he overhears are meant for him."—Weekly Welcome.

Noises of the Night.

The baby's tooth was coming through,
And it was aching hard,
Which made him cry so loud he woke
The watch-dog in the yard.

The dog, suspicious and alert
For wrongs to set aright,
Patrolled the grounds with hasty feet
And barked with all his might.

The inmates of the poultry-house,
From peaceful slumber stirred,
Began to cackle and to crow,
Till every voice was heard.

Out on the streets a fire-alarm
Was told with clang of bells—
And lively boys went racing by
With sympathetic yells.

The wakeful hours wore on and on,
And it was almost day
Before the noises of the night
Had wholly died away.

But when the morning fairly dawned,
With sunshine, bloom, and dew,
The house was calm, the yard was still,
The baby's tooth was through.

—Christian Register

The South's Best Book Store

HUNTER & CO

105 E. Broad Street
Richmond, Va.

Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen
Prompt and Reliable Service

Church Furnishings, Memorials, etc.

MOLLER PIPE ORGANS

Highest grade instruments. In use in three thous. and churches. Every organ specially designed for the church and service in which it is to be used and fully guaranteed. Specifications and estimates on request. Correspondence solicited.

M. P. MÖLLER
Hagerstown, Maryland

CHURCH VESTMENTS
Cassocks, Surplices, Stoles
EMBROIDERIES
Silks, Cloths, Fringes
CLERICAL SUITS
Rabats, Collars, Shirts
COX SONS & VINING
2 Madison Avenue New York

CHURCH VESTMENTS
Gold, Silver and Brass
Church and Chancel Furniture
Write for Catalogue
for Episcopal Churches
W. & E. SCHMIDT CO.
108 Third Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

Vapo Cresolene

Established 1879

Used for more than forty years. The benefit derived from it is unquestionable.

FOR more than a generation we have been receiving grateful testimony to the virtues of this thoroughly tested and proven treatment. It stops violent coughing, and difficult breathing, assuring restful sleep because the antiseptic vapor carries healing with every breath. Booklet 43 tells why the diseases for which Cresolene is recommended yield to this simple and dependable treatment.

Vapo-Cresolene is sold by druggists
VAPO-CRESOLENE CO., 62 Cortlandt St., New York

NICK BULL'S MARKET,

Richmond's Leading Dealer in
FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME

312 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.
Phone Randolph 1680

WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

Spring Styles
NOW READY
Have Your Old Hat Fixed Like New

Many customers use their old hats by having them made over for their children. We specialize on children's hats.

PARCEL POST DEPARTMENT
AT YOUR SERVICE.

VERRA HAT WORKS
211 NORTH FIRST STREET
RANDOLPH 90

DISTANCE

Makes no difference to Berry patrons—our Mail Order Department can serve you anywhere; delivery free.

Write for our new catalogue of MEN'S and BOY'S CLOTHING.

The South's "Old Home" store with new blood and best values!

O. N. Berry Co.
ESTABLISHED 1879
Main and 11th Sts., Richmond, Va.

R. Geissler, Inc.
56 West Eighth Street, New York
Memorials
FOR THE CHURCH
Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

FAMINE RELIEF.

For the convenience of our readers we publish the addresses of the treasurers of the various Relief Funds whose appeals for the starving, and especially for starving children, are so urgent and touching. The Southern Churchman will forward contributions to any of these, but to save time, postage and possibility of miscarriage, checks would better be sent directly to the treasurers as below:

Near East Relief (formerly "Armenian and Syrian Relief")—Cleveland H. Dodge, No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York City.

European Relief (Central and Eastern Europe)—Franklin K. Lane, 42 Broadway, New York City; or locally for Virginia, Desoto Fitzgerald, 218 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.

Chinese Famine Relief—Remit through Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer, Presiding Bishop and Council, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

Acknowledgments

Mrs. J P Wickham, Lorraine, Va.....$5.00
Miss Anne Withers, Greensboro, Ala.. 5.50

PIPE ORGANS

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID in building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

MEETING OF TRUSTEES.

The Board of Trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary and High School in Virginia will meet at the Seminary on Wednesday, the first day of June,
S. SCOLLAY MOORE, Secy.

I take this method of thanking my many clients for their past patronage, and assure them I am still selling Spirella corsets, and can be reached at the Wallerstein, Apartment 202, or by phone, Randolph 3694-W. MISS MYRTLE McDONNELL.

DON'T TRY ON YOUR NEW DRESSES over your old corset. Let us help you select and fit to you the corset that does greatest justice to your figure. The Corset Shop, 317 N. Fifth St. Mrs. A. J. Pyle, Prop. Phone Ran. 3397.

Doll Skirts Accordion Pleated Free. ASHBY B. PYLE, 315 N. 5th St. Hemstitching, Pinking and Button Covering.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER

Invites you to inspect her line of GAGE Tailored HATS. Also the ADVANCE Showing of Spring Hats in the most attractive shapes.
209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

SUMMER BOARDERS.

WANTED—IN BEAUTIFUL COUNTRY mansion, two and a quarter miles from University of Virginia, summer boarders. Address "E. C. G.," Rio, Albemarle County, Va.

BOARDING.

THE MAGNOLIA, 1321 M STREET, N. W. One, or more, ladies visiting Washington can find transient quarters with Miss Bouldin.

CLERICAL SUPPLY.

WANTED—CLERICAL SUPPLY FOR ST. Paul's Church, Newport News, Virginia, months of June and July. Address Rev. H. G. Lane.

HELP WANTED

YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCATION AND refinement wanted to enter the St. John's Hospital Training School for Nurses (Episcopal), Brooklyn, N. Y. Applicants required to have one year of high school or its equivalent. Course three years. A registered school of high standing. Nurses receive remuneration. Many social privileges. Home life pleasant. Graduates are now receiving $6.00 per day. Apply to St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED—TO EMPLOY A CLERGYMAN as superintendent of small orphanage in North Carolina. Correspondence solicited. Address Rev. E. A. Penick, Jr., Charlotte, N, C.

WANTED, LADY AS PERMANENT ASsistant to mother, in care of children and household; to replace one of six years residence. Apply to Mrs. Hunsdon Cary, 1107 Grove Ave., Richmond, Va .

SITUATIONS WANTED.

A YOUNG GIRL, HIGH SCHOOL GRADUate, desires a position for the summer months. Address "M.," care of Southern Churchman.

A LADY OF REFINEMENT AND EDUcation desires position as traveling companion, governess, or to do clerical work. References. Address "H. G. H." care of Southern Churchman.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

Bartlett: Following a long illness, and a third stroke of paralysis, Mrs. HARRIET BARTLETT, widow of the late Dr. Edward H. Bartlett, died in the early morning of May 7th 1921 at her residence in Oakland, Garrett County, Maryland.

Mason: Entered into rest on Sunday April 17th at her residence in Washington, SUSAN H. B. MASON, daughter of the late Hon. John Y. and Mary Anne Fort Mason. Funeral Service in Washington, April 18th. Interment in Richmond, Virginia.
"Blessed are the pure in heart."

R. L. Christian & Company
514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.
Leading Fancy Grocer
AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES
Special attention given to out-of-town orders.
Catalogue mailed on application.

SAFES
L. N. COOKE SAFE & LOCK CO.
807 East Franklin St.
Richmond, Va.

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS
FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG
S. T. Beveridge & Co.
Office: 1217 East Cary Street
Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd
Richmond, Va.

HOT WATER HEAT
For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars
ARCOLA SYSTEM
R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.
9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health, and, above all,

Provide yourself with Travelers Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank
Richmond, Virgin

Service

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business. That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley
FURNITURE
CARPETS DRAPERIES

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

(Continued from page 14.)

Schools of the Diocese for the presentation of the Lenten and Easter offerings was held Sunday afternoon, May 1, in the Church of the Holy Trinity, Philadelphia. Addresses were made by the Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop of Delaware, and by the Rev. George H. Toop, D. D., rector of Holy Apostles'. A pageant, "The Gift of Self," was presented under the direction of Mrs. Sara F. Price.

The treasurer, Mr. George W. Jacobs, who announced the offerings, said the actual amount received by him was $47,161.05. But if the Sunday schools which have not made their returns give as much as they did last year, the total will be $50,796.98. The goal set for the schools was $50,000. The Holy Apostles' Sunday school was far in the lead, with an offering of $7,055.13.

A week of service, celebrating the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Church of St. James the Less, Falls of Schuylkill, Philadelphia, began Sunday, May 1. The church was established April 30, 1846, at a meeting in the home of Robert Ralston, and is now one of the beautiful church properties in Philadelphia. Four bishops of the Church are buried in its famous church yard—Bishops Stevens, Onderdonk, Perry and Whittaker. The Rev. Edward Ritchie is the present rector.

Chapel in Diocesan Headquarters Dedicated: Ascension Day, Bishop Rhinelander dedicated a room in the new diocesan headquarters, to be used as a chapel. A pretty altar, which was removed from the assembly hall of the old Church House, has been placed in the new chapel, and a number of additional furnishings will be placed there at an early date. Services are held every afternoon for about fifteen minutes, mainly for persons who work in the offices in the Church House, although the place of worship will be open to everybody.

The Guild of St. Barnabas for Nurses has opened a club-room at 616 South Broad Street, Philadelphia, adjoining the Pro-cathedral of St. Mary. It is for the use of nurses and girls in training at hospitals in the neighborhood. The Guild held its annual Florence Nightingale service, in commemoration of the one hundred and first anniversary of Miss Nightingale's birth, Thursday evening, May 12, in St. James' Church. The singing was led by a choir of uniformed nurses, and the Rev. Dr. John Mockridge delivered the address.

Death of Colonel Pierce's Wife: Mrs. Pierce, wife of Colonel Charles C. Pierce, D. D., rector-emeritus of St. Matthew's Church, Philadelphia, died April 22 at the American Hospital in Paris. Colonel Pierce is in Europe in connection with his duties for the War Department. He is head of the commission to make the final layout of the four permanent cemeteries in France and one in England. His duties will take him also into Italy, Belgium, Luxembourg and Germany.

Mr. S. Tudor Strang, who had been organist of the Church of the Redeemer, Bryn Mawr, for seven years, dropped dead April 28 at the station in Bryn Mawr, following the usual Friday night choir practice.

Mr. Strang was a pupil of the late David Wood, noted blind organist, and also studied under Guilmant in Paris. He leaves a widow and son.

Mr. Henry Budd, for forty-three years a vestryman of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Kensington, and for some years prior to 1918, when he resigned, Chancellor of the Diocese, died April 28 at his home in West Philadelphia. He was a widely recognized authority on canon law and was a trustee of Burlington College and of St. Mary's Hall and of the General Theological Seminary.

Mr. R. Montgomery Haines has been confirmed by the Executive Council of the Diocese of Pennsylvania as Secretary of the Department of Social Service. He succeeds Dr. William H. Jefferys, Superintendent of the Philadelphia City Mission, as secretary.

R. R. W.

JUST READY

More "FIVE-MINUTE TALKS"

By Walter R. Bowie, D.D.

SUNNY WINDOWS

Author of "The Children's Year"

AND OTHER SERMONS

Here is another volume of Dr. Bowie's talks to youngsters, all attractively suited to the child mind. The subjects are arresting themes, calculated to almost invariably catch the attention of boy or girl—while the treatment thereof is simplicity itself.

As the Record of Christian Work said: "Dr. Bowie's talks are capital—straight to the hearts of children, clever, interesting, helpful."

Cloth, $1.25 net

For Sale by

Southern Churchman Co., Richmond, Va.

EASTON

Rt. Rev. G. W. Davenport, D.D., Bishop.

Meeting of Annual Convention.

The fifty-third annual convention of the Diocese met in St. Paul's Church, Worcester Parish, Berlin, Tuesday, May 3, 1921.

Preliminary conferences were held Monday afternoon and evening. At 2:30, in the parish house, Miss Laura F. Boyer, of the Church Missions House, led the Conference on Woman's Work, which was listened to by a large attendance of ladies from the Diocese. At the same time the Rev. Charles E. McAllister, of Hyattsville, conducted a Conference on Religious Education, featuring especially Sunday school work and workers. At 7:30 P. M. the Rev. Charles N. Lathrop, Secretary of the Department of Social Service, led the Conference on Social Service, after which a reception was held in the parish house, a large number being present.

On Tuesday morning there was a celebration of the Holy Communion, at which service the Bishop read his address, full of good suggestions, and showing a work of seven and a half months crowded with activities and successful accomplishments.

Immediately after service the convention was called to order by the Bishop. The roll call showed an unusually large attendance of clergy and a full delegation of laymen from the various parishes.

The large numbers who came in automobiles attested the value of Maryland's good roads.

Mr. S. E. Shannahan was re-elected secretary.

Motions of condolence were offered on the death of Judge James A. Pearce, Chancellor of the Diocese, and of the Rev. Henry B. Martin, D. D., member of the Standing Committee; also resolutions of sympathy to Rev. S. S. Hepburn, D. D., who recently lost a son by death.

The following resolution was adopted: Resolved, that the convention of the Diocese of Easton do seriously and solemnly urge upon our national authorities the taking of action without delay, looking to an International Conference in reference to the reduction of armaments in the interest of world peace.

Chester Parish, Chestertown, was chosen for the next meeting of convention.

The elections resulted as follows:

Standing Committee—Rev. S. A. Potter, Rev. Henry Davies, Rev. George C. Sutton, D. D., and Judge W. H. Adkins and Mr. Edwin Dashiell.

Deputies to the Provincial Synod—Rev. S. S. Hepburn, D. D., Rev. Louis L. Williams, Rev. Walter Archbold, D. D., and Rev. Herbert D. Cone. Lay Deputies—Edwin Dashiell, S. E. Shannahan, W. M. Cooper and Colonel W. H. Gibson.

Alternate Clerical Deputies—Rev. S. Borden-Smith, Rev. S. A. Potter, Rev. W. C. Marshall and Rev. J. F. Virgin. Alternate Lay Deputies—E. Thomas Massey, Thomas Perkins, H. L. Constable and C. M. Dashiell.

Tuesday evening addresses were made as follows: On the Program of the Presiding Bishop and Council, by the Rev. Charles N. Lathrop; an address by Rev. Dr. Pardu, on the Church Building Fund Commission, and one on Church Finance by the Rev. J. F. Virgin.

L. L. W.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Initial Meeting of Bishop and Council.

A full attendance, with the exception of the Treasurer of the Diocese, Mr. B. B. Russell, Jr., marked the initial meeting of the Bishop and Council, which was called by the Bishop and held in Christ Church, Savannah, May 3. The business of the meeting consisted in electing the Secretary and Treasurer of the Council, and the organization of the several departments. According to the new canon, the Council will not function until the first of June, but the way has been prepared for the transaction of business when that time comes. At the evening session the Constitution and By-Laws were adopted. Power was given to each department to add to its members, others not members of the Council and having a vote in the department, but no part in the deliberations of the Council. The Bishop is chairman of each department, and vice-chairmen who were elected to serve are as follows: Missions and Church Extension, the Rev. J. D. Wing, D. D.; Religious Education, the Rev. W. T. Dakin; Christian Social Service, the Rev. H. Hobart Barber; Finance, Mr. W. W. Williamson; Publicity, the Rev. John Moore Walker; Nation-Wide Campaign, the Rev. J. D. Wing, D. D.

Mr. Twiggs was elected Recording Secretary of the Council and Mr. Lee Treasurer.

E. D. J.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

Laymen's Banquet.

Laymen of the Archdeaconry of Altoona held a banquet in the Trinity Church Parish House (the Rev. F. T. Cady, rector) on April 26. There were seventy-five men present, fifty being from Tyrone and the rest from neighboring parishes. Mayor Beaston, of Tyrone, was the toastmaster. The speaker of the evening was Thomas H. Hammond, Esq., of Williamsport. His subject was the Relation of Men to the Church. Men from other parishes also spoke. One marked feature of the occasion was the silence of the clergy; the laymen did all the speaking. It was decided to organize a permanent Men's Club for the Archdeaconry. Looking to that end a committee was appointed consisting of Dr. White, Philipsburg; K. H. Rymer, Huntington, and W. B. Seward, Altoona.

TEXAS

Rt. Rev. G. H. Kinsolving, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Quin, D. D., Coadjutor.

Preaching Mission: Bishop Quin conducted an eight days' preaching mission in Calvary Church, Bastrop, some weeks ago, with most extraordinary results. His subject was the "Christian Program," and was thoroughly thought out, compactly reasoned, and delivered with immense driving force. The Bishop has called a Clergy Conference May 11.

The twenty-fifth anniversary of the ordination of the Rev. George B. Norton, D. D., rector of St. George's Church, Port Arthur, was recently observed. The Rev. A. D. Ellis and the choir of St. Mark's, Beaumont, participated in the special services. Dr. and Mrs. Norton were handsomely remembered by gifts and personal good wishes.

The young people's work, under the care of the Rev. Gordon Reese, is going forward with rapid strides. The aim now is to organize the Young People's Service League in every parish and mission. Two summer camps are being planned.

W. M. D.

EAST CAROLINA

Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop.

St. Stephen's, Red Springs and St. Matthews, Maxton, are now in charge of the Rev. Thomas F. Opie, who came from the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia the first of January. This is a missionary work in two important little towns, one of which, Red Springs, is the home of the large Presbyterian school, Flora MacDonald College. The county of Robeson was settled by the Scotch, and Presbyterians are the predominating denomination. Since Mr. Opie's coming the relationship of the whole community towards the Episcopal Church has been most kindly. A short time ago Mr. Opie was called on to conduct the Methodist prayer meeting in the absence of the pastor, and Sunday, May 1, he conducted a special service at the Presbyterian College. On May 15 he will preach the commencement sermon for the high school in the Presbyterian Church, St. Stephen's being too small to accommodate the students. On the fifth Sunday after Easter there was a special service held by request in the Episcopal Church in commemoration of the one hundred and second anniversary of the founding of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. The local lodge attended in a body, and Mr. Opie preached the sermon. In this way the prejudice that has existed against the Episcopal Church here, as in so many small towns where it is little known, is being dissipated and the whole community is coming to take a different view of the Church.

MARYLAND

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop.

The annual presentation service of the Sunday schools of the Diocese was held Sunday, May 1, in St. Michael and All Angels' Church, Baltimore. The grand total of offerings for the five fields of service amounted to $9,029.26, of which amount $6,667.94 is applied to the Nation-Wide Campaign quota. The largest total offering was made by the Sunday school of St. Michael and All Angels' Church, $989.36. The largest per capita offering was that of Grace and St. Peter's Church, being $11.72 for each member of the school.

R. F. H.

ERIE.

Rev. Jno. C. Ward, Bishop-Elect.

Erie: A few days ago the Bishop-elect, the Rev. John C. Ward, of Buffalo, made a special visit to the See City to meet the members of the Standing Committee, and also the Cathedral Chapter. The consecration of Mr. Ward will take place (if the Dioceses and Bishops give consent to his election) in Grace Church, Buffalo, some time in September.

About fifty members of the Woman's Auxiliary of St. Paul's Cathedral met in a social way and gave the dean and Mrs. Van Meter, who had been active workers, some mementoes of appreciation.

Ridgway: At the monthly meeting of the Men's Club of Grace Church Parish, the Rev. Jenkin Watkins, B. D., of St. Mary's, gave a remarkable address on "What Is Man?"

NEW JERSEY

Rt. Rev. Paul Matthews, D. D., Bishop.

In Trinity Church, Swedesboro, N. J., on Sunday, May 1, there were used for the first time the memorials which have been in the process of erection for some time. The first was a set of altar lights given in memory of Helen Mitchell, wife of James J. Davidson, Jr., a pulpit of white paneled columns with mahogany rail and brass trimmings in memory of Isaac H. Vanneman and Marietta Hewes, his wife. Mr. Vanneman was for almost fifty years a vestryman of the parish and grandson of Isaac Vanneman, who in 1784 was the master mason who built the church, and he was a grandson of Eli Vanneman, who lies buried in the old church yard, with a headstone dated 1721. A new eagle lectern, all of cast brass, a memorial to Revilla H. Poinsett, wife of William R. Poinsett, and an altar rail of white enameled spindles with mahogany top, given in memory of George Z. and Anna F. Mitchell, completes the list. The old church is of colonial design, and extreme care was used to have the new memorials harmonize with the general scheme of architecture, and the work has been well carried out, so that in all there is no clash of the old with the new. The church, which is an old colonial landmark, was built in 1784 and took the place of an earlier building erected by the Swedes in 1703, and is visited yearly by hundreds who come to admire the beauty so carefully preserved.

The Rev. Edgar Campbell has for nine years been rector of the parish.

FLORIDA.

Rt. Rev. E. G. Weed, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Confirms Large Class: In the Church of the Good Shepherd, Jacksonville, on Sunday, May 1, Bishop Weed confirmed a class of fifty-eight, presented by the rector, the Rev. M. R. Worcham.

Prayerlessness.

Much is said, and many complaints are made, about the feebleness of the Church to fulfil her calling, to exercise an influence over her members, to deliver them from the power of the world, and to bring them to a life of holy consecration to God. Much is also spoken about her indifference to the millions of heathen whom Christ entrusted to her that she might make known to them His love and salvation. What is the reason why many thousands of Christian workers in the world have not a greater influence? Nothing save this—the prayerlessness of their service. In the midst of all their zeal in the study, of all their faithfulness in the study and conversation with the people, they lack that ceaseless prayer which has attached to it the sure promise of the Spirit and the power from on high. It is nothing but the sin of prayerlessness which is the cause of the lack of a powerful spiritual life.—Andrew Murray.

When Shall We Learn?

What a vast portion of our lives is spent in anxious and useless forebodings concerning our own future or that of our dear ones! Present blessings slip by, and we miss half their sweet flavor, and all for want of faith in Him who provides for the tiniest insect in the sunbeam. Oh, when shall we learn the sweet trust in God that our little children teach us every day by their confiding faith in us. We, who are so mutable, so faulty, so irritable, so unjust; and He, who is so watchful, so pitiful; so loving, so forgiving. Why cannot we, slipping our hand in His each day, walk trustfully over that day's appointed path, thorny or flowery, crooked or straight, knowing that evening will bring us sleep, peace and home?—Phillips Brooks.

That which is built on selfishness cannot stand. The system of personal interest must be shivered to atoms. Therefore we, who have observed the ways of God in the past, are waiting in quiet but awful expectation until He shall confound this system, as He has confounded those that have gone before.—F. W. Robertson.

Personal Notes

The Rev. James H. Lamb, Jr., has been appointed by Bishop Rhinelander missionary in charge of the Mission of the Advent, Hatboro, and of St. Anne's, Willow Grove.

The Rev. Percy Foster Hall, of Epiphany Parish, Washington, who has accepted the call to become rector of St. Paul's Church, Alexandria, Va., will assume his duties May 15 and attend the Diocesan Council of Virginia May 18. He succeeds the Rev. Dr. P. P. Philips, who resigned several months ago, on account of ill health.

The Rev. Henry Attwell Post has accepted a call to the rectorship of Christ Church, Coudersport, Pa., and is to be addressed accordingly. He has been transferred to the Diocese of Harrisburg from the Missionary District of Nevada.

The address of the Rev. Francis W. Bliss, former rector of St. John's, Covington, Ky., will be St. Ann's Church, One Hundred and Fortieth Street and St. Anne's Avenue, the Bronx, New York City, after May 15.

The Rev. William Way, rector of Grace Church, Charleston, S. C., has accepted an invitation to preach the Baccalaureate sermon for the South Carolina Military College on June 12.

Ordinations.

Mr. Cornelius N. Dawson was ordained to the diaconate in St. James' First African Church, Baltimore, Ascension Day, May 5, by Bishop John G. Murray, D. D. The Rev. Dr. George F. Bragg, Jr., rector of the parish, preached the sermon. Archdeacon E. T. Helfenstein, D. D., presented the candidate. The Rev. Mr. Dawson will have charge of the colored congregation of St Philip's Chapel, Cumberland, Md.

How many kinds, measures and tones of meaning are comprehended in this word "Love"! So it is the common language, and even when one specific use of it has been excluded. So it is in Scripture. There is a difference in the love of God as God, of Jesus Christ as Saviour, of our friends and relations, of our neighbors, of our enemies, of our people, of our kind. It is all love, but with what various combinations of idea and measures of feeling! So on the divine side. The Father loved the Son; the Son loved the world; Jesus loved His own (in that common character); He loved them as individuals; He "loved Martha and Mary and Lazarus," and there was one disciple "whom Jesus loved." We are all sensible of the differences of impression conveyed in these connections, though it would be vain to attempt to describe them.—T. D. Bernard.

Dear Lord, let me follow in Thy footsteps here that at length I may see Thee face to face at the journey's end. May my work be so faithfully done and my loving faith so steadfastly stand that no pain may be hard to bear, no misunderstanding resented, since they prove me Thy servant. And as I look up to Thee for guidance, let some ray of light shine out from the eternal heaven that I may know my toil shall not be in vain. For Christ's sake. Amen.—Dr. Floyd Tompkins.

Not Merely

a counting house, but a people's bank and a useful servant in this community.

We believe that it is the duty of any company which serves the public to be a builder of good will in its community, and that its success depends upon the efficiency of its service.

3% interest on savings and dormant accounts. Interest figured on daily balances.

Irrespective of its size, we invite your account.

Richmond Trust Company

Capital and Surplus, $1,200,000

Main and 7th Streets

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary
J. M. Leake, General Agent
E. B. Addison, Vice-President
J. C. Watson, Treasurer
Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

You Can Send Your Boy or Girl to Any College in This State

At but small sacrifice to yourself through our "COLLEGE PLAN"

Ask or write for booklet

If you will begin to prepare while they are young

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK

Tenth and Main Sts. Richmond, Virginia

"The Bank with the Three Doors of Opportunity"

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson
Security Storage Company, Inc.

Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage

Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

Ladies Keep Your Skin Clear, Sweet, Healthy With Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Talcum

O. Luetke's Art Works

Church Furnishings

IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.

Est. 1886. 328-332 7th Ave. New Yor

Beautiful Monogram Stationery

Any monogram in red, blue, gold, or silver, on any of six colors of Linen Finish Paper, $ .00. Send for style sheet and information how to get a box. Free

WAG MFG. CO., 224 So. 8TH ST., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

PRE-WAR PRICES

$15 the Hundred; 20cts. singly.

New Songs of Praise and Power, No. 3. (Just off Press)

150 Gospel Sunday School Songs. 22 Responsive Readings. Returnable Sample sent on request.

HALL-MACK CO., 21st & Arch Sts., Phila., Pa.

The next time you buy calomel ask for

Calotabs

The purified and refined calomel tablets that are nauseless, safe and sure.

Medicinal virtues retained and improved. Sold only in sealed packages. Price 35c.

Spring and Summer Suits $25 to $50

They are Suits made to hold their own against any competition. They are the best values offered for a long time. Examine their woolens, their skillful workmanship, their style, and you'll need no further encouragement for a selection.

Shoes, Hats,

Furnishings,

and Boys' Clothes.

Mail orders solicited

Horace S. Wright Co.

Broad at First,

RICHMOND, VA.

The Best of the New Things for Springtime

In the enthusiastic seeking of "lower prices" which seems to have become so general during recent months, there is danger, we think, of overstepping the bounds of true economy and mistaking the cheap and tawdry for the low-in-price.

This is one reason why you will find a visit to this store particularly helpful at this time, in fulfilling your plans for the new season.

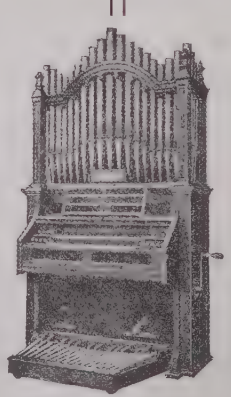
No unworthy goods may find a place among the stocks, and we think you may safely rely upon our taste and good judgment in selection.

And while everything here is of the same high, dependable quality that has always been characteristic at MILLER & RHOADS, prices are now materially lower.

To-day the store is gaily decked out in its spring-time dress, splendidly ready to serve your every need, whether for articles of apparel and personal adornment or for the home.

Miller & Rhoads

"The Shopping Center" Richmond, Va.



There's a Word

frequently used now-a-days that sometimes is meant and sometimes isn't.

The word is "SERVICE," and we leave it to you to determine whether we mean it.

The Union Bank of Richmond

1104 East Main Street

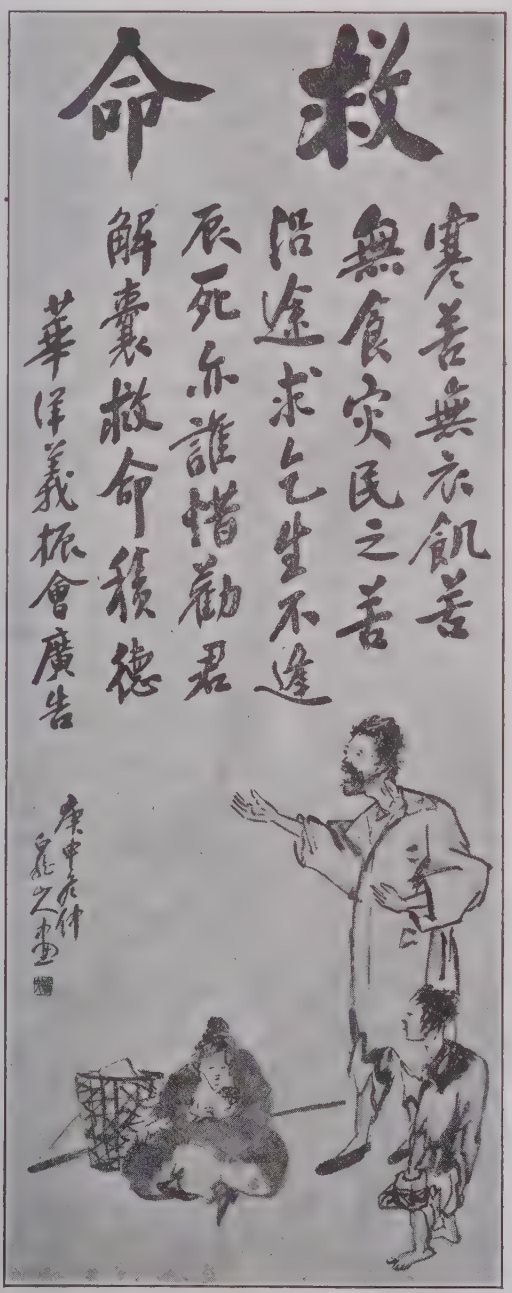
For Church and Home

Organs

A beautifully illustrated catalog, showing styles and prices, of the famous Estey, Packard and Corley Organs will be sent on request.

The Corley Company stock is the most complete in the entire South.

Easy payment terms will be arranged.



The Corley Company

The South's Great Musical Dept. Store

213 E. Broad Street, RICHMOND, VA.

Southern Churchman

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., MAY 21, 1921. No. 21

Poster used in Famine Relief Drive at Shanghai, sent by Bishop Graves to Southern Churchman

CHINA CALLS!

"China calls us; shall we hearken,
And in mercy send her cheer?
We will hearken and will hasten
To send help from far and near.

China calls us; in her sorrow;
In her hour of want and care.
Do not wait until the morrow;
Answer now her heartfelt prayer!

They are hungry;they are thirsty;
They are dying in the cold.
As we feed them; ye do feed me;
Says the Shepherd of the fold."

EDUCATIONAL

SEWANEE MILITARY ACADEMY

53rd year. In an ideal spot, heart of the Cumberland mountains, 2,000 feet elevation. College preparatory; also equips for citizenship. Military instruction secures regularity, neatness, respect, promptitude. Student body are boys of character who are developed into manly men of purpose. 40-acre added domain. Vigorous outdoor life; all athletics R. O. T. C. Episcopal. Early registration advisable. Catalog. Address The Principal, Sewanee, Tenn.

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to
REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean
Petersburg, Va.

The Virginian Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-third year of this School for Boys opens September 15, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

Virginia, Chatham. Box 13.

The Chatham Episcopal Institute for Girls

Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Thorough preparation for all colleges. New buildings. Ten-acre campus. Athletics. Gymnasium. Terms moderate. Catalogue and views.

B. D. Tucker, D. D., President; Rev. C. O. Pruden, D. D., Rector; Miss Annie Marian Powell, A. B., Sweet Briar, A. M., Columbia, Prin.

St. Christopher's School

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND, VA.

A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.

Eleventh session begins September 21, 1921. Tuition in boarding department, limited to twenty-two boys, $650. For catalogue, address

REV. C. G. CHAMBERLAYNE, PH. D., HEADMASTER

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university. Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to

REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

If we do not worship God it is a sign of not knowing His blessings.

It is well for us that we do not choose our own trials.

"No work is futile that is nobly planned,
No deed is little if but greatly done."

The truth we hate most is the one that points out the sin we love most.

It is still as safe to trust God as it was in the days of Job.

The piety which is honored in the home will easily stand any other test.

Industrial equity without religion is a light brig on a smooth sea. When the tidal wave comes it will be engulfed

We cannot follow Christ and neglect our daily work; but when it is well and faithfully done, in His name and for His sake, He is as near us as when we kneel before Him in the place of prayer.—Dr. A. Smellie.

If thou wouldst not slip back into sin, thou must stretch forward to Christ and His holiness.

When Christ is made by a sinner only his medicine, not his meat, things are all wrong. He must be not only all our salvation, but all our desire.

If the God of love is most appropriately worshipped in the Christian temple, the God of nature may be equally honored in the temple of science. Even from its lofty minarets the philosopher may summon the faithful to prayer and the priest and sage exchange altars without the compromise of faith or knowledge.—Sir David Brewster.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,

REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.

A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. College preparatory. Boarding department 503 W. Franklin Street. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health; out-door life.

MISS ROSALIE H. NOLAND, Principal

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLES TOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

HOBART COLLEGE For Men
William Smith College for Women

GENEVA, N. Y.

100th Year Opens September 20, 1921

Hobart offers a large number of scholarships to students preparing for Holy Orders.

RT. REV. CHARLES H. BRENT, D. D., LL. D., CHANCELLOR

RET. MURRAY BARTLETT, D. D., PRESIDENT

For information address the President

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

The Ninety-ninth Session Open Wednesday, September 21, 1921

For catalogs and other information, address The Dean, Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia.

Rockford College

A Standard College
For Modern Women

A college of distinguished graduates, seventy years of fine traditions and high standards of scholarship. A. B., B. S., A. M. degrees.

Reservations Limited

Send for Catalog

Wm. A. Maddox, Ph. D., Pres.
Box 478, Rockford, Illinois

EDUCATIONAL

FAUQUIER INSTITUTE

FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES WARRENTON, VA.

The 62nd session begins September 29, 1921. Situated in Piedmont region of Virginia, 55 miles from Washington. A limited and thorough home school. Modern buildings, 5-acre campus. Catalog.

MISS NELLIE V. BUTLER, PRINCIPAL, BOX 17

National Cathedral School

A Boarding and Day School for Girls. Fireproof buildings in Cathedral Close of 40 acres. College Preparatory. Advanced and Special Courses. Music and Art.

The Bishop of Washington,
President of the Board of Trustees.
Jessie C. McDonald, M. S., Principal.
Mount St. Alban, Washington, D. C.

Have You Selected Your School?

Enrollments are now being made for the ensuing school year. Many institutions already have a waiting list. If you find it difficult to make a choice, the Southern Churchman will be glad to assist you. Address

Southern Churchman School Bureau
815 East Grace St.
Richmond, Va.

"The Store That Pleases"

FOR FURNITURE

JONES BROS. & CO.

INCORPORATED

1418 East Main St. :-: Richmond, Va

The Norfolk Convention

Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States
The thirty-sixth annual national gathering of clergy and laity of the Church

NORFOLK, VA.

Wednesday to Sunday, October 12 to 16, 1921
The first convention in the South since 1914

The program and speakers will be announced later
For information, address

BROTHERHOOD OF ST ANDREW
CHURCH HOUSE, 202 SOUTH 19TH STREET
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

"Holy God, we praise Thy name,
Lord of all, we bow before Thee,
All on earth Thy scepter claim,
All in heaven above adore Thee;
Infinite Thy vast domain,
Everlasting is Thy name."

Absolute sincerity is a primary requisite today for any one who hopes to become a leader. A happy aptitude of expression and a good vocabulary, of course, will help, but no words can long veil our purpose, or make up for a fundamental lack of moral earnestness. The soul will express itself even when our words seek to create a totally different impression.—Arthur Wallace.

No man can do his praying a week ahead, any more than he can do his breathing today for tomorrow.

Him evermore I behold
Walking in Galilee,
Through the cornfield's waving gold,
In hamlet, in wood and in wold,
By the shores of the Beautiful Sea
He toucheth the sightless eyes;
Before Him the demons flee;
To the dead He sayeth: Arise!
To the living: Follow Me!
And the voice still soundeth on
From the centuries that are gone,
To the centuries that shall be!
—Longfellow.

The highest angel does not tempt us because he is of another race from us; but God is our continual incitement, because we are His children.—Phillips Brooks.

There is no calm like that when storm is done;
There is no pleasure keen as pain's release;
There is no joy that lies so deep as peace,
No peace so deep as that by struggle won.
—Helen G. Cone.

Spirituality is not gained by struggling: it is to be claimed. It is not imitation of a heavenly ideal; it is the importation of the divine power which alone can realize that ideal. "The letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life." The written Word reveals the character of the spiritual life and exhorts to its fulfilment; but it as faithfully reveals that the life can be lived only by the in-wrought power of God. We are to "serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter." There is little blessing for any Christian until he abandons the principle of living by rules and learns to walk by the Spirit in God-ordained liberty and in flesh and unbroken fellowship with his Lord. The divine precepts will then be kept by the power of God.—Lewis Perry Chafer.

SUMMER CAMPS

The growing popularity of camps for young people attests the benefit to mind and body of open air and well regulated exercise. Select your camp now. The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN will help you to make a choice.

CAMP NAVAJO FOR GIRLS

7-16 years. On beautiful Lake Thompson, Maine. (Via Bar Harbor exp. from New York, one night.) Rat $200 (no extras). Mid pines and birches on hill slop ing down to lake. Full program of water and land sport taught by experienced councillors. Handicraft, folk and interpretative dancing. Excellent food. Physician and nurse. Catalog. Register before June 1st. CLARA HENDERSON, Dir., 1530 Linden Ave., Baltimore, Md.

CAMP MINNEHAHA

for Girls "Home Care; Camp Fun." In the "Land of the Sky." Altitude 2,000 feet. Eight weeks' season, $200. MRS. BELLE ABOTT ROXBY, Bat Cave, N. C.

Trail's End

The Kentucky Camp for Girls
Write for Booklet

MISS M. D. SNYDE
363 S. BROADWAY
LEXINGTON, KY.

HIGHLANDS, NORTH CAROLINA

THE DAVIS HOUSE

Tenth Session Opens June 1st

Altitude, 4,000 feet. An invogorating climate and most comfortable house. Church people preferred.

Address MRS. M. MARTIN

SAFES

L. N. COOKE SAFE & LOCK CO.
807 East Franklin St.
Richmond, Va.

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS

FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG

S. T. Beveridge & Co.

Office: 1217 East Cary Street
Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd
Richmond, Va.

Jno. L. Williams & Sons

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565)
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds

Earn Extra Dollars in Your Spare Hours

You need no experience to be successful—You can learn as you earn. Let us tell you about our plan.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN is the oldest Episcopal Church Paper published in America. Every dollar received in subscriptions will be devoted to the improvement of the paper and the extension of its service in the work of the Church.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

Street.....

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson
Security Storage Company, Inc.
Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage
Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

The Evangelical Education Society
Of the Protestant Episcopal Church

Office: The Church House, Twelfth and Walnut Streets, Philadelphia

AIDS STUDENTS FOR THE MINISTRY AND DISTRIBUTES EVANGELICAL LITERATURE

President: WILLIAM S. HARVEY, ESQ.
Active Vice-President: The Rt. Rev. THOMAS J. GARLAND, D. D.

General Counsel	Treasurer	General Secretary
HAROLD GOODWIN, Esq.	ALFRED LEE, Esq.	Rev. S. LORD GILBERSON, M A.

FORM OF BEQUEST

I give and bequeath to "THE EVANGELICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH," incorporated by the legislature of Pennsylvania, the first Monday in November, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine, ———— dollars, or ———— real estate, to be used for the general purpose of the Society.

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor
Richmond, Va.

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS

Largest stock in the South
We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival
The Couper Marble Works
(Established 65 years)
264-268 Bank St., Norfolk, Va

J. & R. Lamb
23-25-27 SIXTH AVENUE NEW YORK
MEMORIALS IN STAINED GLASS
MOSAIC · MARBLE · STONE · GRANITE
CARVED WOOD · METAL · ETC.

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., MAY 21, 1921. No. 21

THE TRINITY IN LIFE

No man has ever yet explained to the satisfaction of Christian people all that is meant by the doctrine of the Trinity, and it is not likely that any one ever will. It is a mystery too vast for human fathoming. It is like the infinite spaces between the stars which we know are there, but upon the fringes of which the farthest searchlight of our human knowledge melts before the high unknown.

Yet, though we know that the profound meaning of the Trinity will always be a mystery greater than our understanding, we can still be sure that this doctrine need not be left as a mere abstraction which we accept because we are taught it, and which means to us nothing real. It can be instead the most vital reality of our every-day experience if we will try to seize hold of it not as a philosophy of the mind, but as a fact for religion to live by. In the New Testament there is no mention of the Trinity by name, but there is the record of those experiences which are the reflection in us of what the Trinity must be. "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with us all, evermore," wrote St. Paul. Here is his expression of the way in which Christians apprehended then, and can apprehend today, the life of the Threefold God.

We begin with the personality of Jesus. He is for us the Way, the Truth and the Life. As we draw close to Him in simple obedience we come to understand the inexpressible wonder of what He was and is. We take Him as divine in that His life becomes for us the supreme and infinite authority.

As Jesus becomes authoritative for us in the things that we know, so He becomes for us the interpreter of that which is as yet unknown. We believe that the unseen must be like this highest life which men have seen. God's love must be a love like the love of Jesus. God's character must be like His. Back of all the strange mystery of human destinies, back of life's sorrow and pain and shadow, we believe that we can trust the Father to Whom Jesus prayed, and hold to Him as Lord of heaven and earth.

And, in the third place, we believe that the richness of God can dwell within ourselves. He Who was revealed in Jesus, He Who dwells in the place of authority over this universe and all its long unfolding, can come to incarnate Himself afresh in each believing soul. Our life can grow to be the product, not of our weak human intentions and our broken human forces, but of the re-creating Spirit of the Holy One Himself.

This is not an expression of the doctrine of the Trinity which would be sufficient for a formal theology, but it is enough for Christians to live by every day.

A TIME FOR ACTION

"If another war like the last one should come, the professing Christians of the United States will be responsible for every drop of blood that will be shed and for every dollar wastefully expended."

Who says that?

A pacifist?

A "theorist," opposed to military action under any circumstances?

No.

The man who says that is General Tasker H. Bliss, formerly chief-of-staff of the United States Army. He says it in a letter to the Church Peace Union, in support of the appeal made by four of the largest religious organizations in this country—the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, the National Catholic Welfare Council, the Central Conference of American Rabbis, and the United Synagogue of America—on behalf of the calling of an international conference to consider disarmament. Thousands of clergymen in America will be asked to read on June 5 to their congregations resolutions in favor of disarmament, and hundreds of thousands of individual Christians will be asked to write to their Congressmen insisting that a disarmament conference be called.

Says General Bliss:

"I would not take a single step in the way of disarmament except as the result of an agreement, thoroughly acceptable to us, between ourselves and the other principal nations engaged in the armament rivalry. I have not the faintest idea of what form that first agreement might take. I have, therefore, no scheme of disarmament to propose. My sole purpose is to have such an international conference. Either there is no practical common sense among the people of the United States, or else they now know the essential facts that point to the necessity of such a conference.

"The farmers of the United States apparently are of the belief that some action must be taken by our government to relieve the depression in their affairs. They have gotten together and have put pressure upon their Congressmen and the latter, in their turn, have put pressure upon the government, with the certainty that now, rightly or wrongly, something is going to be done.

"If the farmers had not done this or had continued talking among themselves in their various conventions, nothing would have been done. If the clergymen of the United States want to secure a limitation of armaments they can do it now without any further waste of time."

What shall we say to that?

Can we deny the plain truth of what General Bliss says?

Can American Christendom fail to see its opportunity?

Seeing it let us resolve to make it good!

TRAINING FOR SOCIAL SERVICE

If the ideals which exist in this Church of ours are to be brought into living touch with practical affairs and turned thereby into an effective social service, there is need that the Social Service Commissions of the various Dioceses shall become far more conscious of their possibilities, and more clearly committed to definite programs of effort than now they are. Individual Christians cannot touch community problems while they remain unrelated individuals. There must be some body of leaders who shall know with expertness what ideals of social betterment mean, and what are the ways which knowledge and experience point out for the attainment of these. The Department of Social Service of the general Church, which has its headquarters in New York, is, of course, the central agency of the Church for counsel and advice in the whole matter of social service, but, obviously, this central department is helpless to bring its influence to bear on local problems unless there are local commissions whom it can inspire and set to work. Thus the key to the situation, if our Church is to become efficient in community helpfulness, is the Diocesan Commission, and to strengthen the Diocesan Commission is the most important present need in order that the social service machinery of the Church may function.

Knowing this, the central authorities have planned what is, in our judgment, the wisest and most helpful thing that the Department of Social Service has for a long time attempted, and Dean Lathrop, the secretary of the Department, is to be congratulated on the clear good sense which saw a need and has set out to meet it. There is to be held in Milwaukee, from the 20th to the 23d of June, a conference of social service workers of our Church from all over the country. The time and place chosen have particular significance because the great Conference for Social Work, which brings together annually the leaders in the churches and out of them from all parts of the nation, is to meet in Milwaukee in the days immediately following those which have been set for this particular conference of the Church. At this conference of our own the definite objective will be the training of representatives of our social service commissions in what they can attempt and do. For the first time, leaders of these commissions from many Dioceses will meet together to discuss their problems, to share their experiences, to find out what lines of work have been found successful, and out of this whole interchange to shape ideas and programs which men everywhere can go back to their own communities and begin to put into practice. It is not too much to say that upon the results of this conference will depend the amount of influence which the Church is going to exert for public helpfulness in this whole country in the immediate future. Every Diocesan Commission ought to see to it that if in any way possible it shall be represented at the gathering in Milwaukee.

THE CALL TO STAY

A news item in our issue of last week is worthy of more than passing notice. "Nobody in New York," said our correspondent in that city, "supposed that any ordained man called to the place would decline the rectorship of Trinity Parish." And so New York, having heard that a schoolmaster named Drury had been called to Trinity, the richest parish in America, if not in the world, was simply waiting with some curiosity to see what kind of a man he was and how he would measure up to such an exalted and conspicuous position. But Dr. Drury declined such an election—think of that! Not that he failed to realize the large responsibilities and opportunities attached to the rectorship of this great metropolitan parish, he is not lacking in intelligence, but there was his work at St. Paul's School, Concord, to be considered, and considered first. "It does not serve the cause of religious progress for a man to leave one form of activity half done in order to take up work elsewhere," Dr. Drury is reported to have written to Trinity's vestry; and because he had undertaken work at a great school which he had not completed he thought he ought to stay and carry it forward.

Trinity will get a rector in good time; but Dr. Drury has said a thing out loud to which the big world, somewhat cynical of clerical sincerity, might wisely give heed. It is something that a man thought to be large enough for the rectorship of Trinity should be content to remain rector of a Church school, thus magnifying an office of which many would think lightly; but it is more that he should have demonstrated the spirit of devotion to present duty which ought to, and, in the main, does, actuate the ministry of the Church, and which is illustrated in numberless cases as signally, if not as conspicuously, as in this instance.

THE NEED FOR STUDY

As one contemplates the life of ministers in these times of ours, one wonders whether there is not danger that our information will crowd out wisdom. There are so many things that have to be learned about that the clergymen may not stop to ponder anything deeply. They have to attend so many committee meetings, arrange so many details of parish machinery, make so many decisions about little practical affairs, that they cannot stop to think through the deeper questions that underlie all life. Yet it is certainly true that unless men in the ministry fill their own spirits from the wells of great, deep thoughts, they cannot counsel wisely. Their life and service will become arid unless from them there flows the river of intellectual quickening which is fed from the living springs.

In the recent biography of Bishop Greer there is a paragraph which helps to explain the fertility of his ministry, and it is well worth reading by all who are in the ministry today. Thus it runs:

"While Mr. Greer was receiving this inspiration from men, some of whom would have been accounted great in any community, he was spending almost every evening with the thoughts of men in printed books. It was his custom to withdraw after supper to his study, and there he would read late into the night. He read Darwin. His friends believed that there was nothing of Herbert Spencer's which he did not read: indeed, when he was approached by Cornell University to be its Professor of Ethics he confessed that the one thing which attracted him was that it would give him an opportunity to "answer" Spencer. Huxley, too, he read voraciously: Huxley's frank agnosticism earned his respect even while he fought it with the simple faith which his mother had given him. Haeckel, with his brutal denials, fascinated him like a dangerous serpent: he must get his heel upon it. Tyndall among the scientists, Martineau among the theologians, Matthew Arnold among the critics, Lecky and Symonds among the historians, Browning among the poets, he read over and over. He would often say of Martineau, "He saved my soul." He went to Browning not only for poetical expression, but for the subtle thought upon modern problems. He was fond of George Eliot. Sometimes those who did not know Mr. Greer intimately felt that he spoke with too rapt enthusiasm over the last book which he chanced to be reading. This enthusiasm, however, was not the abiding enthusiasm of his reading days and nights. "What are you reading?" asked his neighbor, Julius Atwood. "Nothing but Carlyle," was the answer. He also exulted in the new voice which spoke out of the unknown; he was glad to have a new witness for the truth as he saw it; but he always went back to the great men who seemed to him to have expressed the profoundest notes of the age, whether it were in science, theology or art."

Many men will say they have not time to read. Yet it is usually true that men can somehow make time for the things they recognize to be profoundly important. The trouble with many clergymen is that they have not faced this importance. They know that they can get up in their pulpits on Sunday mornings, and with a certain practiced fluency say something for a decent number of minutes. Some—God save the mark!—even boast of the fact that on such a Sunday morning they went into their pulpit not having had a chance to think of anything whatever except the text. They are not conscious of how superficial their preaching is—how thin and futile a stream for minds and spirits which are really thirsty for fresh thought and inspiration. If they realize this they will begin to insist with themselves that they must study and meditate. Some men, of course, with the pitiful salaries they receive, do not possess many books; but here is a chance for the service of the circulating libraries which are already being established in the Dioceses. But with many books or few, the man who feels the urgency of his mental preparation can begin to win that culture which too many so lightly forego. It is a question fundamentally of realizing the sacredness of the preacher's responsibility, and seeing to it that one shall use the utmost of his chance to bring his mind, for his people's sake, into touch with great thoughts which stimulate and inspire.

Book Notices

Essays, Speculative and Political. By the Rt. Hon. Arthur James Balfour. George H. Doran Company. Price $3.

Herein are gathered a number of essays on various subjects written by Mr. Balfour at various times. The volume is divided into two parts, the first consisting of five essays of a speculative nature on subjects as wide ranging as these—"Decadence," "Beauty and the Criticism of Beauty," "Bergson's Creative Evolution," "Francis Bacon" and "Psychical Research." The second part of the book, containing also five essays, deals with political subjects, the first of them on "Anglo-German Relations," written for a German periodical in 1912, being an analysis, grave and unimpassioned, yet startlingly prophetic, of the tendencies in Germany which England feared to be pointing toward a European catastrophe.

The whole book is an illustration of the richly furnished mind of this English statesman, and a reminder of the high quality of intellect which the long tradition of public service has so often put at the command of the British people. One hopes that the times to come will not lose its insistence upon the educated mind through some turn of political chance which makes the shallow or the mediocre intellect seem good enough for practical purposes. Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson might have gathered together a collection of essays illustrating such a range of scholarly interest as this book of Mr. Balfour's, but imagine its being produced by a Lloyd-George or a Mr. Harding!

B.

Russia in the Shadows. By H. G. Wells. George H. Doran Company. Price $1.50.

The fact that a book bears Mr. Wells' name is sufficient assurance that it is written with the brilliant vividness which captures interest and holds it to the end. This brief account of his recent journey to Russia is no exception. It presents an unforgettable and convincing picture of what at least a part of Russia is today. It is a tragic picture, and one that should arrest the grave contemplation of all those who ponder the effect of the Russian collapse upon the civilization of the world. Mr. Wells exposes the fallacy of Marxian socialism, but at the same time he makes it clear that the breakdown of Russia was not caused by the forces now in control, but by the arrogant stupidity of the old regime. He believes that the Bolshevik government must be accepted and worked with as the defacto power in Russia, and that to the United States particularly, because of its tremendous resources, belongs the opportunity of rescuing Russia economically, and therefore rescuing the future not only of Europe, but of us all. "The only alternative," says Mr. Wells, "to such a helpful intervention in Bolshevik Russia is, I firmly believe, the final collapse of all that remains of modern civilization throughout what was formerly the Russian Empire. It is highly improbable that the collapse will be limited to its boundaries. Both eastward and westward other great regions may, one after another, tumble into the big hole in civilization thus created. Possibly all modern civilization may tumble in."

B.

I Believe: Sermons on the Apostles' Creed. By G. A. Studdert Kennedy. George H. Doran Company. Price $1.50.

During the war the author of this book was a chaplain with the British forces in France, widely known and greatly beloved among the troops, and known also at that time to numbers who had never seen him through his "Rough Rhymes of a Padre." Back again in the work of a parish church in England, he has written this book, which can be described rightly only in superlative terms. It is quite safe to say that no book just like it has ever been written before. It is an explanation of the meaning of the Apostles' Creed, or at least those parts of it which have to do with our faith in God the Father, and with Jesus, and the facts concerning Him which the creed recounts. The style has all the homely vividness and the direct, incisive man-to-manness which might have been used to the men in the trenches. No simplest reader could misunderstand the meaning of what is written; and yet there are thoughts in these chapters which can lay hold of the most profound mind and point it on ways of great suggestion. No book which has come to us in a long time for review is more thoroughly worth recommending than this.

B.

The Kingdom Round the Corner. By Coningsby Dawson. Cosmopolitan Company. Price $2.

Coningsby Dawson was known best in the years of the war as the author of "Carry On," one of the finest of the messages which came back from the front; but he was a novelist before the war, and has gone back to the making of novels again. This book is the story of two men who returned from the great struggle to discover how greatly they themselves had changed, and how changed the woman with whom one of them had been in love, and the England in which they all must live again. From the background of the story emerges another woman who becomes the heroine of the tale, and the climax of the narrative is generally satisfactory to all concerned.

Mr. Dawson's treatment of his characters is sometimes more like a moving picture than it is like life. He simply sets them down in the proper circumstances for the desired results without such development of his characters meanwhile as makes one quite understand how they arrive where all of a sudden they appear. Nevertheless, the book has distinct charm, and is starred here and there with flashes of genuine poetry. Moreover, in its description of the mood of men who came back from the front and found the nation they had fought for a long way short of the ideals they had believed in, there is a challenge to our own thinking of what the war was for, and of how we may redeem its purpose.

B.

My Son. By Corra Harris. George H. Doran Company. Price $1.90.

This is a new volume by an author already known to thousands through her previous work, "A Circuit Rider's Wife." This new novel is more than a novel. It is the reflection through a singularly sensitive and discriminating spirit of the grandeur and the pitifulness, the fire and the clay, or our ordinary human nature trying to be religious.

The book depends upon no plot whatsoever. It is simply the record from his mother's point of view of a man who followed his father into the ministry, disdaining at first his father's old-fashioned ideas, but coming back at length, chastened by experience, to much that his father had emphasized before. The style reflects the insight and the keen, human penetration of the author, gently satirical, yet reaching heights of noble emotion, too. Any minister, or other busy man, who turns from his more serious study to pick up this book will find in it not only recreation, but the fertile seed of fruitful ideas about the Church and the people in it.

B.

THE CHURCH'S MESSAGE FOR THE DAY

From the Convention Address of Bishop Charles D. Williams, D. D., of Michigan

The Church must have a message to deliver as well as a service to render. . . . We must not only have a message, but a message for the day, the day in which we live and in which the Lord has laid His burden upon us. And never was there a day in which it required more wisdom to discover the message or more courage to deliver it.

It is a day of disillusionment, when men, bitter with disappointment in the failure of high visions hitherto cherished, turn in wrath upon all new seers and prophets and sometimes stone and crucify them. Men normally cool, sane and balanced in judgment, are seeing red and are afraid of their very shadows. The foundations of the world order are out of course, and the structures of civilization are tottering and reeling. Many with common consent look to the Church of Jesus Christ as the only stable institution in the midst of this shifting chaos, and to the religion and gospel of Jesus Christ as offering the only effective and final solvent of our crucial problems. And yet they are often afraid of what that gospel and religion may have to say and resent the message when uttered.

The Church is groping for her message. Prophetic voices, hitherto solitary, have been gathered into choruses of official and semi-official utterances. A literature of such utterances is accumulating. Barely to name those utterances would make quite a lengthy list. For example:

The platform of the Canadian Wesleyan and the Canadian Presbyterian Assembly, the declaration of the Methodist Episcopal Bishops, of the Catholic Welfare Commission, and the War Commission of the Roman Catholic Hierarchy, of various Congregational Associations, the Social Creed of the Churches, promulgated by the Federal Council and since adopted by the National Y. M. C. A. in its convention in Detroit, the report of the Commission on Christianity and Industrial Relations appointed by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the reports of the committees of the Lambeth Conference on Christianity and Industrial Relations and Christianity and International Relations and the resolutions of the conferences thereon, etc., etc. Out of such declarations the lines of the Church's message for the times are emerging. There is her message for the prevailing social discontent and industrial unrest.

In none of these utterances does the Church take sides with any particular "isms," "capitalism," "socialism," or least of all of course with syndicalism or Bolshevism which finds only universal abhorrence for its outrages. In none of them are specific social, economic or industrial nostrums advocated. They contain only for the most part sane, well-balanced, carefully thought out statements of plain, simple Christian principles in their bearing on the present situation.

They assert, as for instance does the resolution of the Lambeth Conference, the fundamental and essential right and duty of the Church and her ministry to speak boldly and plainly on all moral issues, all issues of righteousness and justice involved in any question economic, industrial and social.

They declare in most instances that so long as the state of welfare necessarily involved in our present industrial system continues, both sides in the conflict have equal right to organize for the protection of their several interests, and there must be some kind of collective bargaining between them.

But they view with abhorrence the intolerable evils necessarily resulting from that conflict, evils that characterize equally both sides; the frequent dishonesty, graft and trickery of the labor unions, the tyranny of the closed shop, the violence and force used to secure demands, the limitation of production, the slacking of duty, the repudiations of responsibility and of obligations. And also the equal frequent dishonesty, graft, chicanery and trickery on the other side, the equal use of violence and force, the despicable system of espionage, the control of legislatures, the frequent tyranny of the so-called open shop which is sometimes open only at the back door through which labor may slink in only one by one to make what bargain it can as helpless individuals dealing with overwhelming masses of organized power.

They would eliminate it by substituting co-operation in common service for the present competition of private greed. They declare, in the language of the Lambeth Conference, that in order to that end "there must be a change in both the spirit and the working of our present system." As in certain vocations, like teaching and the ministry, service is ideally established as the paramount motive and the returns for service are only the means for carrying on that service, so it must be throughout industry, if we are to have peace, production and, above all, a stable Christian civilization. So long as men on the one side can say without shame, "I am in business simply to make money and nothing else. I am going to get all I can get. I am going to extract all the traffic will bear, regardless of consequence to anybody else; my limit is the sky; my business is my business and nobody's else," and so long as men on the other side can say, "I work for wages and nothing else, and I am going to get all I can by use of the power of combination or the law of supply and demand with as little and inefficient service rendered as possible with only so much production as I am compelled to produce"—so long as men work with such motives, we are bound to have warfare, violence, dishonesty, tyranny and oppression, and the public will suffer most of all.

It is only as every man can say "my business, whatever it may be, whether ruling a nation or digging ditches, is the 'Father's business,' part of His plan for an ordered world, for the service and welfare of His children, and the 'Father's' will and order. In human service and welfare this shall be my supreme motive, and material returns, necessary as they are, shall be the means to that end, like coal under the boiler to keep the wheels going"—it is only as man can say that from the heart that the kingdom can come or even civilization stand.

That, as I gather it from many utterances, is the generally accepted message of the Church today to the industrial world.

On international relations the Church has spoken in official utterance with practical unanimity. She stands for peace, to be realized in such practical measures as universal disarmament and the substitution of the arbitrament of reason for the arbitrament of force in an association or league of nations.

A NEW SPIRIT NEEDED IN THE CHURCH.

We look out on the great multitude of those who have had the unprivileged and the subordinate places in the world, and we complain and devise plans for restraint and keeping things as they were, and we have scant understanding of our time and the meaning of these movements. The most thoughtful among us have hardly passed beyond the point which the blind man had reached in seeing men and trees walking. We cannot interpret the hopes and the desires and longings of the great multitude of our fellowmen. We are like those who disputed whether it was a voice out of heaven or whether it thundered. Most people think it is thundering, and that may be a mistake. I think myself that confusing and distracting as are the cries and the demands and the efforts of men it is a voice out of heaven, and woe is to those who cannot hear God speaking to them. Our attitude toward the multitude of our brethren is often one of distrust and antagonism, and the attitude of our blessed Lord was one of infinite compassion and love and patience and helpfulness, and His attitude is the true one. A good many of us who are strong and rigid in our thoughts about the office of the Church, and our interpretation of our Lord's life and words are like those disciples who stood in our Lord's way, hindering the mothers from bringing their children to be blessed by Him, and telling the blind beggar of Jericho not to trouble the Master, whose exclusive companionship belonged to them.

Suppression and deportation and denunciation are not the final words, not the remedy, but a Christian sympathy, and a better understanding, appreciation of the causes of the movements which disturb us, more brotherly kindness in business, more co-operation, more profit-sharing, more fellowship, more justice, less patronizing, more good, practical religion. . . . Get a new spirit into the churches, a spirit of brotherly kindness. . . . Think more of justice than of charity.—Bishop Lines.

If the New Testament is the standard of value or importance as between the various doctrines of the Christian Creed, then the doctrine of the Holy Spirit necessarily claims little less than a primacy of importance in the devout and reverent thought of the Christian world. It is thus more prominent than the doctrine of the Church. In the Epistles, as in the Gospels, long passages turn upon the gift of the Spirit. The promise of the Spirit, His functions, His descent at Pentecost, His subsequent operation, His relation to the human spirit, His testimony, His influence, and the graces and virtues of which He is the author, are subjects constantly present to the Christians of the New Testament, and strangely forgotten by Christians in the later history of the Church.—Bishop Welldon.

Quotas and Returns

The Bishop of North Carolina, in his Council address, speaks both justly and wisely on a matter of grave concern to some of the neighboring Dioceses as well as to his own in regard to the Nation-Wide Campaign and its results.

"That the scheme, as proposed by its originators, was practical, and calculated to produce amazing results for good, is proved by the experience of those Dioceses which carried the work through to success. Not only have those Dioceses themselves been helped, both spiritually and materially, but even by the very limited success which was attained throughout the Church at large, the whole general work of the Church, domestic and foreign, has been lifted out of a slough of despond and put upon a new level of hope and efficiency. Had all the Dioceses responded loyally and generously to the leadership of those whom the Church put in charge of this great movement, and made a sincere effort to do what they were asked to do, the predictions of its most enthusiastic advocates would have been abundantly fulfilled.

"But the stubborn fact confronts us that, as a whole, the Church throughout the United States did not carry out the proposed scheme, and the Nation-Wide Campaign, as nation-wide, failed. I am not saying this in idle retrospect, not in useless criticism. I am calling attention to an actual situation, and a very serious question of duty arising out of the situation. In the Maryland, West Virginia, Virginia and North Carolina Dioceses, as a whole, success was attained. This Diocese was given a quota of forty-two thousand dollars. It accepted that quota, subscribed it, and paid it in full. For the current year, 1921, we are endeavoring to do the same. Now this quota was based in part upon Diocesan Survey of the needs and opportunities of Church work in the Dioceses, as well as upon the general work of the Church in Domestic and Foreign Missions, and in Central Administration. We anticipated certain help in important enterprises in this Diocese from the general treasury into which our quota of forty-two thousand dollars was paid. And our work in this Diocese has been to a certain extent crippled by the failure of the Nation-Wide Campaign in so large a proportion of the Dioceses. That is the situation, and it may just as well be frankly stated and fairly faced. The question is, What shall we do under these circumstances?

"I have tried to consider this question, not from a financial and selfish point of view, which is unquestionably its first and most obvious aspect, but from the point of view of our Christian responsibility, as a question of spiritual economics rather than secular. Looking at the matter from a practical—i. e., a worldly and selfish—standpoint, we are disposed to say that as our quota was to include certain provisions for our diocesan work, and we find that, on account of the failure of other Dioceses, we are not receiving what we had a right to expect; we may retain part of this forty-two thousand dollars for our proper Church work in the Diocese. I think, on purely legal and worldly principles, no one could deny our right to do this. That is the way in which the matter at first presented itself to the practical and legal side of my mind, so to speak. But in administering the affairs of this Diocese as your Bishop I have always endeavored to avoid the merely legal and secular view of our responsibilities. The Spirit of Christ must govern even our fiscal policy and measures. The Nation-Wide Campaign is, first of all, an appeal to the Christian conscience to realize the obligation of the gospel in its highest and most unselfish demand; to do our duty by the whole Body of Christ; to give as we are able into the treasury of God for the whole work of the Church. Eventually this abundance will flow back to us; but it is for the whole that we pray and that we give; not for our own part of the work. We have caught the vision. In some measure, but, after all, most inadequately, we have responded to the call. Others have not yet seen it. The call came first to us. They have not yet fully heard it. It is impossible that such a great work, such an unprecedented appeal, should at once be fully appreciated by all. It must take time to arouse the whole Church to such a wide view and to such a large demand. As a matter of fact, we know that in most Dioceses the clergy and people have not yet fully appreciated the situation. Now, what shall those Dioceses do who have been so blessed as to have been able to unite their people in support of this great enterprise? Shall they stand together in unfaltering faith and courage until all the forces of the Church can be rallied and brought up to the same advanced position? Or shall they falter and fall back, and lose what they have already won for themselves as well as for the Church at large?

"I think there can be but one reply to this question when we have rightly appreciated its true significance. In what we have already gained from the Nation-Wide Campaign in our own Diocese we have profited incalculably. It has vastly more than justified itself in our own experience if we should never receive a penny for those enterprises for which we anticipated assistance. If all the Church is to be aroused to the great work, it must be by the unselfish, self-sacrificing example of those Dioceses in which the movement really began, and in which it has attained its primary goal. We must not relax our efforts, or suffer our interest in our local enterprises to divert our energies or our offerings from the building up of a common sentiment in support of the common cause throughout the Church. We are gaining immensely every year in our diocesan work. Let us hold up the hands of those who are endeavoring to unite the whole Church in continued effort to attain the fulfilment of the noble purposes with which this great movement was undertaken."

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

CHINESE RELIEF LETTER FROM BISHOP GRAVES.

Mr. Editor: You have been most helpful in furthering the collection of funds for famine work in China, and we are all grateful to you for this help. In the hope that they may interest you, I am sending you copies of the posters which were used in the Famine Drive at Shanghai. They are quite different from anything which you would use in the United States to collect funds, but they serve their purpose here.

F. R. GRAVES.

Bishop's Office, Shanghai, April 8, 1921.

FOR YOU.

For you He left His home on high:
For you to earth He came to die!
For you He slumbered in a manger;
For you to Egypt fled, a stranger;
For you He dwelt with fishermen;
For you He slept in cave of glen;
For you abuse He meekly bore;
For you a crown of thorns He wore;
For you He braved Gethsemane;
For you He hung upon the tree;
For you a final feast was made;
For you by Judas was betrayed;
For you by Peter was denied;
For you by Pilate crucified;
For you His precious blood was shed;
For you He slept among the dead;
For you He rose with might at last;
For you beyond the skies He passed;
For you He came at God's command;
For you He sits at His right hand.

—Victorian Churchman.

DO HIS WILL.

Willingness to do God's will implies a willingness to suffer His will to be done in our lives. The calm acceptance of disagreeable but necessary facts in the strength of a confidence that this is God's will for us, will be an armor against many of the ills of life. God will help us to be willing to accept His will for us if we will let Him.—Selected.

THE HELP OF GOD.

see thou well to this that God be with thee in everything thou doest. Have a good conscience, and God will defend thee well. For whom God will help no man's perverseness can hurt. If thou canst be silent and suffer, without doubt thou shalt see the help of the Lord. He knows the time and manner how to deliver thee, and therefore thou shouldst resign thyself unto Him. God alone can aid and deliver from all confusion.—Thomas A. Kempis.

A SIMPLY GOOD LIFE.

In the effort to appreciate various forms of greatness let us not underestimate the value of a simply good life. Just to be good, to keep life pure from degrading elements, to make it constantly helpful in little ways to those who are touched by it, to keep one's spirit always sweet, and avoid all manner of petty anger and irritability—this is an ideal as noble as it is difficult.—Edward Howard Griggs.

The Great Commission.

LETTER FROM BRAZIL.

Funds Provided for a Home for the Theological Seminary. Annual Council.

The Rev. James W. Morris, D. D.

We are in great jubilation here. You naturally have heard of the great gift of $20,000 to this Seminary. The news came to us after we had received notice that the Presiding Bishop and Council could not this year make any grant to the Seminary. The news came in an unexpected, delightful cable, stating that the money had been granted in full—though we had cabled that we could, in view of low exchange, make a less amount do. We thought it was a change of mind of the Council. Later came letters to the Bishop, telling us the unusual manner of the gift. A generous lady in New York, an old friend of Brazil, but who had not been appealed to on the subject, simply sent her cheque for the full amount. My young men and I regard this as a specially happy answer to our prayers. Since June we have prayed daily for two things —a home for the Seminary and four more students. In this quite unusual way God has granted our request. Brethren at home have been joining their prayers with ours, and so we cry as Dr. Gray wrote from New York, "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow!"

It is great to know that the Seminary is thus made permanent; but it is even greater to have the assurance that this is a clear sign of God's favor on the work given us to do.

We can with this money not only buy and equip the house for the Seminary, but also we can build a nice chapel adjoining. Thus the boys of the school and our growing congregation in the neighborhood will have a suitable place of worship. It is indeed an encouraging prospect

Meanwhile, we are renting the property and are settled in the house. There are now six men in residence, five in the Seminary and one in preparatory work. We are closely and happily at work: the men busy and cheerful. They are very considerate and careful of their elderly dean. Indeed, there is a beautiful spirit among them, and our new home has already been a blessing in rapidly developing a fine Seminary spirit. I have come to have a warm affection for each one of them.

This place has large grounds, running back to a stream, where it joins with the school property. It fronts widely on a quiet residence street. The house is large enough with a little change for ten or twelve men; it is well built, has a good well of water nearby, and water is run through the house. It is in half a square of the street car line. With a little expense it can be made a really beautiful place, and we are all looking forward jubilantly toward making it so. If we can consummate the purchase at once, and so settle that problem, it would be blissful.

But the money has not yet arrived, and so we can't act at once. Then, too, we begin to fear trouble with the owner of the property. We were offered the place, and so thought we could get it when the means were supplied. But lately the Roman authorities have taken up a truculent attitude toward us. They begin to realize that there is a growing and vigorous church in their midst. And so the Archbishop here has made himself disagreeable. Thomas had a fine French teacher in the school, who has just been made to resign at the order of the Archbishop. And we fear that pressure is being brought to bear on our owner to induce him to turn us out, or at least to refuse us the property. The Roman priesthood have social as well as ecclesiastical weapons. They can make it most disagreeable for people who are or want to be in society, etc.

It seems foolish for the Romans to use such means to oppose our advance. Of course, such things only put us more in the limelight. And we can always go somewhere else, if we are turned out of this place. However, we still have hopes of obtaining this place; as for our purposes it seems ideal. Because these grounds join the premises of the school the two institutions can be intimately associated.

We have just had a great meeting of Council here at Trinity Church in Porto Alegre. We do things in the Virginia style of years ago. Everybody stays over Sunday, which is made a day of special services and preaching. From Thursday through Sunday, there were night services, with large congregations. The women have one night, and gave excellent reports on the year's work. They raised this year over twenty-three contos (a conto should be $250: but it is now about $130, due to low exchange). That is a larger sum than was given by the entire Church the year I left Brazil. More encouraging still, Trinity Church in Porto Alegre has now an income of thirteen contos a year, nearly as much as the whole Church gave when I left. On the other nights the Bishop and all the clergy were in vestments—and we had good preaching. Sunday morning, with a full church, twenty-four people were confirmed, and more than one hundred and fifty persons partook of the Holy Communion. It was like a service at home Sunday night. After a fine sermon by Cabral, about $80 was taken up for the famine sufferers of China. We think that a great impression was produced by the Council.

I was given a chance to tell the Council of the great movement at home, the Nation-Wide Campaign. Much interest was aroused, and a committee appointed to take steps necessary for launching such a campaign in our churches. I feel quite sure that with a little planning and organization, and with earnest work and believing prayer, we can get great results.

I cannot tell brethren what a real help it is to be assured that many prayers at home are offered for this work, and very particularly for me in my part of it. Keep up that work: it moves things out here.

Caixa postel N. 174 Porto Alegre, Brazil, April 13, 1921.

THE LATEST FROM CHINESE FAMINE FIELD.

Latest official reports from the American Committee in Peking show that nearly 7,000,000 starving people are now receiving relief through international committees. This information was received by the American Committee for China Famine Fund, in a cablegram which reached the Bible House in New York City, during the intensive fund-raising effort of "China Famine Week," which ended May 8.

"Five million four hundred and forty-five thousand two hundred and twenty now receive relief through international committees," the cable read. "New distribution just made will add about 1,500,000, making a total of 6,945,-220. All American funds now allotted. This supplements previous cable. Additional funds urgently needed."

Both here and in the famine provinces every possible effort is being put forth to meet the demands of these last and most critical weeks preceding the harvest. More than 300 foreigners, the majority of them American missionaries and business men, are now engaged in the giant task of directing the work of food distribution over the hundred thousand square miles of territory in which the famine reigns.

Everywhere they are being aided by trustworthy officials and individuals among the native Chinese, and the tremendous machinery of relief is working without hitch or hindrance, and with an efficiency and a spirit of self-sacrificing co-operation that will make this great humanitarian endeavor forever memorable and rich in future good.

While America's contribution received a material addition as a result of the intensive appeal made during China Famine Week, it is hardly to be hoped that the total contributed will care for all of the 5,000,000 whose only chance of surviving until harvest time rests on help from this country.

NEAR EAST RELIEF.

Mr. C. V. Vickrey, Secretary, writes under date of May 7:

We are receiving a rather dramatic series of cablegrams this week from the Near East, nineteen thus far, all of them important. One announces that the total number of orphans now at Alexandropol is 18,000, probably the largest assemblage of orphan children that the world has ever known. It also reports:

"Supplies Alexandropol allow half rations April 3 to April 30. After May 1, nothing."

We had a small steamer, the "Quequen," on the Black Sea, en route to Batoum, and earnestly hoped that it would reach there in time. Today we received a cable that when the "Quequen" reached the deserted harbor of Batoum, they found a telegram from Alexandropol (200 miles in the interior), reading:

"No foodstuffs at any price. Four days more and we are finished."

The cable continues:

"Immediate transport saved lives of eighteen thousand orphans and seven Americans, Alexandropol, where food arrived the same day that last of half rations was exhausted."

Another cable reports 5,000 orphans at Harpoot and others on conditions in Constantinople, Syria, Cilicia and Anatolia.

Coincident with the receipt of these cables we are experiencing a decrease in contributions that threatens disaster, for we cannot sustain these children during the summer months without larger financial resources than are now in prospect.

We would greatly appreciate any publicity you can give to this tragic situation that will help immediately to save the lives of these innocent children and ultimately to solve the Near Eastern problem.

Church Intelligence

Clergymen's Retiring Fund Society.

The semi-annual meeting of the trustees of the Clergymen's Retiring Fund Society was held in the Church Missions House May 13.

An interesting fact was presented in the financial secretary's report, that of the fifteen deaths which had occurred during the last six months, all but three were of annuities, thus indicating that the great proportion of the members live to secure the annuity for which they have contributed, while some of them, like those on this list of twelve, lived till over eighty years of age, thus for twenty years reaping the fruit of their wise prudence and foresight in becoming members of this society.

It is further pointed out that these twelve had paid in as dues during their membership sums totaling $3,793 and had drawn out in annuities $12,-250, making an average return on their investments of nearly three and a quarter times the amount they had paid in. Not one of them had died before receiving more than he had contributed, while one who had paid only $132 received in annuities $858, which is a return of 650 per cent. The average of returns over payments for the above twelve was a little over 320 per cent. Two received over $800, two over $900, one $1,000, and the highest was $4,-607.

Summer Conference, Sioux Falls, June 21-30.

A Summer Conference for Church Workers will be held at All Saints' School, Sioux Falls, S. D., June 21-30. This conference will cover the different lines of Church activities—Religious Education, Social Service, Missions and Women's Work—and a very interesting and instructive program has been prepared. Members of the faculty are Bishops Burleson and Remington, of South Dakota; Bishop Ferris, of Western New York, and Bishop Wise, of Kansas; Mrs. George Biller, organizing secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary; Miss Eunice D. Peabody, of All Saints' School, Sioux Falls; Miss Elizabeth Baker, of Sioux Falls; Miss Charlotte Tompkins, of the Trinity Cathedral School, Omaha, Neb.; the Rev. W. A. Jonnard, of Tennessee, and the Rev. Charles T. Bridgeman, representative of the Department of Social Service, New York. The conference leaders, in addition to the above, are: Very Rev. E. B. Woodruff, Sioux Falls; the Rev. C. B. Blakeslee, Madison, S. D.; the Rev. H. M. Peck, Armour, S. D.; the Rev. Paul James, Iowa City, Iowa; Miss Laura Peck, Sioux Falls, S. D.; the Rev. F. B. Bartlett, Aberdeen, S. D.; Mr. C. M. Day, Sioux Falls, S. D.; Mrs. W. P. Remington, Rapid City, S. D.; Miss Jane Cleveland, Boston, Mass.

Copies of the program may be had and application for registration or further informaton may be made to Miss Mary B. Peabody, Sioux Falls, S. D.

The Summer Training School for Workers, Sewanee, Tenn., August 9 to August 22, 1921.

The Summer Training School for Workers, Sewanee, Tenn., will open on August 9 at 8 P. M., and will close on August 22 at 8 P. M.

The school is composed of three departments, viz., Department of Missions, Department of Religious Education and Department of Social Service. The deans of these departments are Mrs. Loaring Clark, Rev. G. L. Tucker and Rev. C. N. Lathrop.

Rev. Gordon Reese, Rev. William G. McDowell and Miss Jeannette Zeigler will have special charge of young people who may attend the school.

In order to meet a great demand in the Church, there will be a special period for conference on Parochial Missions, and also instruction in methods—in other words, "a school for the training of mission preachers."

The various organizations of the Church will be represented. Rev. R. W. Patton, D. D., will represent the N.-W. C.; Miss Grace Lindley, the Woman's Auxiliary; Miss Jeannette Zeigler, the Girls' Friendly Society; Mrs. John M. Glenn, the Church Mission of Help; Miss Mary E. Thomas, the Church Periodical Club; Mrs. Felix Ewing, the Daughters of the King; Mrs. E. B. Leaf, the Guild of St. Barnabas for Nurses, and Miss Agnes E. Warren, the Church Woman's League for Patriotic Service. The Church School Service League will also claim a prominent place on the program.

At the open forum there will be discussed such subjects as "The Negro in America," "The Responsibility of the Church for Social Relations" and other subjects of general interest.

The Devotional Life will be emphasized, and at the Twilight Hour subjects will be presented in short addresses, which have bearing upon such life.

Arrangements are being made with railroads for special rates to Sewanee, and dates on which tickets will be sold will be announced later.

Board and lodging may be had at the rate of $25 for the entire period of the school; that is, from supper on August 9 to after breakfast on August 23, or for less time at the rate of $2 per day. It will be necessary for those who attend the school to notify Dr. George M. Baker, dean, Sewanee, Tenn., ten days before the opening of the school in order that reservation may be made for them.

Sewanee is a beautiful place, and there are quite a number who have been coming up to the "mountain" summer after summer, and have taken back to their homes and to their work inspiration, courage, strength and greater efficiency.

Programs will be sent out later, which will give information about special railroad rates, and instruction in detail about the various courses.

For further information write to Rev. Mercer P. Logan, D. D., Director, Charleston, S. C.

The Commission on Daily Vacation Bible Schools is particularly anxious to hear from all those who are interested, who have had schools or contemplate having them this summer. Requests for information, criticism and personal experience can be sent to the commission, Room 73, 289 Fourth Avenue, New York.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

A step toward unity was taken the past week when services were arranged in the Second Presbyterian Church, Richmond (Dr. Hoge's old church), at which ministers of five different denominations preached and conducted services from Monday to Friday inclusive. The Rev. George P. Mayo, of Monumental Church, represented the Episcopalians. Every sermon stressed the importance of a closer Christian co-operation among the Protestant churches. It was gratifying to note that there was a larger attendance of Episcopal ministers than of any other one denomination at these services.

A unique and unusual service was conducted by the Rev. R. Cary Montague, City Missionary of Richmond, at the Industrial School for Colored Girls, at Peaks Turnout, Hanover County, at which thirty-five of the colored girls in this institution were baptized by immersion in a mill-pond, and two others were baptized in the usual way. The preliminary service was conducted in the schoolhouse, which is used as a chapel; then Mr. Montague retired while the congregation sang a hymn, and changed his vestments for a baptizing suit, which he had borrowed from Dr. H. D. C. Maclachlan, of the Seventh Street Christian Church, after which they marched in procession to the mill-pond. All the girls had on long white robes, and the immersion ceremony was thoroughly impressive. After a change of clothing the concluding service was held in the schoolhouse, with an address from Mr. Montague. This step was taken by these girls as the direct result of a Week of Prayer conducted by the superintendent last January. After the girls expressed their desire to be baptized this wise and godly woman told the girls that they must prove the earnestness of their intentions by three months' good behavior, and they have all made perfect records since.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robt. C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

The Executive Board held its session Friday, May 13. As usual, it proved a busy and interesting session. Steps were taken looking to the completion of the school at Endicott; an appropriation was made to assist in the erection of a parish house at Amherst. Provision was made for the publication of a hand-book on Social Service, and a diocesan car was voted to the rector of Christ Church, Martinsville, with the understanding that he is to prosecute missionary work in the surrounding country, especially at Fieldale.

The Bishop announced his purpose to appoint the Rev. Norman E. Taylor, of Buena Vista, to succeed the Rev. Francis H. Craighill, who has accepted a call to North Carolina. Mr. Taylor has been invited to take the work, and it is hoped that he will accept.

The Rev. Wilfred E. Roach, of Marshall, Va., has accepted a call to the rectorship of Christ Church, Martinsville. It is anticipated that other rectorates in the Diocese will be accepted within the next few days.

NEW YORK.

Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop-Elect.

Consecration of Dr. Manning: Diocesan Convention: Election of Suffragan Bishops.

The consecration of the Rev. Dr. William T. Manning, rector of Trinity Parish, as tenth Bishop of New York, attracted attention of the city, the country, and even brought a representative from the Church of England in Canada. The event took place in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine on May 11. Features of it were the wonderful popular interest, bringing four to five times as many applications for admission as the unfinished Cathedral can accommodate; the part of Eastern Orthodox Churches, and the great numbers in the procession, the latter numbering upwards of five hundred, the most in any procession the oldest of Church news reporters ever remembered to have seen.

Every foot of space within choir and crossing was used to accommodate the 2,500 ticket-holders, while at least 8,000 persons gathered on the nave foundations to watch the imposing procession, which started from old Synod Hall, extended into Amsterdam Avenue, and the entire length of the nave and to the sanctuary. In it were representatives of the Russian, Greek and Serbian Churches, through their highest dignitaries in America; trustees of the Cathedral, of Columbia University, vestry of Trinity Parish, faculty of the General Seminary, faculty and trustees of St. Stephen's College, clergy of Presbyterian, Methodist and Reformed Churches, clergy of the Diocese and many from other dioceses, and Bishops Brent, Lawrence, Hall, Whitehead, Johnson, of Missouri; Burgess, Stearley, Rhinelander, Garland, Harding, Talbot, Sweeney, of Toronto; Gailor, Beatty, Lloyd, Ferris, Hulse, Davies, Perry, Knight, Partridge, Vincent and Tuttle.

The consecrators were Bishops Tuttle, Lawrence and Vincent; the presenters Bishops Rhinelander and Hall, and the attending presbyters the Rev. Drs. Gates and Bellinger, two Trinity vicars. In the circle formed by those who took part in the actual laying on of hands were ten Bishops, and the spectacle was a most unusual one, the great space of the sanctuary affording such picture, with the kneeling figure in the centre, as could hardly be presented anywhere else. Standing with the ten was the Bishop of Serbia, but other Eastern Church prelates did not leave their stalls. There were claims that Serbia took part in the laying on of hands, but the official record of the event, as made to the House of Bishops, will not include him. Preceding the service, in the Cathedral, Archbishop Alexander, of the Russian Church, formally gave to Bishop Manning the sacred pallium. He was assisted by two Russian priests, one an abbot, in full robes of brilliant color and oriental suggestion. The pallium resembles an ordinary stole, but is wider, white with gold-braided border, and contains some lamb's wool. It was brought to the United States from Russia, and has been worn by every Bishop of the Russian Church accredited to this country.

The sermon was preached by Bishop Gailor, of Tennessee, and was strong in its presentation of fundamental needs of today, of confidence in Bishop Manning and in the Diocese of New York to meet those needs, and in good will of the whole Church for New York's success. In the service Bishop Lloyd read the Litany, and so great were the numbers that the request was made that only the participating Bishops receive at the service of Holy Communion. It was the first consecration of a Bishop of New York to take place in upwards of a century. For two generations at least assistants or coadjutors had been consecrated, who succeeded at the deaths of the diocesans.

The Convention: In Synod Hall, following the consecration, Bishop Manning was given an ovation when he appeared for the first time to preside over a convention. Luncheon had been served in the Bishop's house to the visiting Bishops, and to a great throng in the undercroft of the hall. Church leaders filled the hall and cheered the new Bishop for five minutes or more. The enthusiasm was a prelude to that which obtained throughout the convention, and resulted in the most decided advance in policies, and money to back those policies, that any convention has known in years. The work which Bishops Potter, Greer and Burch had done, often under many discouragements, found fruit for the new administration to gather. Thus it was that when the Rev. Dr. W. H. Milton came before the convention and said the Church of the rest of the country wants to know what New York thinks and will do with the Nation-Wide Campaign and all it stands for, cheer upon cheer followed, and Dr. Milton was assured that New York was with him and the general Church's plans heart and soul.

Bishop Tuttle spoke briefly, and Bishop Sweeney, of Toronto, presented the greetings of the Church in Canada. Then followed such business-like address as few Bishops in any diocese ever gave. It lasted for more than one hour, and reviewed conditions from every phase. While given by a man a Bishop hardly more than a few hours, Bishop Manning showed such business acumen, and such thorough knowledge of diocesan finance and other affairs as hardly any layman in New York, Stephen Baker possibly excepted, could show. The new Bishop was not unmindful of comments made upon his Cathedral sermon of some weeks ago, and referring to that sermon he said, in part:

"Wherever there is proved wrong and injustice the Church, of course, may, and must, speak. But the Church is not commissioned nor endowed with special wisdom to pronounce upon specific political and economic programs. It is the function of the Church to inspire men and women to right social actions, to bring the Spirit of Christ into all social relationship and into every department of life, but it is not the function of the Church to prescribe the economic views which men shall hold, nor the economic systems which they are to adopt.

"We shall give our true help as representatives of the Church, not by unwarranted statements nor by incendiary fulminations against this group or that, but by doing all that we can to bring the Spirit of Christ into the consideration of these problems."

Touching on business affairs, the Bishop urged the completion of the Cathedral nave; that the Episcopal endowment fund, now standing at $214,000 and not increased in years, be raised to $1,000,000, that its endowment might take off all parishes the present assessments for Episcopal supervision. The suggestion was popular in the extreme, and later individuals and parishes began to give pledges of $1,000 to $5,000 each.

Speaking of assistance for himself, he said he needed none for himself, but the Church in New York needed help, far more than any one Bishop could give. He wanted leaders to develop these and other new lines of work. He said he did not believe it wise at this time to elect a coadjutor, which statement was cheered, and then he asked for two suffragans, saying they could do the work of archdeacons and much more besides.

The request met instant and prolonged applause, and led to pledges for the Episcopal Fund, and added not a little to the enthusiasm which had till then marked the convention as it has not done in years.

Election of Suffragans: Thirteen nominees were presented to the convention for the office of Bishop Suffragan, two to be elected. They were Bishops Lloyd and Hulse, the Rev. Drs. Herbert Shipman, De Witt L. Pelton, William H. Pott and Edward C. Chorley, and the Rev. Messrs. Charles K. Gilbert, L. Ernest Sunderland, Francis S. Smithers, James Wilson Sutton, Duncan H. Browne, Arthur R. Gray and William H. Owen. The Rev. Dr. Pott was Archdeacon until a few weeks ago, Mr. Sunderland is superintendent of the City Mission, Mr. Gray is in charge of Latin American work under the Bishop and Council, Mr. Gilbert is secretary of the convention, and Mr. Browne has accepted election as dean of the Cathedral at Denver.

Upon elections hinged a number of surprises. The personal popularity of Bishop Arthur S. Lloyd, with recognition of his ability, carried him far beyond the required number in both orders at the end of the third ballot, and upon the fifth, by a very narrow margin, the Rev. Dr. Herbert Shipman, rector of the Church of the Heavenly Rest, was chosen. Elections being unanimous in both cases by vote of the convention, there were the usual greetings. Concerning Bishop Lloyd, Bishop Manning said:

"It is not necessary for me to say what are my feelings. I welcome this choice as one from whom I shall receive not only assistance, but fellowship, counsel and spiritual help."

Bishop Lloyd responded:

"A man would not be a man who would not appreciate what you have done," addressing the assembly. "I have been associated with you in the work of this Diocese for twenty years. My desire is to help your Bishop make good. My services are his. I pray God you have made no mistake."

When Dr. Shipman came to the platform the Bishop said:

"You have chosen one toward whom I can feel from my heart as a true friend and brother; one whom I have known and for whom I have always had a true affection."

Dr. Shipman said:

"To say that I am overwhelmed by the result of this election is but to speak the truth. My mind goes back today to the election of Bishop Burch, who at that time said no man without great and serious reasons might put aside a call as Bishop Suffragan of this Diocese. I did not desire—at least not in the sense of seeking—this high office. I waited here as one waits upon the commanding officer. I feel that this election is a command laid upon me by you and, as such, I accept it."

The Rev. Dr. Pott, now rector of St. John's, Staten Island, withdrew his name, saying he is in honor bound to continue where he now is, and the Rev. Duncan H. Browne did the same, saying he has accepted election as dean of St. John's Cathedral, Denver.

After the election of Bishop Lloyd a fourth ballot showed many scattering votes, with the Rev. James Wilson Sutton, vicar of Trinity Chapel, in a strong lead—election almost attained in both orders. While there was no display of party, it was recognized that he was favored by the advanced people. The Rev. Drs. Gray, Chorley, Owen and Pelton, and the Rev. Messrs. Smithers, Sunderland and Gilbert thereupon withdrew, asking in most cases if not in all to be permitted to second the name of Heavenly Rest rector. The result was very close, Dr. Shipman receiving one hundred and ten in the clerical order, when one hundred and nine were needed, and forty-five and a half in the lay, when forty-five were needed.

The salaries of the suffragans were fixed at $9,000, with $1,000 allowances for travel expense, and private secretaries at $1,500 in each case. Thus New York Diocese is now committed to an expense for Episcopal supervision of an amount in excess of $40,000 a year, when secretaries and travel, pension premium and light and heat included in the Bishop's house, are included.

Bishop Lloyd has one son and four daughters. The son is John Lloyd, of Pinehurst, N. C. The daughters are Mrs. Gavin Hadden and Mrs. Charles J. Symington. of this city; Mrs. Churchill J. Gibson, of Lexington, Va., and Mrs. Edmund Pendleton Danbridge, of Petersburg, Va. Bishop Lloyd was born sixty-four years ago in Alexandria County, Va., and was educated in Potomac Academy, Alexandria, Va., the University of Virginia and the Virginia Theological Seminary.

The Rev. Dr. Herbert Shipman has been rector for the last fourteen years of the Episcopal Church of the Heavenly Rest, Fifth Avenue, above Forty-fifth Street. He was chaplain for nine years at West Point Military Academy, he served on the Mexican border, and he was chaplain in France during the World War.

Dr. Shipman was born in Lexington, Ky., fifty-two years ago. His father later became rector of Christ Church, this city, when it was in lower Fifth Avenue. The son was educated in Columbia University and the General Theological Seminary, Chelsea Square. The first pastoral work of Dr. Shipman was at Christ Church as assistant to his father. In 1905 Dr. Shipman became assistant to the late Rev. Dr. D. Parker Morgan with the right of succession. He assumed full charge July 15, 1907, when Dr. Morgan resigned. The elder Dr. Shipman was long identified with the American Church Missionary Society.

The Standing Committee was elected as follows: The Rev. Dr. William M Gilbert, Justice Vernon M. Davis and Thomas S. McLane.

Upon motion of Charles C. Burlingham, seconded by Justice Davis, the following disarmament resolution was unanimously adopted:

"The clergy and laity of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of New York, assembled in their one hundred and thirty-eighth annual convention, urge upon the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States by legislation, diplomatic representation and other appropriate means to secure an international agreement for the immediate reduction of armaments. They believe that in the United States rests an especial obligation both to curtail its own military and naval expenditures and to commend this policy to other nations."

On the second day of the convention a recommendation of a committee that the word "male" be urged to be stricken out of the religious corporation law of the State, was side-tracked in the authority given the Bishop to name a committee to confer with other Dioceses of New York State. The Rev. John R. Atkinson favored the movement, while the Rev. Dr. Ernest M. Stires and Mr. Edmund L. Baylies urged making haste slowly. The matter involves the status of women in parishes and convention. especially with reference to holding places of vestrymen or vestrywomen.

C.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

The Board of Religious Education of the Diocese of Washington held its monthly Sunday School Institute meeting at Christ Church, Rockville, on Tuesday, May 17. Dr. Freeman, of Epiphany Church, was the special speaker, using as his subject "The Sunday School in a Crisis."

The Church of the Ascension has launched a campaign to increase the attendance at church and Sunday school, and to strengthen the finances of the parish. The movement is in charge of Rev. D. Wellington Curran, acting rector, who will act as chairman of a general committee. The first week of the campaign was given over largely to locating and becoming acquainted with Episcopalians in the parish. This was the first step toward increasing church and Sunday school attendance.

A distinct loss to the Diocese and city of Washington was suffered in the death of Colonel George R. Truesdell, which occurred at his apartment in Washington on Thursday, May 12, after an illness of about four months. Colonel Truesdell was born in New York City and was educated as a civil engineer at the University of Michigan. He served with the Twelfth New York Volunteers in the War Between the States, being commissioned captain in 1862. When his regiment was mustered out he was commissioned major and paymaster in the regular army and served as such until 1869. He was brevetted lieutenant-colonel for meritorious service. After two years spent in New Jersey, Colonel Truesdell came to Washington, and began his life here of public service in the national capital. He organized the first electric street railway company in the District, and served as District Commissioner under Cleveland. He was well known for his active interest in all measures which were for civic betterment, and was conspicuous in his efforts to secure the enactment of the law for the extension of the highway system outside the old city limits. It was largely through his efforts that the extensions were secured. Colonel Truesdell, as he was always called, was a firm believer in the "half and half plan" for the financing of the District of Columbia, and his report submitted to the Washington Board of Trade and unanimously adopted by the Board in 1912 will ever be remembered. He was a trustee of the Washington Cathedral and a vestryman of Epiphany Parish. He exerted a wide influence in the Church affairs of the Diocese, and his name was nearly always found on important church committees. His devotion to the church and the business interests of his community at the same time serves as a strong example of the great influence for good such a churchman may have among his people, and his passing marks a real loss in the life of Washington.

His funeral was held Saturday, May 14, at Epiphany Church, by Dr. James E. Freeman, rector of the church, assisted by the Bishop of the Diocese and Dean Bratenahl, of the Washington Cathedral. Pall-bearers were the vestrymen of Epiphany Church and two members of the Loyal Legion. Interment was in Arlington Cemetery.

St. Andrew's Church is endeavoring to raise $5,200 during the month of May to pay off a second trust on the church. This trust, in the shape of a note, was for $10,000 five years ago, and during that period has been reduced to nearly half the amount. Regular committees are in charge of different phases of the drive, and a series of entertainments will be given by the men and women of the parish.

A men's service was held at St. Mark's Church on Sunday, May 15, at 8 o'clock, under the auspices of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, the sermon being preached by Rev. William B. Dent, of Rock Creek Parish. Members of brotherhoods from adjoining parishes were asked to attend.

The people's open-air services on Sunday afternoons have been started at the Washington Cathedral, and at the service on Sunday afternoon, May 15, the preacher was Canon William L. Devries.

M. M. W.

NORTH CAROLINA

Rt. Rev. Jos. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop.

The Convention at Durham Largely Attended.

The one hundred and fifth annual convention of the Diocese met in St. Philip's Church, Durham (the Rev. Sidney S. Bost, rector), May 10-12. It was one of the most largely attended conventions in the history of the Diocese, and the hospitality of the city has never before been exceeded. The committee on the state of the church reported this as the high-water mark of our conventions. The address of the Bishop stressed especially the good work that had been done in the Nation-Wide Campaign, North Carolina being among the very few 100 per cent. Dioceses, and urged that we continue this great work. Special addresses were made by the Rev. Walter Mitchell, D. D., of Porter's School, Charleston, S. C., on behalf of the Provincial Board of Education; the Rev. Charles N. Lathrop, of New York, on Social Service, and the Rev. Robert Patton, D. D., on the Church Institute for Negroes and the Nation-Wide Campaign. A canon establishing a Presiding Bishop and Council was defeated, as was a resolution permitting women to be members of vestries. The number of confirmations last year was 548. Bishop Delany, Suffragan Bishop of the Diocese, and in charge of the negro work, reported that his work was suffering from the fact that the Nation-Wide Campaign had not been able to make an appropriation to aid in paying the salaries of his colored clergy, and these had been taken off of the diocesan fund, expecting that such campaign would provide for them. The convention ordered $2,000 to be raised and turned over at once for this work. An executive committee, with the Rev. C. A. Ashby, of Raleigh, as chairman, was created to co-ordinate the work of the different boards of the Diocese. The Rev. Messrs. M. A. Barber, S. S. Bost, I. W. Hughes, Mr. J. B. Cheshire, Jr., and Dr. R. H. Lewis were elected to the Standing Committee. The Rev. Messrs. L. N. Taylor, William H. Hardin, W. J. Gordon, E. A. Penick, Jr., A. S. Lawrence, R. E. Roe; Messrs. B. F. Finney, J. R. Wilkes, A. L. Cox, F. S. Spruill, W. A. Erwin and J. A. Robinson were elected delegates to the Provincial Synod.

C. A. A.

ATLANTA.

Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D. D., Bishop.

St. James, Marietta: The offering at the Easter service was the largest ever made, and was devoted to the Church's Mission. The Mite-Box Offering of the Church school, also for the Church's Mission, was the largest ever made. Over and above the weekly offerings each Sunday in the Church school, the boxes yielded $145. The offering for the day was about $425. Since Easter $500 has been sent in for missions.

The United Thank Offering service was held recently, and the offering was next to the largest in the history of the parish. The parish has completed the payment of a debt assumed some years ago in the purchase of a house and lot next door to the church.

St. James' Parish is one of three that completed the payment of its quota from the Church's Mission within the year 1920. The other two are Emmanuel, Athens, and St. Luke's, Atlanta.

During Lent four Mission Study classes were conducted. Two were for women, meeting on different days; one was conducted Friday nights by a man for working men and women who could not attend during the day. Another was by a young man for boys. These classes made a gift for the Bishop Rowe Memorial Fund at the end of the course.

A very handsome marble memorial chancel rail has been placed in the church by Mr. J. Hilton Holmes, now of Jacksonville, in memory of his mother, Mrs. Margaret Gignilliat Holmes, who was for many years a devoted member of the parish.

An interesting enterprise in the parish is the Dew Drop Inn, where meals are served under the direction of the women of the parish. Enquirers are usually directed to the Inn as the place where the best food is served in the most attractive way.

On Saturdays a market is conducted at the Inn, contributions of fancy work and things to eat being made by many. And in connection with that, an exchange is also carried on, and the Inn receives 20 per cent. of all sales made. This exchange is patronized regardless of Church affiliation.

The Rev. H. Fields Saunenig is on a three months' leave, which he will spend in Europe. St. Peter's, Rome, will be supplied by other ministers during his absence.

St. James', Macon, has a remarkable attendance at Church school. The church membership is eighty-five; there were seventy-two at school April 24. The Rev. J. F. McCloud is rector.

The Diocese now has a new paper, the "Diocesan Record." The second issue has appeared, and it is filled with news of all the parishes.

R. R. C.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

The seventeenth annual convention met in St. John's Church, York, on May 10. The roll call showed a quorum of both orders present. General Clement, of Sunbury, was re-elected for the seventeenth time the secretary of the convention. The business was routine, consisting of nominations and election of committees and propositions for amendments to canons and constitutions.

On the following morning, after the Holy Communion was celebrated by the Bishop, assisted by the Archdeacons of Harrisburg and Sunbury, the business session was held, and lasted until 1 P. M., when the convention adjourned.

The Standing Committee was elected as follows::

The Rev. Messrs. Rollin A. Sawyer, Leroy F. Baker, William Heakes, Lewis Nichols, Floyd Appleton, and Messrs. John Langdon, T. S. Hamilton, F. K. Lukenbach, Ralph T. Smith, James Rudisil.

Mr. Richard M. H. Wharton was elected Treasurer of the Diocese. He reported that 100 per cent. of the premiums on the pension fund had been paid in this Diocese. Mr. C. LaRue Munson said that in the sixteen years during which trust funds, legacies, etc., which were in the hands of the incorporated trustees, not a dollar had been lost, and the interest had been promptly paid to every beneficiary. The Secretary of the Executive Council of the Diocese reported that in the year 1919 the total for missionary work, both inside and outside of the Diocese, was $20,183.37. The total for the same purposes for the year 1920 was $52,689.60, showing that by virtue of the Nation-Wide Campaign this had nearly trebled its contributions for those other than itself. It was also stated that the pledges for the current year indicate that the total receipts of last year will be exceeded.

In his address the Bishop suggested the possibility of inaugurating an annuity system, whereby such as may so desire may place in the care of the incorporated trustees such sum of money as he may be disposed to donate for the use of the Diocese or of a given parish, the interest of which would be at the disposition of the donor during his lifetime, and go to the parish or the Diocese at his death. The Chancellor, Mr. Munson, spoke favorably of the plan. The Rt. Rev. E. Arthur Dunn, D. D., Bishop of Honduras, was present and accorded a seat in the convention. He remarked that it was the first convention of the American Church he had ever attended. Rev. Robert F. Gibson, a native of York, now of the Publicity Department of the General Council of the Church, spoke briefly of the methods and success of the Nation-Wide Campaign. The Rev. Mr. Ware, of the Department of Religious Education of the Province of Washington, spoke in behalf of Sunday schools, their methods and purpose.

An important incident in connection with the convention, though not a part thereof, is the dinner which has become an institution, and is held in the evening of the first day's session of the convention. This year it took place in the parish house of St. John's Church, York, and the speakers were the Rt. Rev. E. Arthur Dunn, D. D., who spoke on "A Voice From the Southland"; Professor Austin Baxter Keep, Ph. D., on "Dr. Thomas Bray, His Missionary Society and Libraries for the American Colonies"; a Rev. Robert Gibson on "The Successful Ending of One Year of the Nation-Wide Campaign." Bishop Darlington ended the speaking of the evening with a "final wind." The dinner was well served by the women of the parish.

L. F. B.

OKLAHOMA.

Rt. Rev. T. P. Thurston, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Convocation.

Convocation was formally opened with a celebration of Holy Communion Sunday morning, April 24, in the Cathedral, wit hthe Rt. Rev. T. P. Thurston, Bishop, as celebrant, assisted by the dean of the Cathedral and by the Archdeacons. The Cathedral was filled to capacity.

In his annual address the Bishop made very many helpful and suggestive recommendations, among which was the continued and more really active and vital support of All Saints' Hospital at McAlester, the only Church institution of its kind in Oklahoma.

The Sunday afternoon session was given over entirely to the discussion and report of the work accomplished in the Church school. The District Supervisor of Religious Education, Mrs. C. G. Templeton, reported exceptional progress in the Church school work. One of the outstanding features of this report was the announcement that more than 70 per cent. of the schools were using the Christian Nurture Series lessons. In this the District of Oklahoma is 20 per cent. in advance of the Church at large.

The evening mass meeting, held in the Cathedral, was exceptionally well attended, as well as being very instructive. Mrs. C. E. Bigler, of Delaware, O., described the purpose and workings of the Emery Fund; Professor C. W. Shannon, of the State University, told about the courses in Religious Education the University was offering to the students, and the Rev. Benjamin T. Kemerer, representing the Presiding Bishop and Council, humanized the Nation-Wide Campaign by narrating many of the wonderful things the campaign has accomplished for the work of the Church.

On Monday morning, after an early celebration of Holy Communion, the business part of the convocation opened, the lay and clerical delegates meeting in the Cathedral Parish House and the women in the Cathedral. Among the many very important matters that were discussed was the possibility of the district becoming a diocese. The matter was enthusiastically discussed, and upon motion from the floor the chair was empowered to appoint a committee of three presbyters and four laymen to consider the advisability of the district becoming a diocese, to suggest steps to be taken in the pursuance thereof and to report at the next annual convocation.

The remainder of the week until Friday noon was filled with instructive classes on "Methods for the Church School," "The Nation-Wide Campaign" and "The Church Service League," led by the Rev. G. P. T. Sargent, Grace Church, Grand Rapids, Mich; Rev. B. T. Kemerer, and Mrs. C. E. Bigler, respectively.

Owing to the unusually large number of delegates present, the remarkable progress of the Church in Oklahoma during the past year, and the splendid co-operation between the clergy and laity, this year's convocation was filled with hope and inspiration for the future. J. W. D.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Annual Convention.

The Rev. William O. Roome, Jr., of Anacostia Parish, District of Columbia, has been appointed assistant to the Rev. P. E. Osgood, vicar of the Chapel of the Mediator, West Philadelphia. He will assume his duties about June 1.

Mr. George H. Randall has resigned as president of the Philadelphia Junior Assembly of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. Mr. J. W. Hills will succeed him.

Bishop Rhinelander was one of the presenters at the consecration of the Rev. Dr. William T. Manning as Bishop of New York, in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, on Wednesday, May 11.

Dr. Granville Haslam has been appointed head master of the Episcopal Academy, Philadelphia, it was announced May 13 at the annual meeting of the Alumni Society of the school in the academy building. Dr. Haslam succeeds the Rev. Philip J. Steinmetz, Jr., D. D., now rector of St. Paul's, Ogontz, Pa.

It was also announced that the new home of the Academy on City Line, Overbrook, is nearing completion, and that the school will be removed in the near future.

(Continued on page 21)

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

THE G. F. S. DOING GOOD WORK.

It is good to see a Church society grappling with a really practical problem in an efficient manner.

The Girls' Friendly Society of the Church throughout the country has been trying for a number of years to do something toward relieving the housing situation for working girls, and at this time they have ten boarding homes for girls in cities all the way from New York to San Francisco, and including such Southern cities as Dallas, Tex., and Raleigh, N. C.

These homes are caring for nearly 500 girls, and it is their object to do more than merely provide food and shelter, the effort being to create a real home atmosphere with a house mother in charge, and each girl feeling that she has a share in the home and that it is her duty to try to make it pleasant and comfortable for all.

Membership in the society is not a requisite to admission to these homes. In fact, most of the girls are not members, but they come in contact with the refining and Christianizing influence of the organization and frequently are brought in reach of the Church through the practical help extended to them in this way.

APPLIED CHRISTIANITY.

By Sarah Robertson.

Doctors, psychologists, ministers, politicians, all tell us that the times are out of joint—that physically, mentally, spiritually, nationally, we are not strong. But more insistent than any outside voice, our inner consciousness tells us that we are out of harmony with the great Law of Life.

Our preachers (those who are big enough to realize the beautiful simplicity of the teaching of Christ), tell us that Christianity is the solution of the various problems that confront us. And so it is. But the churches have not made it real enough. As it is spoken from the pulpit to us in the pew, it seems only a vaguely beautiful theory. We go back to our various occupations, and, except for family and personal ties, pay little attention to Christ's great principle.

My purpose in this article, however, is not to dwell on the negative side, but to point to the positive. I wish to tell of a place where the Law of Love—the teaching of Christ—is applied to daily living, and where, consequently, sick bodies, minds and souls are rebuilt and grow stronger. And I am not speaking from theory, or hearsay, or casual observation, but from deep experience. I am one of those who went to this place disheartened, perplexed, discouraged, and came away with renewed faith and strength.

Gould Farm is not some Utopian Isle—some beautiful Dreamland. It is a concrete piece of farm land in the Berkshire Hills of Massachusetts. You can reach it in four hours from New York. The material side of it is a square mile of land, a large rambling white farm-house; cottages scattered here and there, a barn, a stable, two wide gardens and a little apple orchard. The unseen side is its demonstration of the Law of Nature, of the Law of Economics, of the Law of Brotherhood, of the Law of Love.

This community farm is not a piece of land purchased by a rich man to work out some pet theory of health and economics. It is the home of a poor man (from the standpoint of worldly possessions) who lives to help his fellowmen and women. The very possession of it means hard work, self-sacrifice, self-denial. The maintenance of it means the same thing. In their home this man and his wife have gathered round them a family—a family composed largely of people who have "struck a snag"—who have found some phase of life or circumstance too hard to work out alone.

The requirement to become a member of the Gould family is not what you have, but what you need. The tired factory girl and the discouraged doctor of philosophy are equally welcome. Like that of the prophet of old, the invitation is "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat."

"But," you say, "though the idea embodies a great truth, how about the practical end of it? What maintains this family? Whence come food, warmth and care for the sick?" These questions are all answered at Gould Farm by a demonstration of the law of economics. Beside the small amount of money paid in for current expenses, each member of the family is supposed, according to his strength and ability, to do his or her part in the maintenance of the home. Each foot of earth, each forest tree, each person on the farm, is bound together by the great law of creative energy. The garden is so cultivated that its creative energy produces vegetables. The forest produces wood to cook these vegetables. In accordance with the highest law of economics, man's creative energy draws shelter, food and warmth from nature's inexhaustible supply. On Gould Farm human energy, instead of being used for destructive purposes or wasted in artificial work, is used for a constructive purpose. The garden must be planted, worked and harvested, or there will be nothing to eat. The wood must be cut, or there will be no fire for cooking or warmth. Preparing the food, setting the table, washing the dishes must be done. There is no "hired help," and the money saved by co-operative work is for the common good. This makes it possible to charge a nominal rate of board. And for those who can render a fair equivalent in work, there is no expense.

The principle of spiritual economics is that each member of the family, in helping others, indirectly helps himself, and so the universal problem is worked out. The man who has had a nervous breakdown offers to chop wood, because he feels that he must render some service to supplement the small amount he pays. He does not realize, nor does perhaps the doctor who sent him, that in addition to chest development, hardened muscles, quicker flow of blood, there is developed in him a feeling of pride, of partnership—a revision to primitive instincts. With his own hands, with his man's strength, he has produced warmth for the home. The bread tastes sweeter to the college girl who is "all discouraged," because her hands have mixed the dough. She sees sixty or seventy people eating food that would not be there perhaps, except for her part in producing it. One, disheartened by her own limitations, undertakes to carry trays to sick rooms. Her first patient is a blind girl, and as she bends to put the tray within reach of the groping fingers, her self-pity is swept away by a surge of loving sympathy. She thanks God that she can see the blue sky and the green treetops. And she resolves that some of her strength and sight shall be used in an effort to compensate, in some small degree, for what the other has lost. The blind girl with her keen perception notes the flat discouraged tone in the other's voice and rouses herself with an effort to cheer. A clubwoman, troubled over social and community problems, sits at the table between an Italian carpenter and a seamstress. Tony tells her about his little girl, "who has de trouble with de heart," and Anna Volenski narrates the story of her tragic life in Poland. They rouse a warm human interest, and the listener wakes to the fact that many of the so-called "social problems" are the personal problems of simple, kindly Tonys and Annas, rather than the threats and mutterings of dangerous foreigners.

So the members of this family work out the problems together, and with stronger bodies, saner viewpoints, clearer visions, go out and try to practice the great truth they have learned. They may go back to the same environment and work; but it is not the same because inside of them is something to dispell fear and pessimism. Their lives will be bigger and freer. "Know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

Surely this place is blessed, and we who have been part of the family will "go out with joy and be led forth with peace."

(Written by one who sought and found.)

Family Department

MAY.

1. Fifth (Rogation) Sunday after Easter. SS. Philip and James.
2, 3, 4. Rogation Days.
5. Thursday. Ascension Day.
8. Sunday after Ascension Day.
15. Whitsunday.
18, 20, 21. Ember Days.
22. Trinity Sunday.
29. First Sunday after Trinity.
31. Tuesday.

Collect for Trinity Sunday.

Almighty and everlasting God, Who hast given unto us Thy servants grace, by the confession of a true faith, to acknowledge the glory of the eternal Trinity, and in the power of the Divine Majesty to worship the Unity; We beseech Thee that Thou wouldst keep us steadfast in this faith, and evermore defend us from all adversities, Who livest and reignest, one God, world without end. Amen.

For the Southern Churchman.

Supplication.

Erroll Hay Colcock.

Heal me, O Lord, to Thee I pray,
Let all my sins be washed away;
And grant me grace this very hour
To feel Thy sure and cleansing power.

Oh, in Thy gracious Love Divine,
Reach down and touch this heart of mine;
Soothe every pain, calm every fear,
And keep me in Thy tender care.

Bless me, O Lord, as here I kneel,
Thy Holy Presence let me feel:
And may my life from henceforth be
A living sacrifice to Thee.

For the Southern Churchman.

Bartie, Missionary.

W. H. Morse, M. D., Hartford, Conn.

My aunt, who was a member of my father's household, was greatly interested in the circulation of the Bible. Not only did she express a desire that her contributions for missions should be devoted toward furnishing the Scriptures to the heathen, but in her everyday life she did a little Home Mission work of her own. Children who did not have a Testament of their "very own" received one. When the French wood-choppers came on the lumber jobs, those who could read were not left without the Word in their own language. There was one class, however, for whom she was solicitous, which she was unable to supply. The Irish, who regularly went to mass at St. Joseph's, declined the gift. This always annoyed her, and to her mind they presented a very unfavorable contrast to the Burmese, Indians and negroes, who were never known to refuse the Book.

So she was delighted when she found an Irishman who was a Roman Catholic and possessed a Bible. His name was Bartholomew Lyden, a farm hand who came to be employed by my father, and a man of some education and more than ordinary intelligence. I was a four-year-old at the time, and I cannot say how it came to pass that he had that Bible, which, of course, was of the Douay version, but I have a dim sort of an idea that he had had a brother in Ireland who was a priest, and had died, and that he inherited it from him. I know he cherished it and read it. This pleased my aunt, but at the same time it was not to her liking that on the stand in his room where it was kept were also his crucifix and beads. I do not know that she ever remonstrated, and I am sure that she never attempted to discount the Virgin Mary and the worship of the saints with him, firmly believing that the Bible would yet show him the error of his belief. My opinion is that she may not have thought of the version being other than that of her own Bible.

Bartie, as the man was familiarly called, got on well with my aunt. A good workman a-field, he was also handy about the house, and greatly interested in her flower garden, chickens and housework. He would wash dishes, turn the wringer and do the churning; and when the spring house-cleaning came she requisitioned him. Like everybody else, he knew her hobby about Bible circulation.

In those days the farmers "changed works." That is, when one had work that pressed he would have his neighbor and his man come and help him, and would "'turn the compliment" by going to help the neighbor. One with whom father changed quite often was a thrifty man who was noted in the neighborhood for two things. Although Northern born, he took sides when the war separated the Methodists and the Baptists, and declared himself a Methodist of the Church South. This resulted in his showing prejudice against the local church and then against other churches. He never went to church and he came to be called "the infidel." But he was a good neighbor, and father and he were the best of friends. His housekeeper had come to him from the Shakers and she cared little about church worship. She was a kind old soul, and all who knew her liked her. One spring, the second in which Bartie had been with us, she changed work with aunt, coming to us to help in a quilting in return for Bartie going to do house-cleaning for her. He went willingly enough, but when he came home that night it was noticeable that he did not whistle merrily as he was accustomed to do.

Some little time later there came for him from Baltimore a neat package. He took it to his room and said nothing about it. In the evening, after work, he went over to the neighbor's, and until it was dark sat with the neighbor on his back porch. When he returned he whistled. The package had disappeared.

The following spring Bartie did not return to us. He had gone to Hampden County and bought a farm there. That spring a new minister was sent to our Methodist church, and on the Sunday next after Conference, when he preached his first sermon, to the mild surprise of all, that neighbor of ours was at church for the first time in years. There was some speculation about it, but it was generally considered inexplicable, and especially as he continued to attend.

Our family were not Methodist, but some time after this minister was stationed in our town he bought a horse, or perhaps traded for one, with father, and took dinner with us. At the table father spoke about the neighbor and of his former behavior as to public worship. The minister sat back in his chair, and looking at my aunt with a smile, said:

"Let me tell you the secret. A couple of years ago you had an Irishman who knew, direct from your neighbor, all about his grouch. One evening your man brought him a Bible, saying that he had noticed when helping about the house that there was none to be seen. And he had sent and got it direct from the South. That just pleased the farmer, whose sympathy was with the Methodist Church South, and he accepted the Book in full faith that it was that which was used below Mason and Dixon's line. He read it, and he found it was somewhat different from any he rad read before. As he read it he became convinced that he had better get back to church, and did so. He has told me all this, and I have seen the Bible. I assume the Irishman knew, for it was from Baltimore publishers that the Book was had by preference, and he let it be known to the recipient where he got it."

The smile rippled into a laugh. "And though our brother does not know it," he continued, "it is a Roman Catholic Bible!"

Using To-day.

Using to-day instead of dreaming of to-morrow is what most of us need to try. To-day's conditions are seldom ideal; we hope to-morrow's may be; so we postpone making the most of what is at hand, and keep on waiting. A man feels the need of systematic physical exercise, and reads with envy what some of the much advertised systems have done for others. But he cannot afford just now to pay the high price charged for the system he would like, so he does nothing, instead of using the lungs and muscles and fresh air that are his to command. A ten-minute deep-breathing exercise every time he walks out of doors, while he is waiting until he can afford his high-priced system, might make any system unnecessary. But that is too easy and close at hand! The best things in life are always secured by using the best we have, instead of waiting for something better. To-day's best is worth more to-day than to-morrow's better.—Selected.

Concerning Organizing.

Why is it that when some new manifestation of the eternal demand on the Church's spiritual or benevolent resources appears, that our first cry is "Organize!"? And why is it true of 90 per cent. of these organized things that "when the sun was up they were scorched; and because they had no root they withered away"?

"Too many organizations" is an easy and superficial answer? How many are too many, and which? For there are organizations which are perennially vigorous, and vital to the world's weal. Organization is a good and necessary thing "that, strained from its fair use, has stumbled on abuse," and become a peculiar American obsession. No matter what new responsibility is to be met, we have the one idea that the infallible way to meet it is to organize something, elect a secretary and wear a button. And about eleven weeks after the Hip! Hip! Hurrah! send-off of the new club, or society, or association, or commission, or order, or what-not, the survivors from the wreck will be throwing the blame on the way the thing was organized, and then try to relieve the situation by organizing something else.

Is not the reason for the collapse to be found in the delusion that we must organize first to create interest? The life of the club or society is the quality of the interest in it, and organization cannot produce life, it can only direct it.

When we organize to create interest we "put the cart before the horse." The interest must lead, or the thing cannot go; and it must be a real interest in a real job which will last, and be always worth while.

The time to start an organization is not when somebody sees that a thing ought to be done, or somebody else wishes that it might be done, or some third body believes that it can be done, but when all these somebodies are compelled by a consuming interest to a consuming determination that it shall be done. Then the life is there which organization can direct. Where it is absent the organizing energy is but the "whipping of a dead horse."

Organization is a means of distributing responsibility and lightening labor by dividing duty. But the sense of responsibility and the love of labor and sense of duty must be there first for distribution.

A Divine Organizer once gathered together twelve men and organized them for the best and greatest task the world has known. But these twelve had heard his call· "He that taketh not his cross and followeth Me is not worthy of Me. He that findeth his life shall lose it, and he that loseth his life for My sake shall find it"; and having heard that call, they "joined up." Their interest was intense enough to compel them to "leave all" to do it. With such material and such an Organizer, no wonder is it that after nineteen centuries it is still "going strong."

There will be no Brotherhood that will last, whoever may be the dominating organizing genius guiding its activities, unless there is a nucleus "twelve" who are going to gain their lives by losing them in being brotherly.

There will be no Young People's Christian Society (or whatever label you stick on it) unless there is a nucleus "twelve" who will take up their cross, and His, for the sake of others.

"It is the spirit that quickeneth," is as true of organizations as well as persons. The big failures in organization are due to the seed of self-renouncing service having "no deepness of earth." And so, while "in the morning it flourisheth and groweth up, in the evening it is dried up and withered. . . . For we are consumed by Thy wrath," which is ever kindled against self-seeking indifference.—M. J., in Wyoming Churchman.

"Grandma-in-the-Service."

"Hello, Aunt Fan!" cried Paul cheerfully from the doorway. "And how's the ankle this morning? Thought I'd stop in to say howdy. I am going to what my revered grandmother calls 'divine service.' Aren't you proud of me?"

"Very glad to see you, Paul," said Aunt Fan, extending a cordial hand from the easy chair where she sat with her foot propped on a pillow. "Glad, too, to hear about the divine service. What branch are you planning to enter?"

"Branch of the service?" inquired Paul in a puzzled voice. "I guess you didn't hear what I said. I was referring to my beloved little grandmother's habit of calling church 'divine service.'"

"Yes, I heard," said Aunt Fan, with a wise smile. "I was just inquiring what branch of that service you were going to enter. You were so particular about being in the artillery when you enlisted in the army that I thought you might be equally so about this."

"Oh, but divine service isn't like those things. It's just going to church, you know. That's all."

"Oh, is that all? And going to church means—"

"Why, listening to the sermon—and to the prayers—and the anthems—and singing hymns."

"I did hope, Paul, that being in the service of Uncle Sam would teach you something about the meaning of the word. What good do you think an army or navy would be that sat by and let the officers do all the work? From what I have gathered from you boys, you don't get the chance. But wouldn't it be a queer army if you did? Would you approve of it?"

"But, Aunt Fan, the army—the artillery—"

"Branches of the 'service,' aren't they? And it was a 'service' star, wasn't it, that we put up so proudly for you in the window? And up at church, too? You expected to 'serve,' didn't you, when you enlisted? What did you expect to do when you enlisted in the church? Attend services merely?

"No, Paul, your beloved and revered little grandmother, as you called her so lightly, has a right to speak of going to divine service. She's been an active soldier in that cause for more years than I can remember, and she has served with all her heart and soul, and in just as many branches as she could—in the same service that you enlisted in, too, you remember. But you had better just call it 'going to church,' hadn't you, and not expect anybody to be very proud of you until you have learned to put into that service some of the lessons that you learned in the service of your country? But, O Paul, when you boys do that—really enlist and serve—the Church of God will move 'like a mighty army' to the most wonderful victory the world has ever known!"

"Well, say, Aunt Fan," said Paul, fumbling awkwardly with his hat, "you certainly do know how to say things straight from the shoulder. Looks as if I were a sort of cross between a slacker and a deserter, doesn't it? And asking to be patted on the back because I turn out for drill once a month or so. But maybe, thanks to you, I'll get "over the top' yet. Just now I suppose I'd better be running on to church. Not to hear a sermon—oh, no, I don't need any more of a sermon than I've had right here! But just to tell the captain down there to take my star off their service flag and put one on for grandma. And she is 'my beloved and revered little grandma,' too, Aunt Fan. Honest! However 'lightly' I may speak."—Youth's Companion.

A Pilgrim's Prayer.

Lord,
We thank Thee that we have Thyself for our Guide and our Friend.
It following Thee means for us a hard and rocky road,
Yet have we Thee with us.
Thou knowest the road,
Thou hast trodden it alone in the night;
We are not alone.
Teach us with courage and a high faith
To tread in Thy company, unafraid,
The pathway which Thou hast marked for us with Thy bleeding feet,
The pathway which now Thou traversest once more that we may have Thee with us.

Work for Everybody.

Jesus called some men to "follow Him, and continue with Him in His public work. But others who had received His blessings were told to go home to their friends, and tell them what the Lord had done for them."

The quiet workers do not attract as much attention as the public servants do, but they accomplish greater ends, because they are mighty in number.

Only the few can publicly preach and teach, but the many can manifest the Christ spirit in their words and deeds which belong to their narrow sphere. This is the secret of success in the Lord's work—to live day by day according to His will, however humble one's position in life may be.—Christian Advocate.

The Road to Home.

"The road is wide and the stars are out and the breath of night is sweet,
And this is the time when the wanderlust should seize upon my feet;
But I'm glad to turn from the open road and the starlight on my face,
And leave the splendor of out-of-doors for a human dwelling place.

"And the only reason a road is good, as every wanderer knows,
Is just because of the homes, the homes,
the homes to which it goes.

"They say life is a highway, and its milestones are the years,
And now and then there's a toll-gate, where you pay with way with tears.
It's a rough road and a steep road, and it stretches broad and far,
But it leads at last to a Golden Town where the Golden Houses are."

And the reason why Life's road is good,
as every pilgrim knows,
Is just because of the Home, the Home,
the Home to which it goes.

—Selected.

CARRY ON!

There are some who drift out in the deserts of doubt,
And some who in brutishness wallow;
There are others, I know, who in piety go,
Because of a heaven to follow.
But to labor with zest, and to give of your best,
For the sweetness and joy of the giving;
To help folks along with a hand and a song—
Why, there's the real sunshine of living.

And so in the strife of the battle of life
It's easy to fight when you're winning;
It's easy to slave and starve and be brave,
When the dawn of success is beginning,
But the man who can meet despair and defeat
With a cheer, there's the man of God's choosing;
The man who can fight to heaven's own height
Is the man who can fight when he's losing.

Carry on! Carry on!
Fight the good fight and true;
Believe in your mission, greet life
with a cheer;
There's big work to do, and that's why you are here.

Carry on! Carry on!
Let the world be the better for you;
And at last when you die, let this be your cry:
Carry on, my soul! Carry on!

—Robert W. Service, in "Rhymes of a Red Cross Man."

For the Young Folks

Dorothy Rose.

Dorothy Rose had a turned-up nose,
Did she worry about it, do you suppose?
O, no; but a plan she began to hatch
To make the rest of her features match.

First of all, she trained her eyes,
Turning them up to the sunny skies,
Look at the mud and dust, not she!
Nothing but sunshine would Dorothy see.

A flower that drops has begun to wilt,
So up went her chin with a saucy tilt,
An ounce of pluck's worth a pound of sigh,
And courage comes with a head held high.

Lastly her lips turned their corners up,
Brimming with smiles like a rosy cup.
O, a charming child is Dorothy Rose,
And it all began with a turned-up nose.

—Herald and Presbyter.

For the Southern Churchman.

An Answered Prayer.

Mrs. E. Stirling Gunn.

"John Galt," cheerily called Mrs. Carter to her little boy, whistling outside the kitchen door, "can you run down town and take a message to father for me?"

"Sure, mother," he answered, and getting the message and a loving kiss from his mother's lips, he ran joyously down the steps and out into the busy street.

Here was his chance! Surely somebody would need a boy for a little job today!

At Sunday school the day before the superintendent had told the children about the hungry and homeless boys and girls across the sea, and had asked everybody to bring ten cents the following Sunday to put in the collection to be sent for food for the little suffering ones.

Ten whole pennies, and he hadn't a single one! Hurrying home from Sunday school, he had told his mother the story and of his desire to help, but how could he take even a dime from the scanty pockets of his parents, who had so many little hungry mouths to fill. Ah, but "mothers can help a fellow," he thought, and it was well he unburdened his heart to her.

She had listened to his story as he told it with shining eyes and eager words, and putting her arms about him and looking into his eyes through tears that dimmed her own, she had said, "I have no money, my little boy, or I would gladly share with the little ones you wish to help, but when you pray, ask God to give you a chance to make the money you need to give the Sunday school, and I know He will hear and help my little boy."

And most earnestly had he prayed that day in his little room, and now it seemed to him that God had heard and was answering his prayer.

Hurrying back from the railroad shops, where he had delivered his message, he felt a hand laid on his shoulder and a kind voice said, "My little man, how would you like to hold my horse a few minutes while I step in this store for a purchase?"

Horses were John's delight, and to be allowed to hold one was happiness indeed; so he needed no second bidding, and turning quickly, he said, "Oh, thank you, sir; I will indeed"; and taking the bridle in his hand, John Galt stood by the beautiful horse, stroking and admiring the glossy mane and wishing that he, too, owned a horse and could step into a big, fine store to "purchase" something.

A long, long time, it seemed to him, he held that horse, but everything comes to an end, and at last the gentleman came from the store with his package, and smiling kindly at the patient little figure, he held out to him his hand, in which were two shining silver dimes!

"This," he said, "is for your trouble. I was longer than I meant to be."

"I thank you, sir," said John Galt, and happily he ran the rest of the way home to tell his dear mother about the answer to his prayer. Two dimes instead of the one for which he had prayed! Surely God was good to double up that answer, thought the little boy, and so agreed his mother when she heard the story, interspersed with tight little boy hugs and exclamations of delight.

The next Sunday seemed an eternity in coming, but it really came, all beautiful and bright; and as one happy little boy dropped two silver dimes into the alms basin as it passed his way he breathed another prayer that God would take them safely across the sea to help make some hungry little boy as happy as he was today, even though his shoes were worn and his trousers were by far too small!

This all really happened to little John Galt long years ago, and he has since grown into a good man with children and grandchildren of his own, but he learned the lesson then that prayer is the solution of every difficulty, and that God hears and answers the earnest prayers of the grown-ups just as lovingly as He answers the petitions of a little boy.

A Small Animal That Has No Legs.

Most of us think of an animal as something that has four legs and can walk, run and skip about, and by a "small animal" we mean a rabbit, or squirrel, or mouse. But I am going to tell you about one smaller than any of these, which hasn't any legs that we can see, and so stays in one place; in fact, he really cannot move about, for very early in his life he is fastened to a rock or to something firm in the ocean, writes Carolyn C. Bigelow in the Kindergarten Primary Magazine. He does not live all by himself, either, but a number of his family or "colony" live together, yet each one has his own "room" to himself. He is called a sponge.

You know the small, soft sponge that you sometimes use in your bath, and the larger, soft sponge that is used in washing carriages and automobiles? Those are really the houses in which a group or "colony" of these little animals once lived. The little animal is very soft and pulpy, like a bit of jelly. His food and nourishment are brought right to him by the water which flows over him. Men in rubber and canvas suits—called divers—go down and gather the sponges, take them up into boats, where the animal part is cleaned out, and just the fibrous framework is left, and that is the part which we know and buy for a sponge.

Sometimes the divers find that a crab has chosen to make his home in a sponge. Mr. Crab will squeeze himself right down into a sponge, which makes a very cozy nest for him, and there he is safe from the big fish who would like him for their dinner. But in this way he makes quite a large hole in the sponge, so the sponge is not as good and firm for our use. Once in a while a sponge gets torn off the foundation on which he grew; then the water rolls him around and around. Sometimes such a sponge will get covered up in the sand, for he does not attach himself to anything else when once he is torn free.

After a diver has brought a sponge out of the salt water into a boat, if rain or fresh water falls on it the sponge—the animal part of the sponge—will die. But if no fresh water does hit it, a man can divide the sponge in several pieces, so long as he leaves at least one little animal unhurt in each part, then he can fasten each piece to a cement disc with lead wire, plant it down on the bottom where he found it, and it will grow and increase just as if it had not been disturbed.

There are many kinds of sponges, but these that I have been telling you about are called sheepswool and are the best ones to be found in this country. They grow and make their home off the west coast of Florida, in the Gulf of Mexico.

Three Little 'Fraid Cats.

Three little kittens in coats so gray
Went out with the Old Mother Cat one day.

Said the first kitten, "If we only might see
A monstrous great rat, what fun it would be."

Said the next little kitten, "I'd seize hold of his head,
And bite him and squeeze him until he was dead."

Said the third little kitten, "Should I see a rat, I'd eat him all up in much less time than that."

Suddenly something jumped out of the wood,
All three turned and ran as fast as they could.
And never once stopped till they came to their house;
Yet it wasn't a rat, but a wee baby mouse.

—Selected.

Grumble-boy and Smiley-boy.

In the Jones house there were two small boys, Johnnie Grumble-boy and Johnnie Smiley-boy, but no one ever saw both at once. At first they hardly realized, this little boy's father, and mother, and Aunt Emma, that there were two boys; but when one morning a little chap came down to breakfast with a big frown on his face, and blue eyes that were so cross that they looked nearly black and when pleasant remarks from the family had no effect in making the boy look pleasant, they were obliged to make up their mind that a strange little boy had come to take the place of their pet. So they treated him with all the ceremony necessary with a stranger, and pretty soon he found himself feeling strange and queer.

But he wouldn't tell any one that he felt strange. Not a bit of it. He was not that kind of a boy. When he came down that way, why, everything was wrong. The oatmeal was too salty, his milk didn't taste right, and his egg was boiled too hard; and he just didn't want to wear his old cap to kindergarten—it wasn't comfortable at all.

This sort of thing went on for some time, until Aunt Emma made up her mind that some remedy must be thought out. The mornings when Smiley Johnnie came down there was the happiest little boy around the house all day, and home was a very different place from what it was on Grumble-boy's days.

So auntie thought and thought, and one day when Johnnie came down and it was the Grumble-boy Johnnie who climbed up to the seat beside father, he found a great change in the atmosphere of the family table. Usually when he came down looking frowning and sour, and complained about everything, the kind members of his family tried to persuade him by cheerfulness that things were not so far wrong as he thought them. But today it was different.

"This hominy is too hot," piped a small voice.

"It is entirely too hot," Aunt Emma agreed sulkily.

"Mine's burning my mouth," mother said, sadly.

"Mine's simply scalding," growled father.

Grumble-boy looked up surprised, and for five minutes there wasn't a word said.

Then came the boiled eggs and toast.

"My egg's too hard," growled Grumble-boy, before he thought, just because he was in the habit of saying it when he felt cross.

"So's mine," wailed auntie.

"And mine," said mother.

"Mine's like a rock, it's so hard," growled father.

Grumble-boy could hardly keep from smiling, it was all so like the good old story of Silverlocks and the three bears, but he'd come downstairs feeling cross, and it was his habit to stay cross.

And then the finish came when some lovely hot griddle cakes were brought in. Grumble-boy wanted to complain just because he felt like it. So, after he'd poured maple syrup over his cake, he touched it with a fork and grumbled:

"These cakes are tough."

"I can hardly cut mine," wailed mother, in a tearful voice.

Father started to cut his just then, and so did all the others, and at the same time father growled, "Shame to send such tough cakes to the table," and the cakes simply fell apart on their forks and everybody burst into a roar of laughter.

After that, when by chance the Grumble-boy appeared at breakfast, it was enough for auntie to say, "Johnnie, are your cakes tough this morning?" to break the clouds and bring back sunshine.—Examiner.

When Jamie Went to Church.

Jamie sat on the doorstep. He was sitting on the doorstep when the great bell in the nearby steeple boomed out its call to worship and he had felt the noise it made. Now the finely dressed ladies and the gentlemen in their neat black suits were moving slowly into the beautiful building where Jamie himself would go when Sunday school time came.

Jamie's father and mother were not of the church-goers. They worked every day but Sunday in a shoe shop over on another street. Perhaps when the Lord's Day comes they are too tired to go to church. They had not come downstairs yet, but Jamie and dear old grandma had had breakfast ever so long ago, in spite of the fact that Jamie's face and hands had not yet been washed. His little white suit, too, was very much soiled and wrinkled. Grandma cannot see as well as she once could, and it takes a great deal of dirt to trouble Jamie.

By and by, through the open windows of the church, Jamie heard the sound of the great organ. The ladies and gentlemen were coming fewer and fewer until Jamie, still sitting on the doorstep, felt very lonesome indeed. Finally he went straight down the sidewalk and in at the open door.

"It's my Sunday school," thought Jamie. "I'll be the very first one there today." So he went on into the primary room and seated himself in one of the little chairs placed ready for the smallest boys and girls.

After awhile a pretty lady with rosy cheeks and bright eyes entered the primary room. Her hat had a whole flower garden on it and her dress went swish, swish, swish as she hurried up to the mirror. She tucked a lock of hair under the hat brim and was hurrying away again when she spied Jimmy.

"Why, hello, little boy!" she greeted cheerily. "You were so quiet I didn't know you were here at all. Aren't you going up to church?"

"No," Jamie answered. "They don't want little boys up there. I'm going to wait till Sunday school."

"But it's a long, long time till Sunday school, and I'm sure no one would mind if you come to church, you are such a quiet little boy."

"Are you going up?" Jamie answered wistfully.

"Yes, dear. Won't you come with me?" And the pretty lady held out a neatly gloved hand.

Jamie closed his dirty little fist about two of her fingers, and side by side the pretty lady and the little boy climbed the winding stairs and entered a beautiful room where Jamie had never been before. They passed ever so many rows of people before they sat down, but Jamie did not mind at all. Jamie liked people. In fact, there were so many interesting things in that wonderful room with the picture windows! Jamie looked and looked and sat very still all through the service.

"You were a very good boy," smiled the lady as they walked out together. "It is now Sunday school time. I have a class out in the big room."

At the close of the Sunday school Jamie went home as usual, but the reception was not the sort he usually received.

"Here he is, Tom! Here he is!" Jamie's mother cried joyfully, and Jamie's father, hat in hand, came back to the little living-room.

"Well, son, where have you been?" he asked sternly.

"To Sunday school," Jamie answered, holding up his book and story paper.

His mother gasped. "What! not in that rig? Tom, will you look at him! Hands and face dirty, hair uncombed, and suit too filthy for words! Jamie Brown, you're a naughty little boy."

Jamie's sensitive lip trembled. "I didn't be naughty," he pleaded. "The pretty lady said I was a good boy."

"What pretty lady?" his mother asked.

"Why, the one that took me to church with her. There she is, mother." And Jamie pointed up the street.

Mrs. Brown looked, then dropped back in her chair. "Tom, it's Dr. Hildreth's daughter, as sure as I'm alive. And she took Jamie into church looking like that!"

Mr. Brown stroked his beard, scanning his son the while. Then he smiled. "Maggie, I guess I was wrong about that church. All those swells aren't snobs. I wouldn't have taken any youngster to the movies looking as ours does now."

And the next Sunday a very strange thing happened. Jamie, his grandmother, his father and his mother all went to church. But Jamie wore his new blue suit and his face and hands were very clean.—Mary Louise Stetson, in The Way.

The South's Best Book Store

HUNTER & CO

105 E. Broad Street

Richmond, Va.

Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen

Prompt and Reliable Service

NICK BULL'S MARKET,

Richmond's Leading Dealer in

FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME

112 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.

Phone Randolph 1680

WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

Spring Styles

NOW READY

Have Your Old Hat Fixed Like New

Many customers use their old hats by having them made over for their children. We specialize on children's hats.

PARCEL POST DEPARTMENT AT YOUR SERVICE.

VERRA HAT WORKS

211 NORTH FIRST STREET

RANDOLPH 90

DISTANCE

Makes no difference to Berry patrons—our Mail Order Department can serve you anywhere; delivery free.

Write for our new catalogue of MEN'S and BOY'S CLOTHING.

The South's "Old Home" store with new blood and best values!

O. N. Berry Co.

ESTABLISHED 1879

Main and 11th Sts., Richmond, Va.

R. Geissler, Inc.

56 West Eighth Street, New York

Memorials

FOR THE CHURCH

Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

FAMINE RELIEF.

For the convenience of our readers we publish the addresses of the treasurers of the various Relief Funds whose appeals for the starving, and especially for starving children, are so urgent and touching. The Southern Churchman will forward contributions to any of these, but to save time, postage and possibility of miscarriage, checks would better be sent directly to the treasurers as below:

Near East Relief (formerly "Armenian and Syrian Relief")—Cleveland H. Dodge, No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York City.

European Relief (Central and Eastern Europe)—Franklin K. Lane, 42 Broadway, New York City; or locally for Virginia, Desoto Fitzgerald, 218 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.

Chinese Famine Relief—Remit through Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer, Presiding Bishop and Council, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

PIPE ORGANS

PIPE ORGANS.

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID IN building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

MEETING OF TRUSTEES.

The Board of Trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary and High School in Virginia will meet at the Seminary on Wednesday, the first day of June,

S. SCOLLAY MOORE, Secy.

DON'T TRY ON YOUR NEW DRESSES over your old corset. Let us help you select and fit to you the corset that does greatest justice to your figure. The Corset Shop, 317 N. Fifth St. Mrs. A. J. Pyle, Prop. Phone Ran. 3397.

Doll Skirts Accordion Pleated Free. ASHBY B. PYLE, 315 N. 5th St. Hemstitching, Pinking and Button Covering.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER

Invites you to inspect her line of GAGE Tailored HATS. Also the ADVANCE Showing of Spring Hats in the most attractive shapes.

209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

BOARDING.

THE MAGNOLIA, 1321 M STREET, N. W. One, or more, ladies visiting Washington can find transient quarters with Miss Bouldin.

Church embroideries and materials. Stoles with crosses, $7; plain, $5.50; handsome gift stoles, $12 up; burse and veil, $15, $20. Surplices and exquisite altar linens. L. V. Mackrille, 2604 Thirty-sixth St., N. W., Washington, D. C. Tel. Chev. 1915.

"RESTMORE," MONTROSE, PA. 2,000 feet altitude. Large shady lawn; no mosquitoes. Home table. Terms $18 and up. Leaflet.

HELP WANTED

YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCATION AND refinement wanted to enter the St. John's Hospital Training School for Nurses (Episcopal), Brooklyn, N. Y. Applicants required to have one year of high school or its equivalent. Course three years. A registered school of high standing. Nurses receive remuneration. Many social privileges. Home life pleasant. Graduates are now receiving $6.00 per day. Apply to St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED—TO EMPLOY A CLERGYMAN as superintendent of small orphanage in North Carolina. Correspondence solicited. Address Rev. E. A. Penick, Jr., Charlotte, N, C.

WANTED—A COMPETENT NURSE OR nursery governess for child two years and infant. Desirable position in Richmond. Write C. B., care Southern Churchman.

CHURCH SUPPLY.

WANTED—SUPPLY RECTOR FOR TRINity P. E. Church, Portsmouth, Va., for June or July. Address J. Davis Reed, Portsmouth, Va.

CLERICAL SUPPLY.

WANTED—CLERICAL SUPPLY FOR ST. Paul's Church, Newport News, Virginia, months of June and July. Address Rev. H. G. Lane.

CHOIRMASTER.

WANTED—ORGANIST - CHOIRMASTER, Christ Church, Warren, O. Population thirty thousand. Tripled in ten years. Still growing. New Austin organ. Unusual opportunity for teaching. Salary $1,290. Address Christ Church, Warren, O.

SITUATION WANTED.

YOUNG LADY WITH BRIGHT, CHEERful disposition, wishes position; companion or housekeeper. A1 references. "H.," care of Southern Churchman.

WANTED—BY A CLERGYMAN, A SMALL parish. Correspondence solicited. Address "Presbyter," care of Southern Churchman.

REFINED COUPLE DESIRES POSITION in Church school or institution. Wife as matron or house-mother, husband expert in clerical work. Experienced. References. Moderate stipend. Address "12," care Southern Churchman.

COMPANION—WIDOW OF ARMY OFFIcer and daughter of Episcopal clergyman, desires position as companion to lady, or to teach small children in their home. Address Mrs. Wood, 1913 Laurel Street, Columbia, S. C.

ORGANIST.

ENERGETIC ORGANIST-CHOIRMASTER, married, churchman, cathedral training; great experience leading large choirs, recitalist, wishes permanent position with good field for teaching. Address "Progressive," care Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

Shumate: Entered into life eternal March 13, 1921, in Lynchburg, Va., LUCY LETITIA PAGE, widow of John Rust Shumate, and daughter of the late Colonel Camm Temple Page and Lucy Mildred Farrow Page.

Mrs Shumate inherited rare beauty and intelligence from a long line of colonial ancestry, and although past her eighty-fifth milestone, was never one of the "old people" and her closest friends were of a younger generation. Her brave, beautiful life and sweet spirit of Christian charity endeared her to all who knew her.

E. M. S.

Norwood: Entered into rest at Martel, Tenn., on May 14, 1921, JAMES WEBB NORWOOD, in the seventy-fourth year of his age.

EMMA GREEN PHILLIPS.

Entered into the life eternal at the home of her only son, John A., in Washington, D. C., on Tuesday morning, April 12, 1921. Thus has passed from our midst the last of a family of twelve children, of 'fair daughters and brave sons." Born at Halifax Courthouse, Va., the youngest daughter of Thomas Jefferson Green and Frances Keeling Burton, she was married in early womanhood to George R. C. Phillips, of Petersburg, Va., who preceded her to the better land several years ago. The last twenty-five years of her life were spent with her family in Washington. Lovely of person, brave and faithful of heart, and cultured of mind, she was an ideal companion, wife and mother. An "old-fashioned" Southern lady! Her sight had become dimmed of late, and how sweet to those who love her is the thought that now she beholds with glorified eyes—"eyes bright with the beauty and celestial glory of an immortal grace." She was laid to rest in the cemetery of Old St. John's Church, Halifax, where in girlhood she was confirmed, and for many years her flute-like voice wafted God's praises on high, and now doubtless swells the Choir Invisible. Many friends gathered to pay their last tribute of love and esteem, and exquisite flowers covered her still form. The sweet old hymn, "How Firm a Foundation," was sung in the church service, and "There Is a Blessed Home," by a quartette around the flower-covered mound.

"Sleep on, beloved; sleep and take thy rest;
We love thee well, but Jesus loves thee best."

E. M. C.,
H. B. C.

Stevens Anti-Amebic Dentifrice

For Prevention and Treatment of PYORRHOEA OR RIGG'S DISEASE

Guaranteed to contain 3% fluid extract of Ipecac

Price, 50c per Tube, Postage Paid

Stevens Medical Mfg. Co.

717 Kent Avenue Brooklyn, N. Y

Many pens have attempted to write a Life of Christ since Canon Farrar wrote his famous volume. The difficulty with most of them is that they give so much attention to technical details they do not hold the interest of the general reader. For some time there has been need of a book that would make its appeal through its clearness and charm of treatment.

This need has now been filled by

PATERSON-SMYTH'S
NEW BOOK

A PEOPLE'S LIFE OF CHRIST

Told in a way that will be read again and again for the solid enjoyment it affords.

The Churchman says: "A book which the average man will read for the pleasure of reading it—a new and popular version for the day and generation."

ONLY $3.50 NET

THE SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO
RICHMOND, VA.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

(Continued from page 14)

The annual meeting and dinner of the Sextons' Association of the Diocese was held May 10 in St. Michael's Church, Germantown. The rector, the Rev. Gilbert Pember, presided.

Addresses were made by the Rev. Dr. Upjohn, the Rev. Mr. Keeling, Mr. Cox and others. There was a general discussion of the organization of a pension fund for the benefit of aged sextons of the Church, and a resolution was adopted asking Bishop Rhinelander to introduce the plan at the next Diocesan Convention.

The spring meeting of the convocation of North Philadelphia was held May 10 in St. Stephen's Church, the Rev. Dr. Carl E. Grammer, rector. The Rev. Henry M. Medary, rector of the Church of the Advocate, dean of the convocation, presided. The Rev. Dr. Grammer and George B. Hawkes, Esq., were elected to represent the convocation in the new Executive Council of the Diocese.

The usual appropriations were made to the missions, and the missionaries spoke of the needs of their fields of work.

The Women's Aid of the convocation have collected $1,000 towards purchasing a residence for the Rev. Mr. McDuffy, who has a mission for colored people. The Women's Aid hopes to raise $1,000 toward the restoration of Emmanuel Church, Kensington.

After the two meetings both men and women attended the dinner in the parish house.

Noon-Day Services: Clergy and laymen of the Diocese are conducting noon services every day except Sunday in the chapel of the new Church House. The services are short and are for the staff of the Church House, workers in diocesan organizations and all others who wish to attend.

Intercessions are offered for the clergy, people and institutions. The women of the Diocese furnished the chapel, and the Brotherhood of St. Andrew has loaned its organ.

The twenty-fourth annual convention of District No. 1, Philadelphia Sunday School Association, was held in St. Simeon's Episcopal Church May 12. A resolution was passed that a petition be sent to Mayor Moore urging that the observance of Sunday be more strictly enforced.

The speakers were the Rev. Henry A. Romberger, a former president of District No. 1, and the Rev. Dr. Paul McConkey, pastor of Gaston Presbyterian Church.

Colonel Charles C. Pierce, D. D., of Philadelphia, head of the American War Memorial Commission, is dangerously ill at Tours, according to reports received from Paris.

He was compelled to stop off at Tours and go to a hospital while on his way to Italy with his daughter to inspect graves of American soldiers there.

Colonel Pierce was formerly rector of St. Matthew's Church, and is chief of the Cemeterial Division of the War Department. He began the government work in France in 1917.

R. R. W.

JUST READY

More "FIVE-MINUTE TALKS"

By Walter R. Bowie, D.D.

SUNNY WINDOWS

Author of "The Children's Year"

AND OTHER SERMONS

Here is another volume of Dr. Bowie's talks to youngsters, all attractively suited to the child mind. The subjects are arresting themes, calculated to almost invariably catch the attention of boy or girl—while the treatment thereof is simplicity itself.

As the Record of Christian Work said: "Dr. Bowie's talks are capital—straight to the hearts of children, clever, interesting, helpful."

Cloth, $1.25 net

For Sale by

Southern Churchman Co., Richmond, Va.

MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. Chas. D. Williams, D. D., Bishop

Annual Meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary.

The forty-second annual meeting of the Michigan Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary to the Presiding Bishop and Council was held Monday and Tuesday, May 2 and 3, in St. John's Church and Parish House, Detroit. The attendance was unusually large, nearly all the churches and missions in the Diocese having auxiliaries being well represented. Reports of various activities showed increased interest and enlargement of scope during the past year which resulted in greater accomplishment in every line of work. Many interesting addresses were made by speakers of prominence.

Mrs. Frederic B. Stevens, of Detroit, was elected president, and the vice-presidents are: Detroit Archdeaconry, Mrs. William Craig, Detroit; Southern Archdeaconry, Miss Annie Condon, Ann Arbor; Northern Archdeaconry, Mrs. Charles E. Edinger, East Tawas.

Cathedral Gates Dedicated: On Sunday morning, May 8, at the morning service at St. Paul's Cathedral, Detroit, the Very Rev. W. L. Rogers, dean of the Cathedral, dedicated what are probably two of the finest specimens of wrought-iron gates which can be found anywhere in the Middle West.

The gates were designed by Ralph Adams Cram and were executed by the Grecian iron workers of Cambridge. The north aisle gate is given by Mr. and Mrs. P. A. MacDonald in memory of their daughter and grandson, Mrs. Elsie MacDonald Hammond and Harry William Hammond, Jr. The south gate is given by Mrs. J. G. Hamblin and her two sons in memory of Joseph G. Hamblin and Louis W. Hamblin.

I. C. J.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

The Church School Service League having as yet not been definitely organized in the Diocese, the Junior Auxiliary is still functioning in some parishes, though the League has the sanction of the Bishop, and a visit of Miss Frances Withers to the Diocese last month has set the wheels in motion. The Junior Branch of Grace Church, Waycross, has made its report for the year 1920, and the total amount of its contributions from eleven members is $30, $12 to Diocesan pledges, $8.10 to the United Thank Offering, and $10 towards the Alaskan scholarship of the Diocesan Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary. Two boxes were sent, one to North Dakota and one to Monterey, Tenn., valued at $50. The members sold eighty copies of the Spirit of Missions, and obtained seven new subscriptions.

E. D. J.

KANSAS

Rt. Rev. James Wise, D. D., Bishop.

The annual convention of the Diocese opened Friday evening, May 6, when over four hundred young men and boys reported for the services at Grace Cathedral. Forty-five big army tents had been placed on Bethany College campus, and they were packed to capacity. After service an auto ride of the city followed, which ended at the Kansas Boys' Industrial School, where a program of music and sports was carried out by the boys of the school. The pouring rain prevented the field meet, but Washbury College offered their equipment, and in spite of delay the boys set to the task of winning the Bishop's Cup, which went to Burlington with thirty-three points.

To appreciate the wonderfulness of the camp, it is necessary to know the large part contributed by Captain MacLean, of the Industrial School, and his boys. It was their entertaining programs that made the indoor hours pass speedily.

Saturday night the Bishop prepared the boys for the Holy Communion the next morning. At the morning service Mr. George K. Gibson spoke on the Awakening in the Church Through the N.-W. C. He also spoke to the boys Saturday, as did President Pierce, of Kenyon College.

The camp has passed from an experiment to a permanent thing in the Diocese. The only problem is where can a place large enough be found, especially if it rains. There is an interest among the boys in Kansas such as never existed.

Grace Cathedral has kept open house in real Christian way of showing hospitality.

R. Y. B.

NORTH TEXAS

Rt. Rev. E. A. Temple, D. D., Bishop.

The health of Bishop Temple has so much improved that he has been able to make several visitations of late. Confirmations have been at Clarendon, Abilene, Amarillo and Sweetwater.

For several years church services had been closed, as many of our church people had moved away. Church services have now been resumed, and the Bishop was pleased to find that there were some for confirmation.

The Rev. Frank H. Stedman is expected soon to take the work at Stamford and other missions in that vicinity.

HOT WATER HEAT

For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars

ARCOLA SYSTEM

R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.

9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

Throughout the Church

THE NEW HYMNAL

is used to the great improvement of

congregational singing

THE NEW HYMNAL

WITH BOTH WORDS AND MUSIC

Single copies . . . . . $1.20 per copy
In lots of 100 or more . . . . 1.05 extended payment
In lots of 100 or more . . . . 1.00 cash

Carriage Charges Extra

Published by

THE CHURCH PENSION FUND

14 Wall Street, New York

DURING THE PAST TWO YEARS

the following progress has been made at St. Stephen's College, the official College in the East for men of the Episcopal Church:

1. The following six men have been added to the faculty as heads of departments: Lucius R. Shero, Ph. D., Greek; Phineas W. Whiting, Ph. D., Biology; Lyford P. Edwards, Ph. D., Sociology; Clarence R. Williams, Ph. D., History; Percy S. Prince, M. A., Physical Training; A. Willoughby Henzell, M. S., Physics.
2. Over 6,000 new books have brought the library to a strength of 47,000 volumes.
3. New and modern biological and chemical laboratories have been installed.
4. A new $70,000 gymnasium and clubhouse has been built.
5. The student enrollment has doubled.

TWO YEARS AGO ST. STEVEN'S WAS A GOOD COLLEGE FOR MEN DESIRING THE BACHELOR'S DEGREE IT IS EVEN MORE SO NOW

Address: Annandale-on-Hudson, N. Y. R. R. Station: Barrytown, N .Y.

TUITION, BOARD AND ROOM, $500 PER ANNUM

R. L. Christian & Company

514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.

Leading Fancy Grocer

AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.

Catalogue mailed on application.

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD.

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

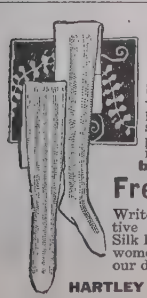
Take the best care of your health, and, above all,

Provide yourself with Travelers Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank

Richmond, Virginia

Service



That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business. That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE
CARPETS DRAPERIES

SILK HOSE
DIRECT TO YOU

Saves you 25c to 60c a pair. Our leader—Ladies' full-fashioned, highest grade pure silk stockings, five-thread linen spliced heel and toe: $2.60 a pair, three pairs $6.00. Strongest and best wearing hosiery on the market. Money back if not satisfied.

Free Samples showing colors and quality of silk.

Write for these today with new descriptive Price List of our full line of Silk, Silk Lisle, Fibre Silk and Cotton hosiery for women, misses, men and children—all at our direct-to-you money-saving prices.

HARTLEY HOSIERY CO., Louisville, Ky.

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffein contained in each:

Black tea—1 cupful (hot) (5 fl. oz.) ..... 1.54 gr.

Green tea—1 glassful (cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice) ..... 2.02 gr.

Coca-Cola—1 drink, 8 fl. oz. (prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup) ..... .61 gr.

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

The Coca-Cola Co., Dept. J, Atlanta, Ga., U. S. A.

J1

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary
J. M. Leake, General Agent

E. B. Addison, Vice-President
J. C. Watson, Treasurer
Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

No Soap Better
—For Your Skin—
Than Cuticura

Sample each (Soap, Ointment, Talcum) free of Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. V, Malden, Mass.

O. Luetke's Art Works

Church Furnishings
IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.
st. 1886. 328-332 7th Ave. New Yor

Beautiful Monogram Stationery

Any monogram in red, blue, gold, or silver, on any of six colors of Linen Finish Paper, $ .00. Send for style sheet and information how to get a box. Free

WAG MFG. CO., 234 So. 8TH ST., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

PRE-WAR PRICES

$15 the Hundred; 20cts. singly.
New Songs of Praise and Power, No. 3.
(Just off Press)
150 Gospel Sunday School Songs. 22 Responsive Readings. Returnable Sample sent on request.
HALL-MACK CO., 21st & Arch Sts., Phila., Pa.

The next time you buy calomel ask for

Calotabs

The purified and refined calomel tablets that are nauseless, safe and sure.

Medicinal virtues retained and improved. Sold only in sealed packages. Price 35c.

Central National Bank

Cor. 3d and Broad Sts., Richmond, Va.
Banking Hours—
Monday to Friday. ...9 A. M. to 2 P. M.
Saturday..... 9 A. M. to 2 P. M.
6 P. M. to 8 P. M.

3% Allowed on Savings Accounts

Leake Printing Co.

ENGRAVING, PRINTING, EMBOSSING.
Special attention to out-of-town orders
Samples sent upon request.
615 East Main Street, Richmond, Va

Johnson's Foot Soap

(On market for over fifty years)
Made of Borax, Iodine and Bran, is a sure and safe relief for those tired, aching, tender swollen, burning that have been causing you so much pain. 25c, ALL DRUGGISTS. If unobtainable at your druggist, sent direct on receipt of price.

FEET

Thomas Gill Soap Co.

711-719 Kent Ave., Brooklyn, New York

The Best of the New Things for Springtime

In the enthusiastic seeking of "lower prices" which seems to have become so general during recent months, there is danger, we think, of overstepping the bounds of true economy and mistaking the cheap and tawdry for the low-in-price.

This is one reason why you will find a visit to this store particularly helpful at this time, in fulfilling your plans for the new season.

No unworthy goods may find a place among the stocks, and we think you may safely rely upon our taste and good judgment in selection.

And while everything here is of the same high, dependable quality that has always been characteristic at MILLER & RHOADS, prices are now materially lower.

To-day the store is gaily decked out in its spring-time dress, splendidly ready to serve your every need, whether for articles of apparel and personal adornment or for the home.

Miller & Rhoads

"The Shopping Center" Richmond, Va.

You Can Send Your Boy or Girl to Any College in This State

At but small sacrifice to yourself through our "COLLEGE PLAN"

Ask or write for booklet

If you will begin to prepare while they are young

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK

Tenth and Main Sts. Richmond, Virginia

"The Bank with the Three Doors of Opportunity"

Not Merely

a counting house, but a people's bank and a useful servant in this community.

We believe that it is the duty of any company which serves the public to be a builder of good will in its community, and that its success depends upon the efficiency of its service.

3% interest on savings and dormant accounts. Interest figured on daily balances.

Irrespective of its size, we invite your account.

Richmond Trust Company

Capital and Surplus, $1,200,000

Main and 7th Streets

Southern Churchman

DOMINUS FRUSTRA ISIN 1835

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., MAY 28, 1921. No. 22.

"Just As I Am, Thine Own To Be."

Just as I am, Thine own to be,
Friend of the young, who lovest me;
To consecrate myself to Thee,
O, Jesus Christ I come.

In the glad morning of my day,
My life to give, my vows to pay;
With no reserve, and no delay,
With all my heart I come.

I would live ever in the light,
I would work ever for the right,
I would serve Thee with all my might;
Therefore to Thee, I come.

Just as I am, young, strong and free,
To be the best that I can be
For truth, and righteousness, and Thee,
Lord of my life, I come.

EDUCATIONAL

ST. MARY'S

AN EPISCOPAL SOUTHERN SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

Founded 1842. Four-year preparatory and two-year collegiate courses. Music, Art, Elocution, Domestic Science, Business. Gymnasium. Mild climate makes outdoor life possible the year round. 25-acre campus of old oaks. Fourteen electrically lighted, steam-heated buildings. Moderate rates. Catalog.

REV. WARREN W. WAY, RECTOR
BOX 19, ST. MARY'S SCHOOL, RALEIGH, N. C.

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to
REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean
Petersburg, Va.

The Virginian Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY.

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-fourth year of this School for Boys opens September 21, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

Virginia, Chatham. Box 13.

The Chatham Episcopal Institute for Girls

Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Thorough preparation for all colleges. New buildings. Ten-acre campus. Athletics. Gymnasium. Terms moderate. Catalogue and views.

B. D. Tucker, D. D., President; Rev. C. O. Pruden, D. D., Rector; Miss Annie Marian Powell, A. B., Sweet Briar, A. M., Columbia, Prin.

St. Christopher's School

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND, VA.

A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.

Eleventh session begins September 21, 1921. Tuition in boarding department, limited to twenty-two boys, $650. For catalogue, address

REV. C. G. CHAMBERLAYNE, PH. D., HEADMASTER

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university. Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to

REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

The bearer of good news always has a sweet voice.

Before Jesus died, He made a will in favor of every Christian.—Ex.

Life is not so short but that there is always time enough for courtesy.

"No good thing is failure, and no evil thing success."

Lasting unhappiness is not so much a weakness to be pitied as a fault to be overcome.—John Vaughan.

Wherever he may be placed, while he has sin in him, man has hell in him.—W. Jay.

All service ranks the same with God—
With God, Whose puppets, best and worst,
Are we; there is no last or first.
—Browning.

"When a man has not a good reason for doing a thing, he has one reason for letting it alone."

"In the hours of fiercest trial, only let us feel' 'He became a servant for me,' and this will bind the heart as with golden chains to Christ as its Master and Lord."

Love towards God is possible as long, and only so long, as we are dealing with a personal God.—Canon Knox-Little.

Christ not only bids us "sin no more," but He helps us to conquer every temptation. Not only does He urge us to rise to heaven, but He puts forth His hand and gives us the very power which He bids us employ.—Joseph Parker.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,

REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.

A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. College preparatory. Boarding department 503 W. Franklin Street. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health; out-door life.

MISS ROSALIE H. NOLAND, Principal

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLES TOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art. Athletics. Open air classes. Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

HOBART COLLEGE For Men
William Smith College for Women

GENEVA, N. Y.

100th Year Opens September 20, 1921

Hobart offers a large number of scholarships to students preparing for Holy Orders.

RT. REV. CHARLES H. BRENT, D. D., LL. D., CHANCELLOR

RET. MURRAY BARTLETT, D. D., PRESIDENT

For information address the President

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

The Ninety-ninth Session Open Wednesday, September 21, 1921

For catalogs and other information, address The Dean, Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia.

ST. ANNE'S SCHOOL

Boarding and Day School for Girls under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. Charlottesville, Virginia. Location healthful and beautiful. General and College Preparatory Courses. Music and Art. Intermediate and Primary. Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Pres.; Rev. W. R. Mason, Rector

Third term begins April 1st. Catalogue sent on request.

(Miss) EMMA YERBY, Principal.
Charlottesville, Va.

The Divinity School of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Philadelphia.

Founded by Bishop Alonzo Potter in 1862.

Special students admitted. Privilege of attending course of special study at the University of Pennsylvania.

For information address the Rev. George G. Bartlett, S. T. D., Dean, 5000 Woodland Avenue.

The Misses Eastman's School for Girls

1305 Seventeenth St.
Washington, - D. C.

EDUCATIONAL

FAUQUIER INSTITUTE

FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES WARRENTON, VA.

The 62nd session begins September 29, 1921. Situated in Piedmont region of Virginia, 55 miles from Washington. A limited and thorough home school. Modern buildings, 5-acre campus. Catalog.

MISS NELLIE V. BUTLER, PRINCIPAL, BOX 17

Roanoke College

Salem, Va.

A standard college for men. In beautiful Valley of Virginia. Notable record for producing leaders for the Church and nation.

CHAS. J. SMITH Presidnet

Have You Selected Your School?

Enrollments are now being made for the ensuing school year. Many institutions already have a waiting list. If you find it difficult to make a choice, the Southern Churchman will be glad to assist you. Address

Southern Churchman School Bureau
815 East Grace St.
Richmond, Va.

"The Store That Pleases"

FOR FURNITURE

JONES BROS. & CO.

INCORPORATED

1418 East Main St. :-: Richmond, Va

The Norfolk Convention

Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States
The thirty-sixth annual national gathering of clergy and laity of the Church

NORFOLK, VA.

Wednesday to Sunday, October 12 to 16, 1921
The first convention in the South since 1914

The program and speakers will be announced later
For information, address

BROTHERHOOD OF ST ANDREW

CHURCH HOUSE, 202 SOUTH 19TH STREET
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

We can give only what we have; we can teach only what we know; we can influence only by what we are.

How much trouble he avoids who does not look to see what his neighbor says or does or thinks, but only to what he does himself, that it may be just and pure.—Marcus Aurelius.

That which is good to be done cannot be done too soon; and, if it is neglected to be done early, it will frequently happen that it will not be done at all.—Bishop Mant.

A courteous disposition becomes the elect of God; for the design of the gospel is not only to soften the minds of men, but to sweeten them, and to promote friendship among men, as well as reconciliation with God.

So much the rather Thou, celestial Light,
Shine inward, and the mind through all her powers
Irradiate; there plant eyes; all mist from thence Purge and disperse; that I may see and tell
Of things invisible to mortal sight.
—Milton.

Compared with Christ, the greatest geniuses are local characters and parochial school-masters. He looms over all the world as the one universal Man Who typifies humanity, and is equally at home in all ages and among all peoples.—J. H. Snowden.

True charity or love in its noblest forms is in some measure like the divine love. In some ways it is ubiquitous, though in other ways it seems condensed or concentrated. As Dr. Martineau said concerning the omnipresence of God and His special presence in the soul of Christ, no distant star missed Him the more because He shone with such peculiar brightness in the fair glory of that pure life.—A. H. Cranford.

God, keep us through the common days,
The level stretches white with dust,
When thought is tired, and hands upraise
Their burdens feebly, since they must.
In days of slowly fretting care,
Then most we need the strength of prayer.
—Margaret E. Sangster.

"If you have part with Christ in His glory, can you be unwilling to share with Him in His reproach? If you are to 'live with Him,' cannot you 'die with Him'?"

If a man tries to live always on the power of the first grace given, he will fail. We must go to the cross daily.—E. L. Hull.

One may and will understand more about human nature by the study of Christ; but one cannot understand Christ by the study of human nature Christ is more than man, more than human, more than the theories and thoughts about men and events. We can only understand Christ by and through the exercise of faith. And unless we accept Him in faith we never come to understand Him.—Christian Sun.

SUMMER CAMPS

The growing popularity of camps for young people attests the benefit to mind and body of open air and well regulated exercise. Select your camp now. The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN will help you to make a choice.

CAMP NAVAJO FOR GIRLS

7-16 years. On beautiful Lake Thompson, Maine. (Via Bar Harbor exp. from New York, one night.) Rat $200 (no extras). Mid pines and birches on hill sloping down to lake. Full program of water and land sport taught by experienced councillors. Handicraft, folk and interpretative dancing. Excellent food. Physician and nurse. Catalog. Register before June 1st. CLARA HENDERSON, Dir., 1530 Linden Ave., Baltimore, Md.

CAMP MINNEHAHA

for Girls "Home Care; Camp Fun." In the "Land of the Sky." Altitude 2,000 feet. Eight weeks' season, $200. MRS. BELLE ABOTT ROXBY, Bat Cave, N. C.

HIGHLANDS, NORTH CAROLINA

THE DAVIS HOUSE

Tenth Session Opens June 1st

Altitude, 4,000 feet. An invogorating climate and most comfortable house. Church people preferred.

Address MRS. M. MARTIN

Many pens have attempted to write a Life of Christ since Canon Farrar wrote his famous volume. The difficulty with most of them is that they give so much attention to technical details they do not hold the interest of the general reader. For some time there has been need of a book that would make its appeal through its clearness and charm of treatment.

This need has now been filled by

PATERSON-SMYTH'S
NEW BOOK

A PEOPLE'S LIFE OF CHRIST

Told in a way that will be read again and again for the solid enjoyment it affords.

The Churchman says: "A book which the average man will read for the pleasure of reading it—a new and popular version for the day and generation."

ONLY $3.50 NET

THE SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO
RICHMOND, VA.

Jno. L. Williams & Sons

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565)
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds

Earn Extra Dollars in Your Spare Hours

You need no experience to be successful—You can learn as you earn. Let us tell you about our plan.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN is the oldest Episcopal Church Paper published in America. Every dollar received in subscriptions will be devoted to the improvement of the paper and the extension of its service in the work of the Church.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

Street.....

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson
Security Storage Company, Inc.
Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage
Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

You Can Send Your Boy or Girl to Any College in This State

At but small sacrifice to yourself through our "COLLEGE PLAN"
If you will begin to prepare while they are young
Ask or write for booklet

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK

Tenth and Main Sts. Richmond, Virginia
"The Bank with the Three Doors of Opportunity"

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor
Richmond, Va.

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS

Largest stock in the South
We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival
The Couper Marble Works
(Established 65 years)
264-268 Bank St., Norfolk, Va

J. & R. Lamb

23-25-27 SIXTH AVENUE NEW YORK
MEMORIALS IN STAINED GLASS
MOSAIC · MARBLE · STONE · GRANITE
CARVED WOOD · METAL · ETC.

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., MAY 28, 1921. No. 22.

THE NATION-WIDE CAMPAIGN GOES FORWARD

Those are encouraging words for the whole Church which the new Bishop of New York spoke concerning the Nation-Wide Campaign at the first Council over which he has presided in his great Diocese.

"But whatever our private opinions may be as to the Nation-Wide Campaign, we are all now committed to it. It is not an experiment in which we are at liberty to take our part or not, as we may prefer. It is the officially adopted system of the Church. It comes to us with the full authority of General Convention Every parish, by virtue of its organic connection with the Church, is pledged to it. If any one of you is doubtful as to this matter, I beg that you will reconsider the grounds of that doubt. I ask each of you to use to the utmost your influence and your strength to prosper in your parish and throughout the Diocese this great undertaking of the Church."

Therein those dioceses which carried the flags of the Nation-Wide Campaign forward while some sat still in the trenches are vindicated. They dared put to the proof the brave venture of faith to which at the convention in Detroit the whole Church had been pledged. It is strange that it should have taken some dioceses so long to understand that "we are all now committed to it," and that "every parish, by virtue of its organic connection with the Church, is pledged to it." But if now, through new leaders, or through old leaders waking to a new realization of the truth, the dioceses which heretofore have hung back, go forward, the Nation-Wide Campaign shall yet become the sweeping triumph which its leaders dared believe.

All honor to the dioceses which first set the example that now the Church at large bids fair to follow!

THE CHURCH IN THE RURAL NEIGHBORHOODS

All the leading features in the Southern Churchman for this week unite to present one theme—the call to this Church to larger service in the small towns and the open country of America.

This Church of ours has been outstripped by other communions in the building up of rural congregations. We are strong in some of the cities, but weak in the country. In the end, of course, this weakness in the rural districts weakens us in the cities, too; for into the cities there flows a constant stream of young men and women who follow in their new homes the church affiliations which they had already established in the country—and these affiliations are not with us. In a certain large city one of the other communions attempted some decades ago to build up congregations and failed—largely because our own Church was then very strongly entrenched. That other body of Christians then withdrew for a time and turned their energies to building up churches in the territory all round the city. These rapidly increased in number and power, and as their members migrated into the city itself, there was created a body of people frorm whom congregations in the city could be recruited; and the present result is that the body of Christians which at first could get no foothold in that city because the Episcopal Church was already so powerfully established there, now not only have taken possession of the country neighborhoods, but have grown to outnumber our own membership two or three to one in the city from which at first they found it expedient to withdraw.

For the ultimate life and power of our own Church, therefore, even in the great centers where it seems to be entrenched, there is need that we should build more strongly in the country.

But there is another and a better reason. We ought to be in the country in order that our Church may grow. But we ought to be in the country even more because the country needs the service which this Church can give.

As things stand now in many parts of rural America, organized Christianity is playing an appallingly small and ineffective part in moulding the life of the people. The churches are often small, shabby structures, served by part-time ministers, flaring into spasmodic efforts at revivals through brief periods of excitement, and then lapsing into lethargy and impotence because they are neither inspired nor equipped for imaginative community service.

In "Six Thousand Churches," the published story of a recent survey of eighteen counties in Ohio, chosen for study because they seemed typical of the long-settled rural neighborhoods of America where Christian churches have been established for generations, the authors, Charles Otis Gill and Gifford Pinchot, come to this conclusion:

"In this area, after more than a hundred years of the work of the churches, the religious, social and economic welfare of the people is going down. Although the churches have been here for more than a century, no normal type of organized religion is really flourishing, while the only kind which, during the past fifteen years, has been gaining ground—the cult of the Holy Rollers—is scarcely better than that of a dervish. The churches have failed, and are failing, to dispel ignorance and superstition, to prevent the increase of vice, the spread of disease, and the general moral and spiritual decadence of the people. Imbeciles, feeble-minded and delinquents are numerous, politics is corrupt, the selling of votes is common, petty crimes abound, the schools have been badly managed and poorly attended. Cases of rape, assault and robbery are of almost weekly occurrence within five minutes' walk of one of the county seats, while in another county political control is held by a self-confessed criminal."

The Episcopal Church, with its sane ideals of social service, and its conception of religion as meaning not seasons of tempestuous emotionalism, but the steady devotion of mind and spirit of the upbuilding of the Kingdom, has a vast field of service before it in rural America today, and we must go forward to seize that opportunity. Here and there already are parishes which are conspicuous in achievement. The men who go out from the seminaries have before them the example of what these parishes have wrought, and there is a new consciousness in the minds of many of our young clergy of the dignity and interest of rural work. It is to strengthen this consciousness that we have gathered together in this issue of the Southern Churchman the expression of ideals and records of present day attempts which make plain the fields of spiritual opportunity which lie along the country roads.

OUR WORLD RESPONSIBILITY

On the evening of May 18 there was delivered before the World Alliance for International Friendship through the churches, by Mr. Edward A. Filene (of the well-known mercantile firm of Boston bearing that same name), an address which expresses from the point of view of a business man the same truth which repeatedly we have sought to voice on this page. We commend his message to the thought and to the will of all Christian people. Here is its conclusion:

"To bring order out of chaos in Europe there is need mainly of the understanding by our people that we are really neighbors of Europe, that we are intimately concerned in Europe's fate and must act as good neighbors. Lloyd George, speaking in the House of Commons, recently said: 'People forget that countries are interdependent. "Love your neighbor" is not only sound Christianity, but also good business.' And when the power of business is limited, religion, the churches, can help much. Religion has no more important mission to fulfil than to make its doctrine of 'love thy neighbor' come to the world's aid in this crisis. International neighborliness, international friendship, is religion in action, applied religion. We are not good neighbors if from a position of comparative safety we use our superior strength selfishly while we see our neighbors fighting with their lives to keep intact the dam that stems the threatening flood of destruction. We can be good neighbors to Europe only if we lend our strength to save her from the flood of want, unemployment and anarchy that threatens her. There is no other way but by the co-operation of the United States in an association of nations, or in the League of Nations modified as may be necessary.

"I am apparently making a plea for the League, but I am not intending primarily to do that. I am emphasizing the points that the facts make it necessary to emphasize, and almost any study of conditions in Europe will force one to emphasize the absolute need of our association with the nations of Europe if there is to be recuperation and lasting peace.

"Disarmament agreements are offered by many people as a substitute. Reduction of military expenses is necessary in all nations because, in Europe especially, they are too great a burden to be borne safely in addition to the huge expenses of the war. But disarmament on an adequate scale is impossible without some efficient substitute. There is no substitute for war except law—international law. But international law effective enough to be a substitute for war is impossible without an association of nations of which the United States is a participant. Any study of present world conditions will show that without the United States even the present League, which has in its membership forty-eight of the principal nations of the world, must degenerate into the old type, war-engendering, balance-of-power coalitions.

"Besides the business and material reasons, it seems to me there are real ethical and spiritual reasons why we have got to go into Europe and help We pray, 'Give us this day our daily bread.' Would any of us confine this prayer to bread for Americans alone? And daily bread cannot come in time to Europe unless we in the United States make it possible, not a palliative through alms, but through real international friendship. Organized religion can help by giving leadership and voice to the understanding of our countrymen. Without leadership the ideals of one hundred million people in the richest country of the world must be ineffective. It is the great opportunity—the great responsibility, for religion.

"The world has spent much of its substance in war. The time for payment has come. It was easy to spend in war, but the road uphill—the road back to the plateaus of the civilization, peace and universal daily bread of 1913, that had been reached by endless struggle and martyrdoms —is unspeakably hard. * * *

"Yes, the road back to the plateaux of peace and universal daily bread will indeed require all the world's best qualities—the best qualities of business and of religion combined. And the surest way to make these qualities effective is through international friendship. That does not mean we must force ourselves to love every man and woman in every nation; it does mean that we must recognize that invention and progress have made our nation the physical neighbor of every other nation, have brought London and Paris nearer Chicago than the thirteen States were to each other when we made our United States. Nationally, we must think and act in a neighborly fashion like good neighbors, or fight like bad neighbors.

"The Church's fundamental ideals are justice, mercy, brotherhood. These are the foundations for international friendship—the foundation for international co-operation. It is an augury of sure victory that the measures needed for the restoration of our material prosperity are the same as those needed for our spiritual salvation."

Book Notices

Our Family Affairs. 1867-1896. By E. F. Benson. George H. Doran Company, New York. Pp. 336. $4.

An English novelist of note, a son of the late Archbishop Benson, of Canterbury, gives us here a charming picture of his early home life and incidental glimpses of the best side of the social life in England toward the end of the Victorian era. His skill as a narrator is shown on every page, and the reader finds himself following with unfailing interest the games and adventures, as well as the more serious happenings and pursuits of a very sprightly family. Several characters of great beauty stand out in clear relief, and though the book loses something of its attractiveness toward the end, when it becomes almost entirely autobiographical, it is, on the whole, an unusually well done piece of work of its kind.

Lambeth and Reunion. An Interpretation of the Mind of the Lambeth Conference of 1920. By the Bishops of Peterborough, Zanzibar and Hereford. London, S. P. C. K. New York. The Macmillan Co. Paper, pp. 115.

Three representative English bishops of as many "schools of thought" unite in this "interpretation," and doubtless give us a fairly accurate composite of the thought of the majority of the Lambeth Conference in its Appeal for Unity and accompanying Resolutions. The many preceding steps in the same direction are briefly sketched, the mind in which the conference assembled is described, and the story of how its most important deliverance was framed and agreed upon is told, so far as can be without violation of confidence, step by step until the consummation was reached so surprising even to those most closely engaged therein that it could but be acknowledged as the work of the Spirit of God. The following chapters speak of the Realization of the Ideal, the Present Duty, etc., and the whole gives perhaps the best presentation of the mind of this Church, as far as formulated, on this great question which has been published.

The Political Aspects of St. Augustine's "City of God." By the Rev. John Neville Figgis, Litt. D. Longmans, Green & Co., London and New York. Pp. 132. $2.50.

This is the last work of the late Dr. Figgis, but shows no diminution of his powers of penetration and vigor of mind. As the title indicates, it is a study and analysis of Augustine's great work and its results upon the thought of the middle ages and later periods. A book which scholars, especially on historical lines, will find of great interest.

Prayers for the Church and Nation. By Rev. W. B. Trevelyan. Longmans, Green & Co. Pp. 96. $1.50.

An English book of prayers and readings, which is excellent in many ways, but is sadly marred by invocations to the saints and other "fond things, vainly invented," which are contrary to the teachings of this Church.

Pamphlets. Stewardship; by the Rt. Rev. I. P. Johnson, D. D., Bishop of Colorado. The Church of Denmark and the Anglican Communion; by the Rev. Rasmus Andersen, pastor of Our Saviour's Danish Church, Brooklyn. Norwegian and English Churches, Past and Present Relations; by the Rev. Albert Nicolay Gilbertson. Published by Department of Missions and Church Extension, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

WORK IN A VIRGINIA COUNTRY PARISH

By the Rev. F. E. Warren

In writing of work in a rural parish, one quickly realizes that country parishes differ widely in very many respects; that one community may have splendid roads and another be struggling along with the sort of roads that have made Virginia a by-word among the States. One community may lie close to the railroad and thus have easy connection with the outside world; another may be many miles from any railroad. One parish may have among its staunch members a number of those who bear names which are honored throughout our State and country and who wield a powerful influence for the Church of their forefathers; while to another parish all that is left of one great family after another are the crumbling monuments in the old church yard—neglected and rapidly falling into ruins to be remembered no more. These are only a few of the great things which make one rural community so different from another. Many more, such as health, wealth, kinds of crops, etc., might be added.

What follows is based on experience gained in a definitely rural parish, far away from any railroad, served passing well by steamboat, with good State roads, people well-to-do, not by any means rich, and most of whom are not descended from the first settlers, and therefore have no traditional love for the Episcopal Church.

At one time in this parish there were three strong churches about ten miles apart from each other. Today these churches still exist, but the Baptists own one and have a thriving congregation there, the Methodists another, also with an active membership, and we own the third. What seems to have happened is something like this. After the Revolution many of the old families moved away, and although others came, they were of not quite such stately birth, and the Church did not see how it was possible to exist without these first families, and so matters were left to the other denominations. It is a heresy, hard to down, that our Church can only appeal to the high-born and cultured.

Experience teaches us that the Church has a definite place in the life of every community and among all classes of people. All that is needed is to bring the Church to the people. In many places we have never tried, and in others we are trying, but in a most faint-hearted way. Our Church has the great message of a Saviour's love and a divine life to deliver to every man and woman and child.

If we would make atonement for the past neglect, we must bestir ourselves and intelligently undertake the work, fully awake to the changed conditions of country life.

Good roads and the automobile have made church attendance much easier than formerly, but they have taken away from the church, almost entirely, one of its most important functions, that of ministering to the social life. People come to church today, from longer distances, with more ease, and in less than a quarter of the time it used to take, and they travel home just as easily and speedily. No longer are homes eight or ten miles away isolated from each other, but there is constant intercourse during the week. So that one of the reasons why country people went to church in the old days—to meet one's friends—has disappeared. And it is to fill this particular social need that the church of today must apply itself. No longer is the old colonial church, with its four bare walls, standing solitary by the roadside, with its reading and preaching of God's Word perhaps on every Sunday sufficient to supply instinctive longings for friendly intercourse. As a rule, our country church services are rather dull, it is very difficult to have good music, and while, unquestionably, they do supply comfort and consolation and inspiratioon to the older members, they do not fill a very large place in the hearts or minds of the younger people.

Of course, what is needed is to make the church the centre, the real social centre, of the whole community. This can be done with ease because we have none of the distractions and allurements of the city to compete with. Any poor traveling moving picture show can always play to packed houses every time it chances along, no matter how indifferent or silly the pictures. Any strolling lecturer of any sort can speak to large audiences at will, no matter what the subject or manner of man may be. The writer remembers standing astonished to see the crowds attending a traveling "menagerie," consisting of one miserable looking little black bear, a wretched monkey, two or three snakes and some half-starved ponies.

One might multiply these illustrations, but enough have been given to show that the people are desperately hungry for some kind of social pleasure or recreation.

Here is the need and the opportunity. To lift up to a higher, fuller standard of living, a whole parish, a whole county. There is the opportunity to make over the entire life of a whole community. There is little of the sordidness of life one sees in some sections of our cities, but, on the other hand, life in the rural districts is very narrow, mean and, too often, sinful. Of recreation for young and old practically none at all. And just because our Church is peculiarly suited to supply the need, so much the greater is our responsibility. The other denominations, which so greatly outnumber us, have but a narrow, puritanical view of religion. Joy of life, earthly happiness, fundamental teachings of the gospel have no place in their religion. Amusement, however innocent, is sinful.

Will the people respond? The response is so quick, so sincere, that it is pathetic. All they are waiting for is a leader; they will follow gladly, almost blindly. Given the proper equipment, our Church can, with ease, become once more the dominating influence in the life of the entire community. What this will mean no one can with certainty foresee, but we believe that it will result in a better understanding of education, a more healthy, wholesome, joyous life with wider interests. It will tend to keep the best of our young people in the country instead of forcing them out to the cities, and thus will preserve to the country the most useful of its citizens.

Is there not an appeal, a challenge to those of the younger clergy whose eyes are fascinated by the city? In the country one of mediocre attainments can become the real leader of an entire community, whilst in the city he is quickly lost in the crowd. Is the appeal of our country work less strong than the appeal of other domestic fields? May not even the burning zeal and enthusiasm which sweep some men to the foreign field find satisfaction in one of the deserted fields of our old Diocese?

A Hard Job, But a Glorious One

It is a hard job to go into an isolated county community or small town where people are discouraged, where there are possibly no modern conveniences for yourself or your family, where sometimes there are petty squabbles of long standing, where people are sometimes narrow and prejudiced and little, and where what you do will never be appreciated by some of the people, probably least by those for whom you make the greatest sacrifices.

But it is a glorious job to put your faith up against the lack of faith of many, to put your hope, ungovernable because supplied from an unquenchable source, up against the hopelessness of many, to put your love, all embracing and tender and mighty, to the breaking down of strongholds up against the bitterness and antagonistics around about you.

By the grace of God—and how sure you are in such a situation that it is His grace alone—you are able to have the joy of achievement. It may be that the achievement doesn't emerge so that any one else, your brother pastors or your friends or anybody, knows it. But you know that things have happened, that the good Lord Himself has been your partner in the enterprise, and that it is a success.

It is a hard job, but a glorious one, to be a country minister.

MEMORIAL.

Heroic Dead of Verdun.

Elmer C. Pedrick.

If in the morn they feared, in the night
They never swerved. Death could not them appall.
There was one Way, one Truth, one Hope, one Light,
One Right that shone triumphant over all.

If in the noon they doubted, at the last
There was no way to shirk, no way but one
That opened on the gates of death and cast
On many days, a shadow cross the sun.

If in the night they doubted, their last breath
Saluted once again the eternal goal,
Chanting a war-song in the face of death,
And tore the cloud of darkness from the soul.

PLANNING AND BUILDING IN THE SMALL PARISH

By the Rev. B. Duval Chambers

This parish consists of the old Mother Church dating back to the middle of the last century, one chapel erected shortly after the Civil War, and a second chapel, which has been in existance about thirty years. It is located in a diocese whose bishop is greatly interested in rural work, and is most helpful and encouraging at all times. He encourages with a personal friendliness, frequent visitations, good advice and material assistance.

The parish church is located in a trucking section, one chapel in a grain-farming district and the other is in a railroad village, from which 90 per cent. of the men commute daily to the nearby city. The communicant list has ranged for a number of years between 125 and 150, seldom below the former, never above the latter. The organizations consist of three live Sunday schools, two guilds, Bible classes and the Woman's Auxiliary. The lethargic St. Andrew's Brotherhood diverted its energies to the live guild. The parish church is alone in its immediato neighborhood, while across the road from one chapel is a Lutheran Church and near the other chapel are Roman Catholic and Methodist Churches. The rector, however, is the only resident clergyman within the parish limits.

A two-story building at the parish church, used for many years by the Sunday school and for unusual services and meetings, showed signs of decay. It was a case of repair the old or build a new one. After much discussion for and against, vestry and congregation assent and dissent, it was decided to build a parish hall on another site adjacent to the church or parish property. When the final decision was arrived at, plans were procured, ways and means for securing funds outlined, all doubt and opposition disappeared; every dissenter and assenter vied one with another in immediate and effective action.

A frame building 36x50, to contain an auditorium, stage, dressing-rooms and kitchen, was planned. The stone for the foundation was secured at a small outlay and was hauled without expense. Two masons in the congregation made very reasonable terms and put their work through with dispatch. A fair estimate from a nearby contractor was accepted, the lumber hauled free of charge, and operations were soon under way, and in an incredibly brief time a completed building made its appearance on the country side.

To give a concrete illustration (concrete being the material used as well as the adjective) of the saving by the congregational helping hand—the cost of the steps in the vestibule was estimated at $35. With a little ministerial effort between the handles of a wheelbarrow and the working outside of union hours by an enthusiastic parishioner (an expert in his line), an excellent job was made, and the cost was the price of the materials, less than $5. The total cost of this building will not be given, because it was completed before the present reign of high prices, so the figures would simply occasion vain wishes, envy or possibly downright unbelief.

How was it paid for? In the same way it was built, by every person in the congregation doing his and her part. As many hands make light work, so can many contributors reduce a large debt. The building was ready for occupancy in six months, and in two years was paid for.

Long before this hall was even thought of, the necessity for such a building in the railroad town was very apparent. Month after month the Guild had discussed and looked for a suitable location. This dragged along for more than a year, with no solution or acceptable location in sight. Finally the clergyman in charge decided to act upon some advice given by a visitor to the students when he was in the Seminary. This pastor of experience said, "Whenever you want a Sunday school superintendent, or a teacher, or a leader, don't take some one you think might do it, but go after the best man in the church." If that works in the case of a Sunday school, it should work with a building site, thought the rector, so he forthwith approached the largest land-owner in that section and asked him for the best lot in the entire community. Not to his utter amazement (for this rector had faith in Dr. Clark's advice), this owner said, "Yes, I'll sell you that lot upon one condition, that you put up a creditable looking building." Upon the publication of this extraordinary piece of news the little band of communicants was electrified. Soliciting committees, plans and autos immediately got under way. When in a short time the money was taken to the owner and he was asked to make over the deed, he was greatly surprised, as he thought the whole thing a far-in-the-future proposition. But realizing and appreciating the zeal and enthusiasm of the neighborhood, while he was not living there at the time, not to be outdone by others and wishing to exhibit a good spirit, he said, "To show you that I have an interest in the church and community, I am going to give you that lot, and what is more, if you promise to move the church in town and put it beside your hall, I'll give a whole acre of ground, which will be enough for both." I mention this, at the risk of tediousness, simply to show that upon a venture of faith such as this, besides the eager efforts of the congregation, very practical help comes from most unexpected quarters.

As the men of this chapel were largely commuters and could do no hauling or render any other assistance in the work, this building cost over $1,000 more than the one previously described. Their construction was along the same general lines, the second being larger and profiting by several lessons we learned from the first. Both were made possible in one way only—by the interest, energy, good-will and liberality of every person in the parish and a majority of the people of the community. Outside of the Bishop's donation of $500 to each hall, there was no contribution over $100, and only three of that sum, which proved parish co-operation and a co-operation which did not cease with the completion of the building. Each hall was equipped with a piano, folding chairs, a cook stove, utensils and dishes enough to meet the demands of any function There was also a large assortment of decorations which lent color and attractiveness to the various assemblies. A stereopticon made trips back and forth as needed. As there was no electricity at hand, this machine was connected with the prestolite of an automobile parked close to the nearest window. It might be added that the full equipment was quite as much of an asset as the building; for who has not served his time carrying chairs, stage furniture, dishes, etc., to the nearby school building, and then, worse than that, have to carry them back, when there was no incentive, no excitement, no one else to do it.

The question is frequently asked, "Why a parish hall?" First, it takes the Sunday school out of the church, gives the teachers and scholars opportunity of doing work which was not possible in the noise and commotion and distraction inevitable with all the classes in the nave of the church, even though distributed at greatest possible distances. These buildings have answered that question most conclusively in this county by the fact that they have ministered to every community need since their erection. One of the earliest meetings was the largest gathering of people ever assembled in that part of the county in the interests of good schools Not long after, a get-together smoker resulted in the formation of the Improvement Association, which has aroused much civic pride and been the means of many greatly-needed improvements. After a wedding in the parish church a reception was held in the parish hall, which was vastly more convenient than driving five miles to the bride's home. During the war both halls found many opportunities of opening their doors for Liberty Loan and Red Cross meetings, work-rooms and entertainments for soldiers. If there was one use for parish buildings before the war, there are a dozen reasons for them now. The community's needs are many, the parish hall meets them. Aside from all religious uses, it is one, if not the answer to the question being asked by those who see the trend of things, who are vitally concerned in the future of our rural districts—"How can we keep our boys and girls in the country?"

We have no tears Thou wilt not dry;
We have no wounds Thou wilt not heal;
No sorrows pierce our human hearts
That Thou, dear Saviour, dost not feel!

Thy pity like the dew distils,
And Thy compassion, like the light,
Our every morning overfills,
And crowns with stars our every night.

No love, no life goes ever from us; it goes as He went, that it may come again, deeper and closer and surer, and be with us always, even to end of the world. Out of the body to God—that shall be that last outgoing, the everlasting entering in. That is what we wait for—the adoption, the redemption of our body, the full manifestations of the sons of God.—Mrs. A. D. Whitney.

One of the surest ways to get a person to show out his best side, either in spirit or in work, is to expect it.—Ex.

AN INTERESTING OLD CHURCH SITE

By Mrs. Eleanor Fairfax Griffith

[We publish this article in this special issue of the Southern Churchman dealing with rural work because it shows so vividly the desolation of the Church which marked the period after the Revolution in many of the old colonial parishes, in contrast with which stands the new life of vigorous country congregations as they are being developed by the forces of today.—Ed. S. C.]

Washington Parish, Westmoreland County, in the Diocese of Virginia, was established somewhere between 1655 and 1680. The name appears in an authentic list of parishes dated in the latter year. The parish was certainly named for the Washington family, founded by the brothers John and Lawrence, probably the most prominent pioneer settlers, who established seats in this part of Westmoreland at about the former date. Of the earlier churches in the parish no records remain. When it grew strong enough to erect two of the substantial and supposedly permanent brick churches of the later colonial era, one, the "upper church," was located at Round Hill, then in Westmoreland, but, since the readjustment on the county and parish lines in 1777 and 1778, now in King George County and Hanover Parish. The "lower church" was known as "Pope's Creek Church" from a nearby stream. The site is immediately on the State road down the Northern Neck, about one mile east of where it crosses the creek. It is about four or five miles from Wakefield, the birthplace of Washington, and five miles from Stratford, erected by Colonel Thomas Lee, who was a member of the King's Council, president and commander-in-chief of the colony, and for a while governor by royal appointment, the birthplace of Richard Henry Lee, of "Light Horse Harry" Lee, and lastly of his son, General Robert E. Lee. Of the old Pope's Creek Church there remains only the outline of the brick foundation, showing the size to have been 40 by 60 feet. A public schoolhouse once occupied part of the site. While on a visit to Stratford a short time ago, the writer went to the old family vault, and finding a marble tablet in good preservation, copied from it the following inscription:

"Here lies buried the Hon. Col. Thos. Lee, who died November 14, 1750, aged sixty years; and his beloved wife, Hannah Lee. She departed this life January 25, 1749-50. Their monument is erected in the lower church of Washington Parish in this county, five miles above their county seat, Stratford Hall."

There is now no vestige of this monument to be seen, but I am reliably informed that it was taken from the ruined church and used as a hearthstone by some one living near the spot.

Bishop Payne, when his health failed as Missionary Bishop to Africa, returned to his native State and made his home (which he called Cavalla) in Westmoreland County. Taking charge of Washington Parish, he became much interested in this historic church, and thought he had secured the means of rebuilding it "with funds left by a gentleman in New York for rebuilding such churches." With this object in view, he had the site enclosed and a drawing made of the proposed church, but unfortunately, the fund could not be obtained. About 1872 Bishop Payne commenced to hold regular services one Sunday afternoon in each month in the schoolhouse then occupying the site of the old church, which services were continued by his successor, the Rev. William C. Latane. During the Bishop's rectorship of the parish he wrote out in the register a history of the parish, from which the following is a quotation:

"Pope's Creek Church was one of the churches in which the Rev. Archibald Campbell officiated. As this was the principal parish church, and in the immediate neighborhood of the Washingtons, Lees and other influential families, services were probably held here regularly until some time after the Revolutionary War. After this came constant changes in the ministers, and this, with other adverse influences common to this and all Episcopal churches throughout the State, led to infrequent services, then to the neglect of the fabric of the church, until it became so dilapidated that it was finally burned, with the permission of the proprietor (Mr. Storke), into whose hands it had fallen about 1828, lest the cattle, which were allowed to take refuge in it, should be killed by the falling of the roof.

"The following notice of this church, taken from Bishop Meade's report to the convention May, 1838, is sadly interesting: It was near this church that General Washington was born; it was in this church that he was baptized. Here it was that he received those early impressions of religion which, instead of being effaced by age, seemed to grow with his growth and strengthen with his strength. I have said that the church is now in ruins. I would add that about twenty-six years ago (1812), when in deacon's orders, I remember to have been in it with Rev. Mr. Norris, an early and beloved associate in the ministry, at which time it was beginning to decay in the roof. But there was a large congregation, and twenty-eight children were brought forward for baptism. It would appear that the site of this church, though containing the graves of the most important families in the neighborhood and many others, owing to some neglect on the part of those interested, was never secured to the vestry of the parish."

The Parson Campbell to whom Bishop Payne refers in the preceding extract, he again mentions as having been in charge of this parish from 1754 to 1774. His brother, Alexander Campbell, and himself made their home in this country, whither they had emigrated from Scotland. At the breaking out of the Revolutionary War, the Rev. Archibald took part with the Americans, while Alexander returned to his native land and went to Glasgow. His youngest son, Thomas, the celebrated poet, was born there after his return." Bishop Payne also states that Mr. Ruel Keith officiated as lay reader in old Pope's Creek Church while he was private tutor in the parish and boarding at Montrose with Mrs. Rose, about 1816-18. Afterwards he became the first professor in the Theological Seminary at Alexandria, Va. The Bishop was personally acquainted with Mrs. Rose, and heard her speak with much interest of Mr. Keith in connection with his residence in this parish. There are now very few, if any, Episcopalians in the immediate vicinity of this old church, and its place is taken by the church at Oak Grove, a few miles distant, but much more conveniently situated for the congregation, which still includes in its membership some of the Washingtons and their descendants.

The Great Commission.

CHINA FAMINE RELIEF.

Minister Crane, of China, has cabled to the Secretary of State, putting in the strongest terms the need for continuing famine relief. He cites the fact of prolonged drought threatening the total loss of the spring crops, particularly in the Province of Chihli. Two millions of people have looked forward to profiting from this spring crop, and it now means that they will have to receive aid until the summer crops are gathered in August.

Those who have studied the situation see that this makes it necessary for Americans to keep up their generous subscriptions.

The cable further states that though the Chinese have contributed wonderfully according to their ability, relief in the degree in which it has been given would never be possible except for American and Canadian friends.

It is also to be said that there follows in the wake of every famine additional calls for supplementary gifts. Even when the hunger stage has passed, there is the danger of pestilence, and preventative measures must be taken on a large scale. Then, too, where death has entered so many families, there are many orphans and widows left. These must be cared for, and in the first days of their destitution famine relief is a necessity.

It is now possible to give a complete report of the amounts which have been contributed to date. There has been sent through the Central Committee appointed by the President of the United States a total of $3,750,000. In addition to this, various Christian bodies have sent through their own treasurers a total of $1,250.000. Chinese auxiliaries have forwarded a total of $250,000, and the American Red Cross has given outright $1,000,000. This brings the total to date to $6,250,000. This sum is gratifying, even though it does not reach the desired maximum that many Americans had hoped the United States would contribute when they first thought of this matter in the fall of 1920. If we can augment this amount by a generous gift of several millions more up to the first of August, we ought to have reason for feeling that we have done a great piece of work, and that this total of so many millions of dollars will be a most substantial expression to the Chinese people of the sympathetic interest of the American people.

Church Intelligence

Centennial Hymns Wanted.

Plans for the celebration of the Centennial of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society and Semi-Centennial of the Woman's Auxiliary are taking definite shape. One desire of the Committee on Arrangement is that these events should call forth the production of a new hymn preferably with new music which would make a permanent addition to our hymnal. With this in mind the committee is asking that such of our people as are qualified submit hymns for this occasion, the content of which should be expressive not only of the past accomplishment, but of the hopes and aspirations of the world extension of the Church. The committee reserves the right to consider only such hymns as are in the spirit of this centennial celebration, and are of the highest quality and of a standard worthy of being associated with the great hymns of the Church and therefore of being perpetuated. This is in no sense a competition, but if from the efforts of the committee one or more good hymns are produced, it will be the endeavor of the committee to place them before the Church with the hope that they may have wide use in the Church.

The committee will take steps to refer all compositions to the Church's best authorities on hymns so that in rendering its decision it can give assurance that a consensus of competent opinion has been reached.

The committee would call attention to the fact that the words are only half of a hymn, and that if a new setting in music could sing itself into the Church life, the missionary services of the Church would receive a new uplift. While the committee will receive words for hymns without music, they would urge that writers themselves secure the co-operation of composers so that they may submit complete hymns. When this is impracticable, the committee is willing, if specially desired, but without undertaking any responsibility in the matter, to try to secure the composition of appropriate music.

All suggestions should be sent to the Centennial Sunday Committee, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Council.

The one hundred and twenty-sixth annual Council of the Diocese was held in Christ Church, Charlottesville, the Rev. W. Roy Mason, rector, May 18-20, the opening service being the celebration of the Holy Communion by the Bishop, assisted by Rev. Messrs. Gravatt, D. D., Brydon and Mason.

The Rev. E. L. Goodwin, D. D., was re-elected Secretary, but, being unavoidably prevented from attendance, the Rev. G. M. Brydon was elected Secretary pro tem. The Rev. W. Clayton Torrence, rector of St. Timothy's Church, Herndon, was appointed Assistant Secretary.

The Bishop's address, which was read at the first business session, after giving a summary of his official acts and statistical report, was devoted to matters of great interest in the development of the work of the Diocese, the proposed changes in canons, the new system of Church schools, the Nation-Wide Campaign, ending with a strong appeal to the Church people of the Diocese to take seriously to heart the seeming breakdown of moral standards in the life of the present day.

The most important matter coming before the Council was the consideration of proposed changes in various canons of the Diocese governing the work of the Diocesan Missionary Society, the Diocesan Board of Religious Education and the Social Service Commission, and the further conduct of the Nation-Wide Campaign. The proposed amendments were adopted. Under the new rule the Executive Committee of the Diocesan Missionary Society, composed of ten members elected from the Diocese and ten others elected by and from the five convocations, will be practically the Executive Committee of the whole missionary Church extension, religious education and Social Service work of the whole Diocese. Boards of Religious Education and of Social Service elected by this Executive Committee will have charge of these departments of the work. A strong Board of Apportionment, acting under the Executive Committee, will prepare the budget for all the missionary and extension work of the Diocese, including also its pro rata share of the work of the General Church, and will make apportionment of this amount to the parishes of the Diocese after approval by the Executive Committee and final approval by the Council of the Diocese.

Elections resulted as follows:

For the Standing Committee: The Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., dean of the Theological Seminary; the Rev. W. H. Burkhardt and the Rev. John J. Gravatt, D. D., both of Richmond; Messrs. Gardner L. Boothe, Alexandria; A. R. Hoxton, headmaster of the Episcopal High School, and W. M. Lyle, of the University.

Executive Committee of the Diocesan Missionary Society: The Bishop and the Treasurer of the Diocese, ex-officio, the Rev. Messrs. W. R. Bowie, D. D., W. H. Burkhardt and J. F. Ribble, of Richmond; Archdeacon F. W. Neve, of Ivy Depot, and the Rev. Kensey J. Hammond, D. D., of Culpeper; Messrs. John M. Taylor, John Stewart Bryan, John B. Minor, Oliver J. Sands, of Richmond, and Robert Beverley, of Essex County.

Convocational Representatives: The Rev. W. Roy Mason and Dr. J. H. Dillard, of the Albemarle; the Rev. E. L. Woodward, M. D., and Mr. John T. Ramey, of the Piedmont; the Rev. F. D. Goodwin and Mr. W. W. Marston, of the Rappahannock; the Rev. W. D. Smith, D. D., and Mr. Lewis C. Williams, of the Richmond; and the Rev. G. B. Palmer and Mr. Robert T. Morrison, of the Valley.

Deputies to the Provincial Synod: The Rev. Messrs. B. D. Tucker, Jr., D. D., Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Va.; Kensey J. Hammond, D. D., Culpeper; George P. Mayo, Richmond, and W. R. Mason, Charlottesville. Lay Deputies: Messrs. John M. Minor, John M. Taylor, John Stewart Bryan and R. Carter Scott, all of Richmond. Alternate Deputies: Rev. Messrs. M. S. Taylor, Berryville; E. L. Woodward, M. D., The Plains; J. F. Ribble, D. D., Richmond, and W. J. Morton, D. D., Alexandria; Messrs. W. W. Chamblin, Leesburg; John T. Ramey, Marshall; Dr. B. M. Roszell, Winchester, and Dr. John N. Upshur, Richmond.

Nominated to fill two vacancies in the Church Schools Corporation: The Rev. F. E. Warren and Mr. W. W. Marston, of Urbanna; Judge J. W. Chinn, of Warsaw, and Mr. John F. Scott, of Fredericksburg. Nominated to fill one vacancy in the Board of Trustees of the Blue Ridge Industrial School: Mr. John M. Taylor, of Richmond, and Dr. J. H. Dillard, of Charlottesville.

At the evening meetings the Council convened as a Board of Missions to hear reports of the missionary work of the Diocese. The Executive Secretary of the Diocesan Missionary Society and the Archdeacon of the Colored Work made reports at the Wednesday evening meeting, followed by a strong address by the Rev. William H. Milton, D. D., on the Nation-Wide Campaign.

The Council adopted unanimously a resolution to the effect that "the larger interest of the Church and the Diocese will be most truly served by making no readjustment or changes for 1922 in the quotas already assumed by the Diocese of Virginia for diocesan and general work." This means, of course, that by unanimous action of the Diocesan Council the Diocese will assume the full quota for the year 1922 assigned to it by the Nation-Wide Campaign Department of the Presiding Bishop and Council.

The meeting on Thursday evening was devoted to the report of the Committee on the State of the Church, presented by the Rev. W. H. Burkhardt, chairman, and followed by addresses upon various phases of the work of the Diocese by Archdeacon Neve, Rev. B. D. Tucker, Jr., D. D., and the Rev. J. H. Gibboney.

The Council was one of the best attended of recent years by both clergy and lay delegates. The entertainment provided by the congregations of Christ Church and St. Paul's Memorial Church, University, was delightful, and altogether this Council, in its showing of the work of every department of our diocesan life and in practical things accomplished, has been one of the most profitable and interesting of recent years.

The Council will meet next year in All Saints' Church, Richmond, the Rev. J. Y. Downman, D. D., rector.

J. M. B.

Meeting of Churchmen's League.

A very interesting meeting of the Churchmen's League of Henrico County was held at All Saints' Parish House Thursday, May 12, presided over by the president, Mr. Oliver J. Sands. After the meeting was opened with prayer by the Rev. Carl S. Smith, of St. James' Church, reports were made by Mr. R. C. Beverley, on Work in Vacant Parishes, and by the treasurer, Mr. Claiborne Watkins.

A very valuable and interesting address was made on "Men's Bible Classes," by Dr. Douglas S. Freeman, editor of the News Leader, who pointed out the value of men's Bible classes as an agency for good and as a means of building up the membership of the Church, stressing the fact that while a good teacher was very desirable, a good organization was more important, resulting, as it did, in the interest and work of the men themselves. Other interesting addresses were made by Mr. Lewis C. Williams on "Church Schools"; the Rev. G. McL. Brydon on "The Nation-Wide Campaign and Its Results to Date"; the Rev. William E. Cox on "Each Church's Apportionment in the N.-W. C.," and Dr. Ennion Williams on the campaign which he is now carrying on against the morals of the day. The League gave its endorsement and backing to Dr. Williams' efforts in this campaign. It was resolved by the League that a Standing Committee on Men's Bible Classes be appointed by the president of the League, this committee to endeavor to increase the attendance at the Bible classes of the various churches, and to stimulate interest in forming other classes. Mr. R. E. Anderson called the attention of the members to the convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in Norfolk this fall, urging a large attendance of members of the League.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robt. C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

Meeting of Second Council of Diocese.

The second annual Council of the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia met in St. John's Church, Wytheville, Wednesday, May 18, the opening service being a celebration of the Holy Communion by the Bishop, assisted by the Rev. F. H. Craighill, Secretary of the Diocese, and the Rev. C. F. Smith, Diocesan Missioner. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Thomas K. Nelson, D. D., of the Theological Seminary in Virginia.

After the calling of the roll and appointment of committees the Bishop made his annual report and address. In his address he emphasized the great importance of religious education both in the Sunday school and the colleges and schools of the Diocese, and sought the co-operation of the clergy and people in the important work of obtaining fit young men as candidates for the Christian ministry. He also spoke of the problem arising from the Industrial Home and Farm for Homeless Boys at Covington and the Nation-Wide Campaign Fund.

The usual reports of the various educational institutions in the Diocese were received and ordered printed in the journal along with that of the Woman's Auxiliary. The latter report showed such wonderful results of the efforts of the members of the Auxiliary under the leadership of the president, Mrs. Hobart, that it was received with a rising vote of thanks.

A most important change in the management of the affairs of the Diocese was the adoption of resolutions looking to the establishment of a Diocesan Office and the appointment of an Executive Secretary of the Diocese to act in the joint capacity of Secretary of the Diocese, Secretary of the Executive Board and Secretary to the Bishop. These resolutions were adopted and the change will take place as soon as a suitable person can be found to accept the position of Executive Secretary.

At the night service the Rev. W. Cosby Bell, D. D., addressed the Council on "The Call to the Ministry"; the Rev. Mr. McAllister, of the Diocese of Washington, on "The Christian Nurture Series," and at the request of the Bishop, Dr. J. L. McSparran, of the Missionary District of Kyoto, spoke briefly on his work in Japan and the hospital soon to be erected in Osaka.

On Thursday the Treasurer, Mr. C. E. Michael, made his annual report, which was received by a rising vote in recognition of the faithful and efficient services of the Diocesan Treasurer in all matters pertaining to the financial welfare of the Diocese.

Reports were received from Archdeacon E. A. Rich, Diocesan Missioner C. F. Smith and special Diocesan Missionary F. H. Craighill, and from the Committee on the State of the Church.

The committee called the attention of the Council to the lowering of social standards among young people, due to a lack of home training and influence.

One of the most important matters before the Council was the matter of the Boys' Home at Covington and the Nation-Wide Campaign Fund, which was up for consideration Thursday afternoon.

Mr. Michael presented a resolution of the Executive Board requesting the authority of the Council to remit to the Presiding Bishop and Council only one-half of the amount heretofore sent to them, the other half to be applied on the needs of the Home at Covington. Dr. Milton, Executive Secretary of the Nation-Wide Campaign Department, was present, and spoke on the matter from the standpoint of the Presiding Bishop and Council. After quite a lengthy discussion a motion was passed that the entire matter be referred back to the Bishop and Executive Board of the Diocese, with authority to act as they saw fit.

The date of holding the Council was fixed upon the last Tuesday in May, in spite of the efforts to have it changed to some day in January.

The following elections were made:

Mr. C. E. Michael, Treasurer; the Rev F. H. Craighill, Secretary.

Standing Committee: The Rev. Messrs. E. A. Rich, W. A. Pendleton and T. D. Lewis, and Messrs. C. S. Hutter, C. P. MacGill and General William A. Anderson.

Executive Board: The Rev. Messrs. Karl M. Block, G. Otis Mead and Churchill J. Gibson; Messrs. W. D. Tyler, R. L. Peirce and Y. P. Marshall; Mrs. T. D. Hobart and Miss Aurelia H. Davis.

Delegates to the Provincial Synod: The Rev. Messrs. W. A. Pendleton, T. D. Lewis, J. M. Robeson and J. L. Gibbs, and Messrs. R. L. Peirce, C. E. Michael, M. C. Brown and Y. P. Marshall.

Alternates: The Rev. Messrs. T. G. Faulkner, Carlton Barnwell, W. B. Lee and G. O. Mead, and Messrs. J. D. Logan, A. D. W. Walton, J. J. Osborne and C. P. MacGill.

At night the Rev. W. H. Milton, D. D., addressed the Council and a large congregation on "The Nation-Wide Campaign."

The Council adjourned at 11:30 P. M. to meet in Emmanuel Church, Bristol, the last Tuesday in May, 1922.

The ladies of the parish served each day at 1 o'clock in the Sunday school room of the church the delicious luncheons that are always characteristic of the town of Wytheville. Not only did the Council extend to them and the good people of Wytheville a rising vote of thanks for their unbounded hospitality and kindness, but every one went away impressed with the fact that "old Virginia hospitality" is by no means a thing of the past.

T. G. F.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor.

Central Convocation.

The spring meeting of the Central Convocation of Southern Virginia was held May 10 to 12, 1921, at St. Andrew's Church, Lawrenceville, Rev. F. Bland Tucker, rector; the dean, Rev. C. Braxton Bryan, D. D., presiding.

Preachers at the various services were the Rev. Drs. Hall and Bryan, and Messrs. J. G. Scott, J. K. M. Lee, G. W. Ribble, E. P. Dandridge and A. R. Price. A conference on Religious Education was led by Rev. H. H. Young, and on Wednesday afternoon the Rev. A. L. Kenyon told of the splendid work of the Emmanuel League for Young People in his parish. But perhaps the outstanding feature of the convocation was the devotional services led by the dean; his deep spirituality and keen insight, his gentle and unfailing humor, his love, appreciation and sympathy for the heart and mind of St. Paul and St. John, made the passages of Scripture which he interpreted living words to his hearers. These talks of Dr. Bryan's are unforgettable. The congregations were good at all the services, and the choir's fine and faithful work was appreciated.

Among the eighteen ministers present, it was deplored that illness kept the beloved Bishop Tucker from all but one meeting—that of the Holy Communion on May 11, which he celebrated.

The Rev. A. R. Price, who has recently taken charge of work in Powhatan County, was welcomed as a member of the convocation.

This convocation was a great spiritual uplift to the people of St. Andrew's. Such meetings help us to realize, more than any others, that spiritual fellowship which expands and ripens amid the intimacy of informal gatherings.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Death of Lieut.-Col. Charles C. Pierce.

Lieutenant-Colonel Charles C. Pierce, head of the American War Memorial Commission, died of pneumonia on May 16 in a hospital in Tours, France. This news will be learned with sorrow by many of the Church people in Washington, who remember him as Chaplain Pierce, the popular preacher at the Cathedral open-air services when these services were first inaugurated. Chaplain Pierce's helpful messages on Mt. St. Alban on Sunday afternoons around the Peace Cross did much to make these services, now an established custom, a success, and he will ever be remembered by those who heard him. For some years Chaplain Pierce was stationed at Fort Myer, and was therefore claimed, unofficially, as a part of the Diocese of Washington. Funeral services were held in Paris on Wednesday, May 18, and later Mrs. Dewitt C. Jones, a daughter of Chaplain Pierce will bring to the United States the remains of Chaplain Pierce and his wife, who died at Neuilly some time ago.

The Rev. Thom Williamson, the new rector of the Church of the Advent, was ordained to the priesthood in the Washington Cathedral Sunday morning, May 22, and preached his first sermon as rector of the Church of the Advent at the evening service.

The Rev. Norman S. Binsted has been appointed vicar of St. David's and St. Patrick's Chapels, St. Alban's Parish, and assumed his new position May 1. Mr. Binsted is a direct product of St. David's, having been a member there as a boy and later going to the Virginia Theological Seminary. After his ordination he went to Japan, where he served in the mission field until recently, when he returned to this country. He has begun a good work as vicar of these chapels, and results are already perceptible. The parish of St. Alban's is to be congratulated upon securing his services for this important work.

M. M. W.

NEW YORK.

Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop-Elect.

Fiftieth Anniversary of the Rev. Dr. Houghton Celebrated.

Most everybody knows of New York's unique parish, the Transfiguration, popularly called the Little Church Around the Corner. It isn't a little church, and the story that got it the name isn't true. The parish was founded by the Rev. Dr. George H. Houghton many years ago, and his nephew, the Rev. Dr. George C. Houghton, has just celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination. He has been and still is ill, and it was with difficulty that he took part in the service. The Bishops taking part were Gailor and Manning, and the other clergy, several from Metropolitan New York. The church was crowded with friends, especially with actors and actresses, and there were flowers from the Players' and Salmagudi Clubs, the Girls' Friendly and half a dozen other societies. There was a silver loving cup from members of the Lambs' Club, and many splendid words of appreciation of long and faithful work were uttered by Bishop Manning.

The story is that when the Rev. Dr. William T. Sabine, afterwards a Bishop in the Reformed Episcopal Church, was appealed to by some actors to perform the marriage service for two of their company, that divine plead off and observed that there was a little church around the corner where they might get served. They tried the Transfiguration, so described, found it glad to serve, and ever since the church has been the spiritual home of actors, artists and allied people. Indeed, it is the unique centre of an artistic world, often religious and oftener neglected, that reaches out to the ends of the earth. Bishop Sabine once assured the writer that no such incident ever occurred, and that he never refused to serve theatrical people. He said the first he heard of the incident he read it in newspapers.

Whatever the fact, the wonderful work done by the Houghtons, uncle and nephew, and through them by the Church, is a wholly unique and altogether splendid one.

Dinner to Bishop Manning.

On Whitmonday evening the Church Club gave the Bishop a dinner and reception at the Hotel Waldorf, hearty and loyal, and in his address Bishop Manning again appealed for help to complete the Cathedral nave. He believed conditions in the Diocese never better than now for hard work and for great things. He wanted all clergy to receive at least $1,500 a year salary, the episcopate to be endowed, and the Church to be extended. Other speakers were Bishop Gailor, Dean Robbins and Mr. Eugene H. Outerbridge.

Christian Unity Lectures.

The Christian Unity Foundation. Bishop Lines, of Newark, the honorary president, and Dean Robbins the president, gave this season seven addresses in the Brick Presbyterian Church, which, with one exception, were not as well attended as they should have been. The general subject was "The Church—Its Nature and Function," and it was treated from different viewpoints, as the New Testament idea, the Catholic and Protestant conceptions, how far the authority ought to extend and how much unity may be expected from it, the compelling forces making for unity and the claim of a united Church on the allegiance of men and women.

Lecturers included the Rev. Dr. Mackenzie, head of the Congregational Seminary at Hartford; Dean Fosbroke, of the General Seminary, and the Rev. Dr. W. P. Merrill, pastor of the Brick Church; Bishop Stearly, of Newark, and the Methodist Bishop McConnell, of Pittsburgh; the Rev. Dr. Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, former president of the Disciples' General Convention, and the Rev. Dr. William Adams Brown, of Union Seminary. The addresses are to be issued in book form.

C.

ALABAMA

Rt. Rev. C. M. Beckwith, D. D., Bishop.

An Easter Preaching Mission.

"All the city was moved"; one finds the Bible words fit best to describe the work of the Holy Spirit, whether on the first Palm Sunday or within the great forty days of our own year 1921. The Inter-Parochial Mission held by Bishop Bratton, of Mississippi, in Mobile just after Easter was an event in the life of that city, differing in kind and degree from any other religious effort the writer knows of.

To find out just what differentiates this mission from other admirable and successful enterprises, and granted it the measure of general sympathy and hearty co-operation it enlisted, your correspondent has been questioning every one to be met who took an interest in it. A clever girl graduate of Columbia said it was "the Bishop's kindness"—when instead one might have expected such a girl to enlarge on the fine general plan of the Bishop's teaching and the ability of its carrying out. Another felt that it was the sense of God's presence which prevailed with the missioner and reached out over his hearers. But generally the effect of the mission has gone too deep for people to speak of it easily. The subject of the preaching was drawn from the words, "The whole creation groaneth and travileth in pain together until now, waiting for the manifestation of the sons of God." The line of thought, our failure and delay in carrying forward the work of the kingdom.

The sermon upon Indifference, from the text "Curse ye Meroz, because he went not to the help of the Lord against the mighty"; the impressive simplicity of teaching about the Holy Communion, about the Holy Spirit, about the most effective method of Bible teaching and study, and the gratitude that is to furnish a standard for offering to God, fastened themselves deep in the minds of us all, and helped us to a compelling desire to carry out advice whose fruits so manifestly appeared in Him who gave it.

F. M. P.

EAST CAROLINA

Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop.

Executive Council Holds First Meeting.

The first meeting of the Bishop and Executive Council of the Diocese of East Carolina since the election of that body by the recent convention in Edenton, met in Clinton on Wednesday, May 11. Bishop Darst presided and the Ven. W. R. Noe, of Wilmington, acted as secretary. There are very few changes in the personnel of the Council from last year.

The Council organized by naming the Rev. William H. Milton, D. D., as vice-chairman. Chairmen of the various departments were named as follows: Finance, Major B. R. Huske; Publicity, the Rev. William H. Milton, D. D.; Religious Education, the Rev. George W. Lay, D. C. L.; Nation-Wide Campaign, the Rev. R. E. Gribbin; Christian Social Service, the Rev. J. N. Bynum.

A number of matters referred to the Executive Council by the annual council, or convention, were taken up at this meeting. The matter of East Carolina's participation in the Sewanee endowment was gone into, but final action was deferred. So far East Carolina is credited with $19,000 on its quota of $65,000. Note was taken of requests for financial assistance to complete certain work in the Diocese already under way and the necessary appropriations made. Several chapels, parish houses and rectories are being constructed with funds granted by the Executive Council. It was decided to make an urgent appeal to the people of the Diocese to pay their campaign pledges in order that the extension work of the Church may not suffer.

Miss Rena Harding was by resolution asked to accept the executive secretaryship of the Church Service League. Sufficient money to employ her for her whole time was appropriated. The Rev. J. N. Bynum was elected a delegate to the convention of Christian Social Service workers in Milwaukee.

T. P., JR.

St. Stephen's Red Springs and St. Matthew's, Maxton, are now in charge of the Rev. Thomas F. Opie, who came from the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia the first of January. This is a missionary work in two important little towns, one of which, Red Springs, is the home of the large Presbyterian school, Flora MacDonald College. The county of Robeson was settled by the Scotch, and Presbyterians are the predominating denomination. Since Mr. Opie's coming the relationship of the whole community towards the Episcopal Church has been most kindly. A short time ago Mr. Opie was called on to conduct the Methodist prayer meeting in the absence of the pastor, and Sunday, May 1, he conducted a special service at the Presbyterian College. On May 15 he preached the commencement sermon for the high school in the Presbyterian Church, St. Stephen's being too small to accommodate the students. On the fifth Sunday after Easter there was a special service held by request in the Episcopal Church in commemoration of the one hundred and second anniversary of the founding of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. The local lodge attended in a body, and Mr. Opie preached the sermon. In this way the prejudice that has existed against the Episcopal Church here, as in so many small towns where it is little known, is being dissipated, and the whole community is coming to take a different view of the Church.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay, D. D., Coadjutor.

Diocese to Be Divided.

The Diocesan Council met in the Church of the Holy Comforter, Sumter, on May 17, 18, 19.

The attendance was large and great interest was manifested in the affairs of the Church in the Diocese and in general. The Bishop read his report, which was able, and, after speaking of diocesan affairs, he spoke of matters of general interest. The Bishop Coadjutor also read his report, which was heard with no little interest.

The two matters which claimed the attention of the Council, in addition to routine business, were the adoption of the canon setting forth the organization of the Diocese along the line of the general Church and the division of the Diocese. It was decided to divide the Diocese, and a committee was appointed to form the line of division and to make proper adjustment of funds, and to report to next meeting of Council.

The Rev. Mercer P. Logan, D. D., addressed the Council on Religious Education within the Province of Sewanee, and the Rev. Bland Mitchell made a very interesting address on the Nation-Wide Campaign.

The spirit of the Council was fine, and there was an optimism which was splendid.

The good people of Sumter entertained with a delightful hospitality.

NEWARK

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

Bishop Lines' Address to Convention Deals With Political, Social and Industrial Questions.

The Newark Diocesan Convention was held in Trinity Cathedral May 17-18, with the largest attendance remembered by any one. In his address Bishop Lines, dissenting entirely from the teaching that the clergy should keep silent upon political, social and industrial questions, said that the clergy must speak upon them and not be silent until Christian principles were regarded. He spoke of the growing hardness in business and that prohibition was the law of the land and must be obeyed; that the American saloon deserved its fate and should stay dead. He said the authorities of the State, county and city deserved condemnation for allowing the proposed prize fight at Jersey City, and the convention voted to send the strongest protest upon this subject. He said that the public men who were talking so much about maintaining national rights and overlooking national duties towards the world were violating true principles on national and personal conduct. He said the talk about blue laws and 100 per cent. Americanism was worthy of contempt. He said that the endowment of colleges, the establishment of public libraries, could not make up for the building up of great fortunes by an iniquitous tariff and by the killing off of competitors in business. He said that the true wealth of the community and strength of the Church were in spiritual and moral rather than material resources, and he urged every one to go back to his parish and add to the true wealth of the community in the coming year.

Bishop Stearly's address dealt with large diocesan questions, and the new situation with the use of the new Diocesan House, and the conduct of great institutions just now provided by large gifts in the Diocese. He took decided ground in favor of giving to women in the Church the place accorded them by the Lambeth Conference.

Members of the Standing Committee were re-elected, the delegates to the Provincial Synod chosen, the membership in the Board of Religious Education and Board of Social Service were filled up, and other boards, after reports from the same had been made. One-third of the boards named will henceforth be elected by the convention, one-third appointed by the Bishop, and these sixteen members may add eight to their number. New regulations concerning diocesan institutions and their responsibilities to the Diocese, their ability to ask to appeal in the Diocese for funds, were adopted. Dr. Milton was present at the convention, and the subject of the Nation-Wide Campaign was fully and strongly presented. There was an animated discussion upon the status of women in the Church, and the desire expressed by some conservative members that the mind of the Diocese should be learned before action was taken. It was finally voted to take the first step, in removing the word male from the constitution as a restriction to the election of delegates to the Diocesan Convention, and then look forward to action upon the whole subject next year.

A new feature of the convention was the report on the state of the Church in the Diocese, which presented many subjects of interest and importance, and made profitable discussion. A resolution in favor of disarmament was passed. A large amount of business was transacted by the convention and the best feeling prevailed.

Death of the Rev. John Butterworth.

In the death of Rev. John F. Butterworth, on May 17, at his home in Summit, the Diocese loses one of its oldest and best loved clergymen. He graduated from Columbia College and the General Seminary in 1867, and was ordained in 1867-69. After service in New York City he was rector of churches in Dover, Jersey City and Summit, in the Diocese of Newark, for some years rector at Sandusky, O., and thereafter a chaplain at the American Church in Dresden.

ATLANTA.

Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Council.

The fourteenth annual Council of the Diocese met in St. George's Church, Griffin, May 11 and 12. Dean Johnston, of St. Phillip's, Atlanta, preached at the service held the evening before Council was organized.

Wednesday morning the Council opened with a celebration of the Holy Communion, the celebrant being the Bishop. At this service the Bishop made his address. He made a touching plea for justice to the negro race.

The Executive Board has been in existence for one year, and it has well justified its creation. It saves time and makes for efficiency. The Council runs more smoothly and gets through its work more quickly. At the social service conference Wednesday night the Rev. Augustine Elmendorf spoke.

One new departure was made that seems to be in keeping with the times. The women were given the right to serve on vestries. It appears that they will be eligible to serve anywhere that a man may serve.

There was some opposition to this, not because they would not be efficient, but rather because men might shirk their duties and force the women to assume them.

The Council took note of the fact that Mr. Robert DeTreville Lawrence, of Marietta, had been a member of the Council for practically fifty years. By a standing vote of recognition the Council paid honor to Mr. Lawrence, and so expressed its appreciation for his long and faithful service.

The Rev. Cyril E. Bentley was elected Executive Secretary of the Diocese.

The following delegates were elected to represent the Diocese in the Synod, which meets in Savannah next autumn: The Rev. Messrs. W. W. Memminger, C. B. Wilmer, S. A. Wragg, I. H. Noe, G. I. Hiller, R. R. Claiborne; Messrs. C. L. Bunting, T. H. Nickerson, C. L. Pettigrew, O. A. Coleman, N. K. Smith, H. A. Coles.

From the Women's Auxiliary the following: Mrs. Ulric Atkinson, Mrs. C. L. Pettigrew, Mrs. M. F. Amorous, Miss Rosa Woodberry.

The following men were elected to serve for three years on the Executive Board: The Rev. G. I. Hiller and H. A. Willey, David Woodward and Mr. Baker, Miss Rosa Woodberry.

Reports from forty-five of the fifty congregations show the total quota of the Dioceses on the N.-W. C. to be slightly over-subscribed. It is not as large an over-subscription as that for last year, but is still slightly in excess of 100 per cent.

The following are the three banner parishes of the Dioceses, in so far as paying in full their quota before the end of the year 1920 made them such—Emmanuel, Athens; St. Luke's, Atlanta; St. James', Marietta.

The next annual Council will meet in Trinity Church, Columbus.

R. R. C.

TENNESSEE

Rt. Rev. Thos. F. Gailor, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. Troy Beatty, D. D., Coadjutor.

Church Service League Makes Pilgrimage to Grave of First Bishop of Tennessee.

A landmark in the progress of the Church School Service League has been made. Mrs. E. M. Perkins, vice-president for the Middle Tennessee section, arranged a beautiful pilgrimage for the children to St. John's, Ashwood. Whitsunday was chosen because it is the regular day for the League to make their Birthday Thank Offering. The vision of the C. S. S. L. is that this will be as big at the Triennial Convention as the United Thank Offering. Bishop Beatty has been so pleased with the success of the meetings at Ashwood that he has designated Whitsunday as Children's Day for Middle Tennessee every year.

Besides the general invitation given to the whole Diocese, all the leaguers of Middle Tennessee were especially invited. Clarksville, Advent, St. Ann's, and Christ Church. Nashville sent large delegations. St. Paul's Church, Franklin, and St. Peter's, Columbia, went with their whole congregations. Mount Pleasant and many smaller places were well represented.

St. John's Church is the oldest church in Tennessee except St. Paul's, Franklin. It marks the burying place of James Harvey Otey, the pioneer Bishop of the State. Just a century ago, in 1821, young Otey came across the Cumberland Mountains from North Carolina to teach school in Franklin. After a year he went back, but in 1825, having been meanwhile baptized by William Mercer Green, later Bishop of Mississippi, and grandfather of the present Bishop-Coadjutor of that Diocese, and confirmed and ordained deacon by Bishop Ravenscroft, of North Carolina, he again came to Franklin and founded old Harpeth Academy, a famous school in its day. Teaching all the week, on Sundays he conducted the services of the Book of Common Prayer, then all but unknown in that as in other communities of the Volunteer State.

The little congregation he gathered about him became the nucleus of St. Paul's Church and the Diocese of Tennessee. The young deacon's missionary zeal led him after his Sunday morning service in Franklin to make weekly visits, riding a borrowed horse over eighteen miles of rough road to Nashville, where he held service in the afternoon in the Masonic Hall. Such was the beginning of the now strong parish of Christ Church.

Vastly different, however, from these weekly trips of young Otey was the pilgrimage of the children to celebrate the church's birthday at his tomb. Hither flocked crowds over modern highways in automobiles.

The old spacious church, erected by the Polk family in 1837, was crowded, but many stood out on the lawn at the service. The Rt. Rev. Troy Beatty, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Watts, of Columbia, and the Rev. Bernard Campbell, of Franklin, celebrated the Holy Communion. Bishop Beatty spoke in a most happy way, and the children realized the full meaning of Whitsunday and the Church's mission when he had done.

After service the children marched with flowers and laid them as a tribute on Bishop Otey's grave. Then Bishop Beatty read appropriate prayers for the occasion.

The choir of St. Peter's, assisted by others, led the music excellently.

After a superabundant feast on the lawn and a most sociable evening, all reluctantly took leave, determined to make the festival a success greater than ever next year.

B. C.

TEXAS

Rt. Rev. G. H. Kinsolving, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Quin, D. D., Coadjutor.

Conference for the Clergy Well Attended.

A well attended conference for the clergy was held for three days, May 9 to 12, at Sylvan Beach, where a most elegant and spacious home has been turned over to the Diocese for temporary use.

Bishop Coadjutor Quin called the conference to order Tuesday evening and asked Bishop Kinsolving to set forth the purpose and aim of the meeting, which in his usual happy manner the Bishop did.

Bishop Quin was celebrant at the early communion Wednesday. The conference on Church Publicity proved to be most helpful, and the Rev. William Wesley Daup, of Marlin, editor of the Texas Churchman, was elected a delegate to attend the meeting on Church Publicity to be held in St. Louis, June 28 and 29. The Rev. W. N. Claybrook, of Tyler, was elected a delegate to attend the summer conference for training mission preachers at Sewanee the latter part of August. Ministerial recruiting, the Church Service League, summer camps and conferences, furnished subjects for fruitful discussions. The clergy were the guests of the Houston Rotary Club Thursday, of which Bishop Quin is president, and enjoyed the address of Sir Auckland Geddes at Rice Institute in the afternoon. Along with the serious business of the conference there was abundant amusement and enjoyable recreation.

Vacation Camps.

In preparation for the two vacation camps for Church boys and girls there will be a leader's conference on Sylvan Beach, June 3, 4, 5. The leadership of the two camps will be under the Rev. Gordon M. Reese, assisted by Mr. Frank Cox, University of Virginia, for the boys, and Miss Edith Parker, from Louisville, Ky., for the girls. The cost of these conferences will be $10, and through the generosity of several good Church people it will be possible to pay part of the expenses of a good many young people who are unable to meet their own.

The boys' camps are Camp Allen, June 6-18, Sylvan Beach, near Houston, and Camp Kinsolving, June 16-25, near Austin.

The girls' camps are Camp Kinsolving, June 6-15, near Austin, and Camp Allen, June 16-25, Sylvan Beach, near Houston.

A Religious Educational Conference will be held at Sylvan Beach, June 30 to July 9, which will attract many of the clergy and laity, since the program offers exceptional opportunities of hearing most eminent speakers. Bishop Quin will treat "Men's Work" and Mrs. Quin "Woman's Work." Miss Edith Parker will lecture on Girls' Work and the Rev. Gordon Reese, Boys' Work. Religious education will be in charge of Gardner Tucker, and Bishop Capers will teach the Bible. Church History will be taught by the Rev. W. Post Witsell, rector of St. Paul's, Waco, Tex. Ample provision has been made to entertain each attendant for the small sum of $10.

CENTRAL NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. C. T. Olmstead, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske, D. D., Coadjutor.

St. Mark's Church, Syracuse, the Rev. Percy T. Fenn, D. D., rector: On the morning of Whitsunday, Bishop Olmsted confirmed a class of sixty-five persons in St. Mark's Church. The class was gathered, prepared and presented by Dr. Fenn, who assumed the rectorship of the parish on December 1, after a rectorate of nearly sixteen years in Wichita, Kan.

MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. Chas. D. Williams, D. D., Bishop

Diocesan Convention: Bishop Williams Makes Clear His Stand on Social and Economic Question.

With more confirmations than ever before in the history of the Diocese, and with benefactions for all purposes increased by more than 400 per cent., the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Michigan closed the most successful year in its history at its eighty-eighth annual convention held on May 11 and 12 at Ann Arbor.

One of the most interesting features of the convention was the discussion which ensued over the introduction of a resolution asking the United States to take the lead in calling a conference of the nations of the world for the discussion of disarmament. The resolution was offered by the Rev. S. S. Marquis, D. D., rector of St. Joseph's Church, Detroit, and formerly head of the Welfare Department of the Ford Motor Company, as well as a former dean of St. Paul's Cathedral.

The resolution was combatted most strongly by the Rev. W. D. Maxon, D. D., of Christ Church, who was a hospital chaplain in the late war, and who was supported in his stand by the Rev. B. W. Pullinger, rector of Grace Church, Detroit, who was likewise a chaplain in the Canadian Army. After considerable discussion on both sides from both clerical and lay delegates, a motion to lay the matter on the table was lost. A later vote on the resolution showed forty-one members of the convention in favor of calling the conference and fifty-six opposed, several not voting. Bishop Charles D. Williams, who was the presiding officer, especially asked to have his vote recorded as being in favor of the resolution and of calling such a conference.

Another interesting feature of the convention was the discussion of the entire Pension Fund matter by the Rev. W. Warne Wilson, rector of Trinity Church, Detroit, and chairman of the Diocesan Pension Fund Committee. After his remarks explanatory of the scheme, he offered a resolution that this Diocese set apart whatever sum may be necessary from the unexpended portion of the budgets of the various departments each previous year to assist any clergy who may be in need of assistance and whose cases may not be adequately cared for by the benefits of the Pension Fund. This resolution was passed by the convention.

Another of the interesting contests which occurred at the convention was the effort on the part of some members of the convention representing various parishes in the Diocese to voice their objection to the social and economic stand which the Bishop of the Diocese has taken in his published writings and in his sermons.

Feeling that this criticism of his stand on industrial and social questions might jeopardize the financial support of the Diocese and in some measure embarrass the Diocese, the Bishop, in a stated utterance to the convention assembled in executive session, made clear in very definite terms his stand and stated that if at any time in the judgment of the convention the Diocese would be relieved and prospered by a change of leadership, his resignation as Bishop of Michigan would be put into the hands of the convention subject only to the canonically required judgment of the House of Bishops thereon. After considerable discussion from which the public was barred, the convention voted a resolution of confidence in the Bishop, and further provided in their resolution for a complete discussion of the whole question of the Church's stand upon social and industrial questions, the assumption being that this committee, in conference with the Bishop, will thresh out these matters and will arrive at a common meeting ground and probably formulate a definite policy for presentation at the next convention. It was the unanimous feeling of the convention that no consideration whatever should be given to the Bishop's offer to resign at this time.

The officers of the convention, as elected, are as follows:

Secretary of Convention and Executive Secretary of the Bishop and Council, Charles O. Ford, Detroit; Assistant Secretary of Convention, Rev. Charles L. Ramsay, Detroit; Treasurer, W. T. DeGraff, Detroit; Registrar, Rev. Paul Ziegler, Detroit; Chancellor of the Diocese, Mr. Lewis H. Paddock.

Standing Committee—Rev. W. D. Maxon, D. D., Rev. S. S. Marquis, D. D., Rev. Warne Wilson, Rev. Henry Tatlock, Messrs. D. W. Smith, George W. Patterson, Sidney T. Miller.

Executive Council—Rt. Rev. Charles D. Williams, Chairman; Rev. W. Warne Wilson, Vice-Chairman; Rev. W. D. Maxon, D. D., Rev. Henry Tatlock, D. D., Very Rev. Warren L. Rogers, Rev. Julius A. Schaad, Rev. W. L. Torrance, Rev. S. S. Marquis, D. D., D. P. Sullivan, Sidney T. Miller, C. R. Wells, F. C. Gilbert, H. E. Van De Walker, D. W. Smith, R. McClelland Brady, Treasurer; Charles O. Ford, Secretary; Archdeacons Bartow, Ramsay and Jermin.

Also of considerable interest at this convention was the initial meeting of the Michigan House of Churchwomen, which had been provided for a year ago by canon, and which met at the same time and place as the Diocesan Convention. Chief among the legislation was the formation of the Woman's Executive Council, which will be divided up into Departments of Missions, Social Service, etc., and which will maintain its connection with the Executive Council of the Diocese through some of its members being also members of certain departments of the Executive Council.

Committees were appointed to go into the question of women's work in all its phases in the Diocese, and comprehensive reports will be prepared and presented at the next meeting of the House of Churchwomen.

I. C. J.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

A RURAL CHURCH POLICY.

At a recent address on the general subject of country life, and how to make it more attractive, Dr. Albert Shaw, editor of the Review of Reviews, said that one of the things most needed was "a rural life policy," and he went on to amplify it by saying that we must not retain the mental attitude that children in the country are not to expect as good an education as those in the cities, and that country homes must be uncomfortable.

In other words, there must be definite change of opinion with regard to rural life and its conditions. There is good reason, too, that such a change should come now, because there is no longer any reason why oil lamps for light and ugly stoves for heat should be a regular and necessary part of the furnishing of the country home. Individual lighting systems, both gas and electric, are thoroughly practical and comparatively inexpensive today, and can be installed in homes that are at a distance from towns and cities just as well as in those within the corporate limits.

We all remember the inspiring words and notes of the war time song, "Keep the Home Fires Burning," and now that the war is over we should add another clause to that slogan so that it would run, "Keep the Home Fires Burning, But Burning in the Cellar."

This general change of policy toward the condition of the country home is as essential in Church matters as it is in the country at large.

Why cannot one diocese adopt the fixed plan of making rectories in country parishes models of comfort and convenience, so that they would be a type for the homes around them?

Such a policy would accomplish two things. It would do much to fill vacant country parishes, and so restore the Episcopal Church to the prestige which it once held in the rural communities.

In the second place, it would place the Church in the forefront of the modern and much-needed movement of developing a taste for country life.

Some may think that this suggestion is more theoretical than practical, because the entire burden of inaugurating it would fall upon the central authority of a diocese, but we are convinced that if a "fifty-fifty" proposition were made to country parishes that in most cases it would be received in a sufficiently co-operative spirit to raise the necessary one-half of the expense locally; anyway, it would be worth trying.

Another way in which the Church is taking a leading place in what should be the nation-wide movement of trying to keep people, especially young people, in the country is by doing its share, and a little more than its share, toward procuring wholesome recreation.

Let every diocese encourage parish house building in every way possible, and urge its clergy to make these important adjuncts to their churches real community centres, where games of all sorts can be played, and meetings of every kind can be held, so that people will come to think of the Church as the leading influence in everything, both in religious and social activities.

RURAL CONDITIONS IN THE SOUTH.

When the successor of the late Booker T. Washington speaks he is always worth listening to, and what he said the other day at a conference in a Southern city applies so much to conditions of both white and colored working farmers that we quote him extensively in this issue, because, although Dr. Robert R. Moton is not yet so well known throughout the country as was his predecessor, nevertheless the present head of Tuskegee Institute is recognized as a man of national prominence. He spoke as follows:

"The question of race relations, especially in the South, is very closely allied with country life as it affects my race. Eighty-five per cent. of the negroes in the South live in the country. They produce about 70 per cent. of the cotton that is raised in America. It is very important for the country, therefore, and equally important for the negroes in America, for their own sakes as American citizens and as human beings, as well as for the economic value to the country, that they should be made happy and contented in the country. This is just as important for the white man as it is for the negro.

"The interests of both races in the South are so closely interwoven that what helps the progress of one helps the progress of the other. In order to maintain and develop on our farms a strong, robust people, white as well as black, who will love country life, certain things that have been neglected in the past must be carefully looked after in the future by the leaders of thought and action, as well as by Federal and State authorities.

"The conditions must be made possible for a negro to earn a comfortable living on the farm. We cannot have country life satisfactorily developed in any country until people are able to earn a decent living from the soil. Much has been done by our agricultural schools and colleges, but a great deal more must be done to enable the negro farmer intelligently and diligently to dig out of the soil the things necessary for his material happiness. This is fundamental.

"The negro farmer, as well as other farmers, must be paid a fair price for his products. In order to bring this about, all farmers in the country must be encouraged in some form of co-operative marketing.

"The social life must also be improved. The possession of money and of the things which money can buy is not enough to make men want to live their lives in the country. Men go to the cities for the social contact they can have there. We must somehow provide better schools so that country boys and girls may be able to obtain an education that will make it possible for them to live their lives completely wherever they desire to cast their lot.

"We must do more to make our churches and schools real centres of thought that will give such instruction and inspiration as will touch more directly the daily lives of the people. This will need an intelligent, godly ministry with a knowledge of, and sympathy with, country conditions, and not one that is interested merely in what it can get out of the country people to take back to the city.

"Men and women must be taught to play and to provide for themselves such forms of wholesome amusement as will leave no aching void in the home life of the people. More and more we must provide our homes with modern conveniences that will make it possible for the mothers of families to get rid of much of the drudgery of country life.

"The negro farmer should be protected. There should be in no part of this country such a thing as enforced labor, or peonage, and I thank God for the aroused sentiment which is driving this menace out of Georgia and other parts of the South.

"If the negro is to remain on the farm, buying and owning a home and making this home a part of a live, wide-awake community, he must have the assurance that this property will remain his for all time to come, so long as he desires to own it. We cannot expect a man to remain in an isolated, country place and plan a future for himself and his children, when he feels that there is danger, not only of losing his property, but also of losing the lives of himself and his family as well.

"In spite of much we hear that is discouraging, there is a large and increasing number of Southern men and women, black and white, who are courageously working, in a spirit of true Christian patriotism, to bring about such a condition as will insure, not only more kindly feeling, but also more wholesome economic and spiritual conditions.

"The South is now studying itself in the mirror of public opinion. Especially is this true in the matter of race relations. A just and more satisfactory settlement of this question is not far distant, when we of the South, black and white, begin to recognize our own shortcomings and seek to correct them. This self-criticism is manifested in the efforts for co-operation between the two races, and it has given birth to a new spirit of good-will and sympathy between them."

Family Department

May.

1. Fifth (Rogation) Sunday after Easter. SS. Philip and James
2, 3, 4. Rogation Days
5. Thursday. Ascension Day.
8. Sunday after Ascension Day.
15. Whitsunday.
18 20, 21. Ember Days
22. Trinity Sunday.
29. First Sunday after Trinity
31. Tuesday.

Collect for First Sunday After Trinity.

O God, the strength of all those who put their trust in Thee: Mercifully accept our prayers; and because, through the weakness of our mortal nature, we can do no good thing without Thee, grant us the help of Thy grace, that in keeping Thy commandments we may please Thee both in will and deed; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Outbound.

For those who fly to seek the haven's shelter
The coastwise shoals and sands hold peril dread.
Let such reef sail and sound the foaming welter,
And hold the anchor ready at the head.

But not so we. Outbound our course is headed;
Sea room waits yon; behind us all our fears.
Free ocean's space holds nothing to be dreaded,
Nor perils lie in God's eternal years.

Welcome, then, offshore wind! Each sail home sheeted,
The charted course true held, to sea, to sea!
Whatever comes, that shall be bravely greeted,
And nothing feared in all that is to be.

—Selected.

Poor Mr. Vanhorn.

PART I.

When Mrs. Vanhorn was threatened with nervous prostration and had to go to a sanitarium for an indefinite period, and when the two little Vanhorns had to be sent to the two anxious grandmothers of the family, everybody said, "Poor Mr. Vanhorn!" Of course there were plenty of people to apply the same adjective to the tired-out wife and mother, but even a stranger could have detected in a short time that the preponderance of sympathy went to the successful young minister of the new church on Walnut Street, in the pretty little city of Greendale. And when it became known that the minister's capable, energetic, brilliant young sister had sprained her ankle, and could not look after her brother's household while the wife was away, then everybody said, "Poor Mr. Vanhorn!" for that meant that pretty, flighty Betty Vanhorn would have to be mistress of the disordered home instead of Martha, as had been planned.

"There's nothing seriously wrong with Betty, you know," said Mrs. Dillon, who was president of the Ladies' Aid, "and it's only for a short time. Things can't go to pieces in a few months. Let's look on the bright side of things." There were those who said the election of Mrs. Dillon to the responsible office of president of the responsible society of Ladies' Aid when Mrs. Vanhorn had been compelled to resign, was a great mistake, for she was young, and rather giddy, according to some of the ladies.

"There isn't any bright side to this," lamented old Mrs. Fitch. "I know Betty Vanhorn better than most of you do, for I visit my niece in the town where she lives. She'll have a pack of young folks wearing out that new rug we bought last year, and like as not she'll ruin the new range. But it can't be helped."

"Well, she's not likely to ruin the range by overmuch cooking," remarked Mrs. Bruce. "I also visit in Eastwood, where the Vanhorns live, and I know Miss Betty is not very domestic. I doubt if she can fry a steak so any one can eat it."

"Poor Mr. Vanhorn!" ejaculated Mrs. Lake, whose husband contributed more to the support of the church than any other member. "Mr. Lake has thought for some weeks past that Mr. Vanhorn's sermons were hardly up to the mark, but of course his wife's illness and getting her ready to go away will explain that. We were hoping that things would settle down now and his sermons would improve, but with poor cooking his own health will be endangered. Mr. Lake does enjoy a good, intellectual sermon so much that I dislike to have him disappointed. A minister must have proper food or he cannot be at his best in the pulpit." Mrs. Lake was a notable housewife and the ladies had great respect for her opinions.

Betty Vanhorn was aware that her presence in the forlorn house was not desired by any one, and she knew the reason also, but she was not glad to take up the work herself. It was not her good will and pleasure that she left home and friends the very year after she graduated from high school to take charge of a house badly run down, and try to be pleasant and helpful to a lot of critical people, as she termed them. But she loved her brother devotedly, and was sure he was destined to climb the ladder of success, so she undertook the work with a determination to do her best. Even the sour-looking maid in the kitchen gave notice the minute she saw the youthful temporary mistress of the house, and said uppishly that "no kid was going to boss her around." However, Betty thought the determination of Almira to leave a good thing until she tackled the work of cleaning by herself along with the regular duties of the household.

"Now, Betty, whatever you do, I hope you will not allow a single lady of the church to get into the house until it is cleaned up—that is, past the parlor," explained the Rev. Mr. Vanhorn the first day his sister had charge. "I'll try to get a woman to clean up and we'll eat bread and butter until the house is in order. Entertain them in the parlor, which is the only room in the house in order, and manage the best you can until we can put away some things and clean up. I'll help you after night when I get my sermon out of the way."

But the best laid schemes fail, and the first thing that happened that afternoon while Betty was sorting the wash was the appearance of a young couple wanting the Rev. Mr. Vanhorn to marry them. Unfortunately, Betty had not written down the places her brother had told her he intended to call, so it took an hour's work at the telephone to locate him and get him home. It was five in the evening before that was over, and then the brother and sister sat down literally to bread and butter.

"Now, this will never do," said Betty to herself. "Mother said over and over that Arthr must have good, substantial, nourishing food, and I must prepare it. I'll get up early tomorrow and get something done."

But next morning a hurry-up call came from an elderly lady who was sure she was dying, and the minister had to leave with the breakfast only half prepared. Betty put the toast in the warming oven and flew at the soiled clothes, for Mary Perkins was coming to wash and things would have to be in readiness for her

Nothing else happened until ten o'clock, when Mary Perkins was called home by the sudden illness of her baby, leaving the kitchen sloppy with suds and clothes in the blue water. Mr. Vanhorn was still at the bedside of old Mrs. Jones, and Betty had forgotten to eat anything. She was indulging in a few tears when there came a vigorous rap at the back door. It was impossible to ignore it, so Betty dashed away her tears and opened the door a few inches.

"You might as well let me in, or I'll break in," said a merry voice. "Mother sent me over with a cherry pie for your lunch and it's quite hot," she went on, brushing past Betty, who showed no inclination to ask her in. "My goodness. If I had known the pan was so hot I'd have waited a little. What's the trouble? Mary Perkins gone home? Never you mind! I've come to lend you a hand, and it's some hand, I'll have you know. There's the door-bell. Run right along and don't worry."

Betty sat on pins and needles while old Mr. Barker asked about Mrs. Vanhorn, and the children, and the minister, and the state of the house and a number of other things. A strange girl in the kitchen, and no lunch ready for Arthur, when he should come back—but all the time she had to listen politely to Mr. Barker and try to say yes and no at the right places. The instant the door closed after him she flew to the kitchen and almost fell over in her astonishment.

"What have you been doing?" she gasped.

"Not much of anything," said the other girl easily. "Now look here, I'm no mind reader, but I can tell what you're thinking. You're afraid I'll go and tell all the church folks what a state this kitchen was in, but I won't. I'm engaged to marry a young minister and I need some practice. The clothes are ready for the line, but I'll let you put them out. Put on your sweater and mittens and you'll have them up in a jiffy. Be sure to hang the pillow-slips all together, and don't spread out the handkerchiefs. Make the washing look as little as possible, or folks will think the minister's family extravagant. I'll look after the lunch. Run along now."

The kitchen was neatly mopped, the kettles on the stove were sending forth savory odors, and everything had a delightful air of cleanliness. "How did you do it?" asked Betty, getting into the sweater.

"Very easily. Old Mr. Barker makes lengthy calls."

Although Betty did not know it, her stock went up when people saw her hanging out the nicely washed clothes. The fresh air brought a glow to her cheeks, and she rushed back to find the strange girl putting the finishing touches to a very delicious-looking little meal. "Hush!" said the girl with a finger on her lips. "Mr. Vanhorn is in the parlor. I'm going to slip out quietly. I'm Mary Bentley, your next-door neighbor, and I want to get some experience for next year. I'll be back this afternoon to lend you a hand."—Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

Help for the Nervous.

Sit down calmly for a few minutes every morning and survey the duties of the day. Ask yourself not "What are the things I must do?" but "What are the things I can leave undone?" You will be surprised at the number of futilities you can dispense with, much to your own relief, and without injury to any serious interests.

Make room in the day's activities for a brief period of rest and relaxation. This is absolutely essential. When I offer this advice I am sometimes met with a smile, as though I were propounding a counsel of perfection, "Why, I have not a moment to call my own, and how absurd to tell me to rest! In my house there is no time for rest." I reply, "There is always time to do the things that ought to be done, and rest is one of those." There are times when the highest achievement of character is not doing, but cessation from doing.

Avoid haste and hurry; they are the things that confuse the brain and make clear judgment impossible. The besetting temptation of the nervous woman is to hurry from one duty to another in breathless haste, attempting many tasks, yet achieving none of them with dignity or freedom. When such a temptation arises, call a halt. Remain quiet for a few minutes, summon back your self-possession, and refuse to do in one hour work that should be spread over two.

Habituate yourself to the control of the emotions. Nothing makes such havoc of the nervous system, nothing disorganizes the inner life like anger, fear, worry. These forces must be quelled if the soul is to maintain its supremacy and peace is to be enjoyed; and this is done not, indeed, by a flat of the will, but by substituting for these destructive emotions such constructive ones as love aspiration after some ideal, faith in God and reverence for the divine order of life.—Harper's Bazar.

For the Southern Churchman.

Afield and at Home.

Grace Louise Robinson.

Forth from his home a man doth go,
To toil within brown fields of grain,
The joy of life to win;
And with him goes
The Lord of Life.

To city streets a man doth go,
To sense the work of quickening brain,
The joy of life to win;
And with him goes
The Lord of Life.

When the day's work's done and the sun doth go,
Home comes each man to rest from strain,
The peace of life to win;
And with him comes
The Lord of Life.

Ever and always the thrill is deep;
Ever and always sweet peace they reap.
For the Lord of Life
Does ever keep
The going out, the coming in,
The toil without and life within.

The Divine Inflow and Overflow.

A friend has a beautiful lotus pond. A natural basin on his estate is supplied with water from a reservoir in the foothills some distance away. A gate regulates the flow of water from the main that conducts it from the reservoir to the pond. There, through the days of the perfect summer weather(the lotus flowers lie full blown upon the surface of the clear transparent water. The June roses and other wild flowers are continually blooming upon its banks. The birds come here to drink and to bathe, and from early until late one can hear the melody of their song. The bees are continually at work in this garden of wild flowers. A beautiful grove, in which many kinds of wild berries and many varieties of ferns grow, stretches back of the pond as far as the eye can reach.

Our friend is a lover of his kind, and no notice bearing such words as "Private grounds, no trespassing allowed," or "Trespassers will be prosecuted," stands on his estate; but at the end of a beautiful by-way that leads through the wildwood up to this enchanting spot, stands a notice bearing the words "All are welcome to the Lotus Pond."

Here one may often find merry groups of children at play. Here many times tired and weary looking men and women come, and somehow, when they go their faces wear a different expression—the burden seems to be lifted. My friend calls it his Soul Garden, and he spends many hours in quiet there. Everything in the immediate vicinity seems to breathe a spirit of kindliness, comfort, good-will and cheer.

The gate of the pond is always open wide enough to admit a supply of water so abundant that it continually overflows a quantity sufficient to feed a stream that runs through the fields below, giving the pure mountain water in drink to the cattle and flocks that are grazing there. The stream then flows on through the neighbor's fields.

In this do we not see a complete parallel so far as human life is concerned? In the degree that we recognize our connection with the Infinite Spirit which is the life of all, and in the degree that we open ourselves to this divine inflow, do we come into harmony with the highest, the most powerful and the most beautiful everywhere. And in the degree that we do this do we overflow, so that all who come in contact with us receive the effects of this realization on our part.—R. W. Trine.

Injustice and Pouts.

The Unbiased Observer was visiting the Heath family, in which there are three children—Max, who is thirteen; Gwen, eleven, and Dolly, four. The boy and the baby are generally easy to discipline, but there seems to be constant friction between Gwen and her mother, so much so that continual pouting bids fair to spoil what Nature intended to be a really beautiful little face. To the Unbiased Observer, the fault appears to lie largely with the mother, and if the case were an unusual one, it would, perhaps, not be worthy of record; but similar misunderstandings so often exist between parent and child that the consideration of the following incidents may be of value:

Gwen is not a bad child, but her mother seems to expect disobedience from her, or, at least, a lack of cheerfulness. For example, Gwen had been sent to bed at six o'clock Sunday evening, ostensibly because she was sulky, really because her mother thought she was tired and needed extra rest. The child was not given the real reason, however, and she went upstairs full of the rebellious feeling that a most unmerited punishment had been meted out to her.

Max, for his supper that evening, was given a large, fine banana, one of several which had been bought as a special treat. The next morning at breakfast two similar bananas were put at the places of the two older children. Gwen was particularly delighted, for she, of course, had had no banana the night before. She was smiling and happy when she took her place at the table, even though Max did announce triumphantly that he had already had one.

Then Dolly, the baby, arrived and began to whimper because she had been forgotten in the distribution of fruit.

"Give Dolly half of yours, Gwen," said her mother.

Gwen's smiles faded.

"But, mother," she said rather plaintively, "why can't Max give her some of his? He had one last night" (which would appear to be a logical and a decidedly reasonable question).

The mother did not think so, however. "Give me your banana, Gwen," she demanded.

Gwen passed it over without a word, evidently having learned the futility of expecting justice from that quarter.

Her mother cut the fruit in half, gave one part to the baby and put the other on her own fruit plate, where it remained untouched until it was removed to the pantry. Max, in the meanwhile, devoured his prize with gusto.

Gwen made no comment of any kind, but she ate the rest of her breakfast with small appetite and with a face wherein sulkiness had replaced smiles, and with a very sore little heart she departed for school.

"Don't you think I did right?" asked the mother afterward of the Unbiased Observer, who didn't feel so very unbiased after all.

It was no time for polite camouflage.

"If you really want to know," came the reply, "I think you did entirely wrong. Gwen was quite logical in her question, and perfectly courteous. I should have thought she was lacking in intelligence if she hadn't objected."

The mother looked surprised.

"But she is so sulky about everything," she complained. "I want her to learn to mind cheerfully."

"She'll never do that.'" remarked the Observer, "while she feels such injustice in the 'powers that be.'"

"Do you think it was unjust to send her to bed last night?" the mother went on, in a slightly injured tone.

The Unbiased Observer paused—but she had been asked for an opinion and she gave it.

"What heavier punishment could you possibly inflict if she is ever really bad?" she asked. "Social ostracism—just because she looked cross. What would happen if our sins were punished in the same ratio?"

And now the Observer wonders if she will ever be invited to make another visit!—Elise Underhill Eaton.

"It is the ten minutes after prayer that matter. You say your prayers, but before God has time to answer you are up from your knees and off. We do not hear what the answer is: we do not wait to hear what it is. It may be that for years God has been trying to say something to us, but we have never given Him time to speak to us. . . . 'Be still and know that I am God.'"—The Bishop of London.

For the Young Folks

The Four-Leaf Clover.

There was once a leaf of clover
By the others covered over.
They were large and happy, too,
For they had the sun and dew;
While this leaf was poor and small,
For it got no sun at all.

But it said, "A mouse or man
Can only do the best he can,
And I think the same is true
Of the under clover, too;
Though I can't grow like the rest,
I will do my tiny best."

So it put out all its strength,
And a leaflet grew at length
With the other leaflets three.
How the clovers laughed to see
That queer one with leaflets four—
Laughed till they could laugh no more!

But a princess stopped one day
Near the clovers in her play,
Brushed the big leaves all aside
And the four-leaf clover spied;
Cried, "Here is a lucky thing!
I will take it to the king!"
—Mary Parkman, in St. Nicholas.

In the Jaws of the Chasm.

Sun-Rock was an Indian boy, one of a migratory tribe that had secured a foothold outside of the reservation. One day, when he was returning home, he caught his foot in a hidden hole. He fell forward upon his face, stunned, his ankle sprained. As he was endeavoring to crawl away a man, mounted on a horse with a little girl perched in front of him, came up the trail. Seeing the injured boy, he dismounted and took him with the little girl ten miles to a doctor.

When his foot was well, Sun-Rock journeyed back to his home, but found it burned to the ground. Sun-Rock was left to face the world alone. No one knew where his uncle, with whom he lived, had gone. Unconsciously, he turned his step back in the direction of his new-found friends. Upon arrising at the town, he found they had left to journey to another town a hundred miles distant, and, Indian-like, he took the trail.

Fifty, seventy-five miles he journeyed on foot. The monotonous plain gave way to rocky crags, interspersed with sheer depths. Late in the afternoon of the fourth day he heard a cry from off the trail. He recognized the horse, and then found the man. It was his friend, the one who had been so kind to him. The man was stretched at full length on the ground, peering over the edge into the chasm below. Wonderingly, the Indian youth went toward him.

At the sound of the footsteps the man glanced back. Answering the look of inquiry from Sun-Rock, he pointed silently below, horror pictured on his face. Sun-Rock crept to the edge and looked down. Some fifty feet below, caught on a stunted tree that grew from a narrow ledge, lay the motionless form of the little girl who had ridden with him the day he was injured. She had wandered from camp, her father explained, when he had gone looking for fuel.

Sun-Rock was silent. His black eyes, shining like burning coals, roved quickly about the vicinity in search of a means of rescue. Finally, they lighted on the lariat that hung from the saddle of the horse, grazing in the rear. He went to the horse and secured the rope. Tying one end to a large boulder, he threw the other over the edge of the precipice.

Then he pointed to the depths below. "I will go down for her," he said, simply.

The distracted father clasped Sun-Rock's hand. "Can you do it?" he asked.

"I will try. You were good to me."

The man removed his coat and laid it under the rope to prevent the ragged edge of the rock from cutting the strands. Then Sun-Rock swung himself over and slowly let himself down. His bare feet, which he passed against the uneven wall, were cut on the jagged rock. At last he reached the narrow ledge on which the girl was lying.

Bearing her closer to the wall, he tied the end of the rope under her arms. Then he called to the man above, who carefully drew the child to safety. Once more the father lowered the rope to the boy and then went to carry his little girl away from the edge. A shout from below brought him back. Sun-Rock, in tying the rope, had loosened it from the boulder above and pulled it down. He was a prisoner.

"Keep up your courage," the man shouted. "I am going for help." But Sun-Rock knew well that help was many miles distant.

For hours he clung to the narrow ledge and the stem of the stunted tree. Daylight disappeared and the darkness seemed to draw the jaws of the chasm closer together. But a bright star that shone directly above showed Sun-Rock that the Great Spirit was watching, and the lad felt cheered.

At last, as his eyes were closing and his stiffened limbs were numb, he heard the sound of many hoof-beats in the distance. They were coming! Louder and louder came the staccato ring of the iron-shod hoofs on the rocks; then the voice of his benefactor came from above.

"Are you there, Sun-Rock?"

"Yes." The youth's voice was weak and hoarse from the chill night air that sighed through the chasm.

Then a lantern was lowered to the ledge and a man shortly followed. Grasping Sun-Rock in his arms and lashing him to his body, the man called to those above, and the two were pulled to the top by many willing hands.

"Is she safe?" Sun-Rock asked as he lay upon the ground.

"Yes, thanks to you."

A sigh of relief came from the lad. As he shared once again the saddle of the man who had been so kind to him, he breathed a prayer of thankfulness to the Great Father for granting him an opportunity to pay the debt he owed. —Boys' World.

A Little Talk With You About Making a Garden.

Have you ever had a garden of your very own? Maybe it was just a little corner of one of father's big garden beds. But, anyway, it was a garden, and you might plant in it the kinds of flowers or vegetables you liked best.

What fun it was to dig in the soft earth and then to plant the tiny seeds! And how hard you found it to wait until the tiny green things appeared!

You kept the little plants well watered, and they grew and grew. But soon you saw others planted. What were they? Weeds! And you had to work hard to keep them from growing faster than the plants.

That is always the way with gardens.

We each have a garden in our hearts. It is full of growing things, and we must watch to see that the weeds do not choke out the good plants that are there.

Some of us are planting lovely things in these gardens of our hearts. The flowers of love and kindness and obedience are blooming there, and their beauty and fragrance makes every one happy.

Every time you speak happy words when you feel like saying cross ones; every time you do your tasks willingly and cheerfully; every time you smile instead of frown, you have dropped a tiny good seed into your heart's garden.

But let us watch the weeds of Carelessness and Untruthfulness, of Disobedience and Unkindness! For these seeds will sprout and grow into ugly, disagreeable plants that will spoil our beautiful heart-gardens. But, of course, every time we plant a good seed there is less room for the ugly weeds to grow.

Suppose we think a minute—isn't there some good seed that we can plant in our heart-garden today?—Helen P. Metzger.

For the Southern Churchman.

A Legend of the Bluebird.

Edward Jaquelin Smith, Aged 11.

'Twas about the year 1850 that Mrs. Laurel had slaves, and also a little boy about five years old. One of the slaves was called Uncle Billy Willis. He was an old man, and he could sit up and tell stories for hours to this little boy of Mrs. Laurel's.

One night the little boy went down to Uncle Billy's cabin to hear a story. He knocked at the door, and Uncle Billy told him to come in. He went in, and there sat Uncle Billy, just starting to tell a story to three other darkies.

The little boy went right to Uncle Billy and jumped up in his lap—ready to hear the story.

"Johnny, I'se jist a'gittin' ready ter tell you'se why der bluebird has a blue back and a reddish-brown stummick," said Uncle Billy. "Is everybody ready?" he exclaimed. "If you is, I'se ready ter start der story." Just then three voices piped up, "I is!" so Uncle Billy cleared his throat and got ready to tell the story.

"Once 'pon a time," said Uncle Billy, "dere lived a little bluebird and his mate, over in der old hollow tree in der woods. Over in der field dar lived a old chicken-hawk. He liked to eat little birds, and 'specially little bluebirds."

"Vun day der old hawk got mighty hungry, he did, and he 'lowed he was goin' and git somethin' ter eat. So he started out. Fust he went over to little Jenny Wren's house, but when Jenny saw him a-comin' she fetched up der babies and hid in der grass. So old hawk didn't find dem."

"Den he went over ter Robin Redbreast's house, and he got 'pon Robin Redbreast before she saw him, but Robin flew de fastes', till he got to a hole in a tree, where der old hawk couldn't get. So he didn't get him.

"Den he went over to little Bluebird's home. Like Robin, little Bluebird didn't see him 'til he got 'pon him. So der poor little Bluebird flew fer his life. He flew and flew 'til he got real high. He went up so high dat he act'ally scraped der sky with his back, and it turned his back all sky-blue. He got awful scared, but he jist couldn't help admirin' hisself, kase he jest knew dat dey would admire him when he got back ter der nes'. But der old hawk still chased him, and jist den he remember der little mudhole down in der bank, vere he could hide fum der old hawk. So he flew as fast as he could and he got away from him. Finally he got dere, and he krept back in der mud and lay down, he did, and he was so scared dat he stayed dere all day, eben tho' he did know dat der old hawk couldn't find him.

"When der sun went down over der hills der little Bluebird crept out, and he looked down at his stummick and it was all reddish-brown. And den dat little bird stood dere and looked at his pretty breast and blue back and jist admired hisself.

"Den he went home and all der birds was so surprised to know it was him, dey didn't know vot to do.

"And so all after dat generation had reddish-brown breasts and blue backs.

"Now," said Uncle Billy, "I'se don' related to you why der bluebird has a earth-lookin' breast and a sky-blue back."

Then all the audience thanked Uncle Billy for the story, and then the darkies went to their cabins and the little boy up to the old, big, white mansion on the hill.

Two Thank-Yous.

Cotton plant, I must thank you
For gingham dress so bright of hue;
For summer dresses trimmed with lace;
For towels on which to dry my face,
For window curtains sheer and white;
For paper on which I can write.
Cotton plant, I must thank you;
I'm very glad, indeed, you grew.

Woolly sheep, I must thank you
For sweater and for mittens, too;
For cloak and hood, so warm and bright;
For blankets, soft, to use at night.
Yet, though you give your wool to me,
Your own coat is still thick, I see.
Woolly sheep, I must thank you;
I'm glad you've wool enough for two.
—Exchange.

The Dummy Knob.

On the door of a house at which I was calling the other day I found two knobs. One was a dummy put there for symmetry; when I tried it, it turned round and round in my hand. The other resisted my hand, but opened the door.

The two knobs reminded me of Dick Hartley and Dan Cortelyou. Dick's mother feared that his character was weakening. When at her request I urged him to be a man and resist temptation, he smiled and promised to do everything that I asked; but his promises were so glib that I had no faith in them. He was like the dummy knob that turned round and round in my hand. I could not open the door.

Dan Cortelyou was different. When I spoke to him of his wild ways his color mounted, his eyes grew defiant. How could he help it, he asked, if his pals were doing this and that? Whose business was it what he did? He resisted. I knew that I had hold of a live knob. Before long the door had opened wide enough to admit the truth.

But the door knobs reminded me of other things than people—the easy and the hard way. There was Jim Smedley. As his father was well to do, he had a golden knob that opened every door. He never put his strength against an obstacle, but played with the knob that turned round and round so easily. The doors of real success remained closed to him.

For many years the French missionary, Francois Coillard, labored among the Barotse, a native tribe in South Africa. When he felt that his death was near he wrote: "I solemnly bequeath to the churches of France, my native land, the responsibility for the Lord's work in Barotseland, and I adjure them in His holy name never to give it up."

Bequeath work? We usually bequeath something that we think the heir will prize. But work—especially work calling for self-sacrifice?

But think again. Is there anything more precious than the chance to do a great work? Many persons find life insipid merely because they have no task that will make them work with all their might. A hard task is something to rejoice in. Take hold of that knob. It may resist obstinately, but it will open for you the doors both of earth and of heaven.—Youth's Companion.

IN AN APRIL SHOWER.

Little Violet had a bonnet
All of velvet, softly blue;
There were dainty ribbons on it,
And a diadem of dew.

"I'm afraid the rain will spoil it!"
Cried Miss Violet, always neat.
"Splashing drops are sure to soil it;
April is so indiscreet."

"I will lend you my umbrella,"
Quick a gallant fairy said:
And he raised a mushroom yellow
Over pretty Violet's head.
—Mary Earle Hardy, in Youth's Companion.

Be not ashamed to be helped; for it is thy business to do thy duty like a soldier in an assault on a town. How, then, if being lame thou canst not mount up on the battlements alone, but with the help of another it is possible?
—Marcus Aurelius.

The South's Best Book Store
HUNTER & CO
105 E. Broad Street
Richmond, Va.
Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen
Prompt and Reliable Service

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS
FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG
S. T. Beveridge & Co.
Office: 1217 East Cary Street
Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd
Richmond, Va.

Church Furnishings, Memorials, etc.
MOLLER PIPE ORGANS
Highest grade instruments. In use in three thous. and churches. Every organ specially designed for the church and service in which it is to be used and fully guaranteed. Specifications and estimates on request. Correspondence solicited.
M. P. MÖLLER
Hagerstown, Maryland

CHURCH VESTMENTS
Cassocks, Surplices, Stoles
EMBROIDERIES
Silks, Cloths, Fringes
CLERICAL SUITS
Rabats, Collars, Shirts
COX SONS & VINING
2 Madison Avenue New York

CHURCH VESTMENTS
Gold, Silver and Brass
Church and Chancel Furniture
Write for Catalogue
for Episcopal Churches
W. & E. SCHMIDT CO.
108 Third Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

HOT WATER HEAT
For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars
ARCOLA SYSTEM
R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.
9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

Sacramental Wine
Absolutely Pure Grape Wine
Made expressly for use at the Communion Table
Established 1857
Phone, Write or Call
Tel. Cortlandt 3001
H. T. Dewey & Sons Co.
Address Either
138 Fulton Street, New York City
or Cellars, Egg Harbor, New Jersey

NICK BULL'S MARKET,
Richmond's Leading Dealer in
FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME
312 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.
Phone Randolph 1680
WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

R. Geissler, Inc.
56 West Eighth Street, New York
Memorials
FOR THE CHURCH
Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

FAMINE RELIEF.

For the convenience of our readers we publish the addresses of the treasurers of the various Relief Funds whose appeals for the starving, and especially for starving children, are so urgent and touching. The Southern Churchman will forward contributions to any of these, but to save time, postage and possibility of miscarriage, checks would better be sent directly to the treasurers as below:

Near East Relief (formerly "Armenian and Syrian Relief")—Cleveland H. Dodge, No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York City.

European Relief (Central and Eastern Europe)—Franklin K. Lane, 42 Broadway, New York City; or locally for Virginia, Desoto Fitzgerald, 218 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.

Chinese Famine Relief—Remit through Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer, Presiding Bishop and Council, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

PIPE ORGANS

PIPE ORGANS.

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID IN building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

MEETING OF TRUSTEES.

The Board of Trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary and High School in Virginia will meet at the Seminary on Wednesday, the first day of June,
S. SCOLLAY MOORE, Secy.

DON'T TRY ON YOUR NEW DRESSES over your old corset. Let us help you select and fit to you the corset that does greatest justice to your figure. The Corset Shop, 317 N. Fifth St. Mrs. A. J. Pyle, Prop. Phone Ran. 3397.

Doll Skirts Accordion Pleated Free. ASHBY B. PYLE, 315 N. 5th St. Hemstitching, Pinking and Button Covering.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER

Invites you to inspect her line of GAGE Tailored HATS. Also the ADVANCE Showing of Spring Hats in the most attractive shapes.

209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

"RESTMORE," MONTROSE, PA. 2,000 feet altitude. Large shady lawn; no mosquitoes. Home table. Terms $18 and up. Leaflet.

I take this method of thanking my many clients for their past patronage, and assure them I am still selling Spirella corsets, and can be reached at the Wallerstein, Apartment 202, or by phone, Randolph 3694-W. MISS MYRTLE McDONNELL.

SLIGHTLY USED SASH WITH 8x10 glass, six lights to sash, twelve lights to pair, plain rail at $1 per pair. Slightly used panel doors, $1. New window frames at $1 each, F. O. B. Hopewell, Va. Cash with order, please. Harrison Construction Co., Petersburg, Va.

HELP WANTED

WANTED—TO EMPLOY A CLERGYMAN as superintendent of small orphanage in North Carolina. Correspondence solicited. Address Rev. E. A. Penick, Jr., Charlotte, N. C.

CHOIRMASTER.

WANTED—ORGANIST - CHOIRMASTER, Christ Church, Warren, O. Population thirty thousand. Tripled in ten years. Still growing. New Austin organ. Unusual opportunity for teaching. Salary $1,200. Address Christ Church, Warren, O.

WANTED—A REFINED AND CAPABLE Churchwoman with small capital to join a lady in an established "apartment house business" in Miami, Fla. Highest references given and required. Address "M. C.," care of Southern Churchman.

WANTED—A WORKING HOUSEKEEPER in a family of three adults. Must be a good, plain cook, quiet and pleasant. References. Good home and good wages. Address Mrs. J. J., 1626 Twenty-ninth Street, Washington, D. C.

SITUATION WANTED.

REFINED COUPLE DESIRES POSITION in Church school or institution. Wife as matron or house-mother, husband expert in clerical work. Experienced. References. Moderate stipend. Address "12," care Southern Churchman.

COMPANION—WIDOW OF ARMY OFFICER and daughter of Episcopal clergyman, desires position as companion to lady, or to teach small children in their home. Address Mrs. Wood, 1913 Laurel Street, Columbia, S. C.

ORGANIST.

ENERGETIC ORGANIST-CHOIRMASTER, married, churchman, cathedral training; great experience leading large choirs, recitalist, wishes permanent position with good field for teaching. Address "Progressive," care Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

A GENTLEWOMAN, TEACHER BY PROfession, desires employment for the summer, or longer perhaps, as teacher, companion, chaperon, or to take entire charge of widower's household. Thoroughly capable of filling any one of these positions, and can give best of references. Address T. E. M., care of Southern Churchman.

CHURCHWOMAN DESIRES POSITION AS companion to aged couple, country preferred. Address "G.," care of Southern Churchman.

CHURCHWOMAN DESIRES POSITION AS companion, mother's helper or housekeeper for the summer; country or seashore preferred. Address "C.," care of Southern Churchman.

WANTED—RECTORSHIP, BY A CLERgyman with experience; eight years in Western mission work, eight in New York City, two in the South. Good reader; extemporaneous preacher. Address "J.," care of Southern Churchman.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

Peterson: Entered into rest April 5, 1921, near Bacon's Castle, Surry County, Va., CLARA, age fifteen, only daughter of Weldon Herbert and Blanche Peterson, and granddaughter of the late John and Clara H. Peterson. Burial at Brick Church, near the Castle.

"Suffer the little children to come unto Me."

Martin: Entered into life eternal on May 13, 1921, at Norfolk, Va., in the seventy-fifth year of his age, WILLIAM BRUCE MARTIN, son of the late General James Green Martin, C. S. A., and Marianne Read Martin.

Earle: Entered into rest at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Henry E. Wright, near Centreville, Md., on Sunday morning, May 1, 1921, MRS. LOUISA STUBBS EARLE widow of the late William Brundige Earle, of "Melfield." Mrs. Earle was born in Norfolk, Va., December 28, 1842, of Simon and Elizabeth Stubbs. Funeral service was held at St. Paul's Church, Centreville. Interment at "Melfield."

Stinson: Died in Spartanburg, S. C., May 15th, in the seventy-fifth year of her age, ELIZA BINGHAM, nee Tillinghast, relic' of E. Buritte Stinson. Interment at Davidson, N. C.

"He giveth His beloved sleep."
J. H. T.

ROBERT FIELDING CHELF.

Entered into Paradise in the early morning of Friday, the 22d of April, 1921, ROBERT FIELDING CHELF, in his twenty-first year, beloved son of T. Wilbur and Willie Douglas Chelf.

I cannot say, I will not say,
That he is dead—he is just away;
With a cheery smile and a wave of the hand,
He has wandered into an unknown land.
And left us dreaming how very fair
It needs must be, since he lingers there.
Think of him, faring on as dear
In the love of there as the love of here;
Think of him still as the same I say,
He is not dead—he is "just away."

MISS NANNIE LANGHORNE SCOTT

Daughter of the late Edward Scott and Eliza Madison Hackley, his wife, of Manakin Farms, Powhatan County, Va., after a long illness borne with Christian fortitude and cheerfulness died on April 29, and was buried at Manakin Church in the presence of a large concourse of relatives and friends, the funeral service being conducted by the rector. The floral emblems were numerous and beautiful. She is survived by the following brothers and sisters: C. Selden, John L., Robert H. and Samuel; Mary K. and Lucia Beverley Scott, all of Powhatan County, and by fourteen nieces and nephews.

Miss Nannie L. Scott was a Christian gentlewoman of rare character. Her energy and industry were remarkable for quality and extent, and her charity and generosity were always manifested to a degree that approached her possibilities, and she made no distinction in condition or color, serving all according to their need. Her hospitality was abounding and her house open at all times. She was humble in spirit and never sought place or honor for herself.

She was a devoted worker in and a liberal supporter of old Manakin Church and all community welfare work; a teacher in the Sunday school and for nearly twenty years the teacher of the public school at Huguenot Springs, and was beloved by pupil and patron. In her family she planned for all and bore their burdens and never failed one of them. She was greatly admired and beloved, and will be missed and mourned by her family, friends and the entire community. She has gone to a great reward.

The latter half of St. John's gospel, which begins at chapter 13, is the Holy of Holies of the New Testament. Nowhere else do the blended lights of our Lord's superhuman dignity and human tenderness shine with such lambent brightness. Nowhere else in His speech at once so simple and so deep. Nowhere else have we the heart of God so unveiled to us. On no other page, even of the Bible, have so many eyes, glistening with tears, looked and had the tears dried. The immortal words which Christ spoke in that upper chamber are His highest self-revelation in speech, even as the cross to which they led up is His most perfect self-revelation in act.—A Maclaren.

Personal Notes

Rev. J. M. Stoney has resigned his work in the Diocese of South Carolina at Clemson and Pendleton to go to Anniston, Ala.

The Rev. W. E. Roach, of Marshall, Diocese of Virginia, has resigned the charge of Piedmont Parish, Fauquier County, and accepted a call to Christ Church, Martinsville, Diocese of Southwestern Virginia.

The Rev. John Rigg, for the last nine years rector of Christ Church, Riverton, N. J., has resigned to become rector of St. Thomas' Parish, Prince George County, Md. He will enter upon his new duties on June 1.

The Rev. W. Clayton Torrence has resigned the charge of Upper Truro Parish, Herndon, and accepted a call to Newton Parish, Warren County, Diocese of Virginia. His residence will be at Front Royal.

The Rev. A. R. McKinstry, canon of Grace Cathedral, Topeka, Kan., has accepted the call to become the rector of the Church of the Incarnation, Cleveland, O., and will take up his duties on September 1.

The Rev. George Gilbert Walker, Archdeacon of Texas, has accepted the call to the rectorship of the Church of Our Merciful Saviour, Louisville, Ky.

The Rev. Sanders R. Guignard, for the past five years rector of Christ Church, Mount Pleasant, and St. James', Santee, Diocese of South Carolina, has accepted a call to St. Luke's Church and Associate Missions, Lincolnton, N. C., District of Asheville, and will be permanently located in Lincolnton after June 1.

The Rev. Reese F. Thornton, of Grand Rapids, Mich., has accepted the rectorship of All Saints' Church, Pittsburgh, and will enter upon his duties on July 1.

The Rev. Wythe Leigh Kinsolving, lately minister in charge of St. Paul's Church, Jackson, Mich., has sailed for Cherbourg, France, and expects to visit Italy and the British Isles before returning July 15, 1921.

The Rev. Chester Wood, who has been doing supply work in Kansas for the last six months, will return to his home in Lansing, Mich., June 1, but will spend most of the summer at his farm at Pinckney, Mich.

The Rev. Julius C. H. Sauber, of Boston, on June 1 will become City Missionary of Pittsburgh, under the Diocesan Board of Social Service. His work will have to do with hospitals, charitable institutions and prisons of the county.

The Rev. Thomas L. Small, of the St. Alban's School for Boys, Washington, will become regular assistant to the Rev. Enoch M. Thompson, vicar of the Chapels of the Nativity and Resurrection, Washington, and will assume his new duties immediately after the close of the school in June.

The Rev. John R. McGrory has been appointed assistant at the Church of St. Simeon, Ninth Street and Lehigh Avenue, Philadelphia, Rev. George John Walenta, rector.

The Rev. Guy E. Kagey has accepted a call to St. John's Church, Olney, Md., and resigned his parish of St. Paul's, Evanston, Wyo., his resignation taking effect on May 17. Mr. Kagey was vicar of the Little Snake River Missions for two years, and took charge of the work in Evanston in 1916, developing it into a parish in 1918. Mr. Kagey was Secretary of the Missionary District of Wyoming and dean of the Rural Deanery of Green River. His indefatigable zeal and pastoral instincts won for him a rare place in the affections of his people.

In the recent election of a president in the Churchmen's Alliance, Mr. Chauncey Brewster Tinker was elected by a large majority. Mr. Tinker is Professor of English Literature in Yale University and a communicant of Christ Church, New Haven.

Mr. Thomas E. Winecoff has been appointed lay missioner for Wyoming, and is at present working in Park County Parish.

Deaths.

The Rev. William James Tilley, chaplain of the New Jersey Home for Disabled Soldiers, died at his residence in Newark on Sunday, April 24, aged seventy-six years.

Funeral services were held in Christ Church, Harrison, on Wednesday afternoon, Bishop Stearly and the Rev. Roy J. Riblet, rector of the parish, officiating. Interment was made on the following day at Albany, N. Y.

JUST READY

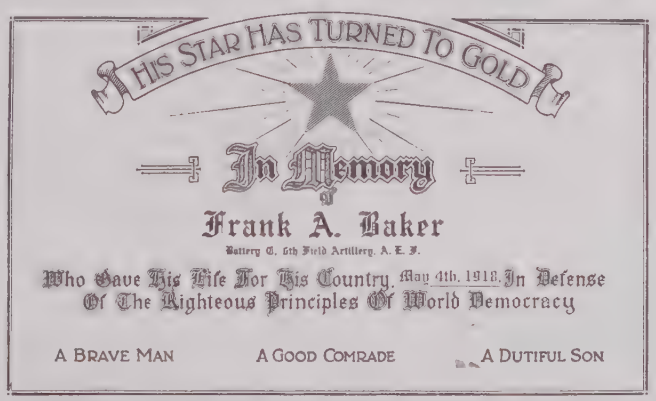
More "FIVE-MINUTE TALKS"

By Walter R. Bowie, D.D.

SUNNY WINDOWS

Author of "The Children's Year"

AND OTHER SERMONS



There is another volume of Dr. Bowie's talks to youngsters, all attractively suited to the child mind. The subjects are arresting themes, calculated to almost invariably catch the attention of boy or girl—while the treatment thereof is simplicity itself.

As the Record of Christian Work said: "Dr. Bowie's talks are capital—straight to the hearts of children, clever, interesting, helpful."

Cloth, $1.25 net

For Sale by

Southern Churchman Co., Richmond, Va.

(Actual size, 7½x11½ inches.)

A BEAUTIFUL PHOTO ENGRAVING IN BLACK, WHITE AND GOLD. Furnished with name of soldier, Company and Date in place of the one shown. Ready for Framing. Sent postpaid for $1.50; delivery in one week.

LEAKE PRINTING CO.,
412 East Main Street, Richmond, Va.

There's a Word

frequently used now-a-days that sometimes is meant and sometimes isn't.

The word is "SERVICE," and we leave it to you to determine whether we mean it.

The Union Bank of Richmond

1104 East Main Street

XANTHINE!
Restores Gray Hair to Its Natural Color
REMOVES DANDRUFF AND SCURF
Invigorates and prevents the hair from falling out
MARVELOUS IN ITS EFFECTS
For Sale by Druggists, or Sent Direct by Mail
XANTHINE COMPANY, Richmond, Va.
Price $1.25 per bottle, trial size 50c. Send for circular

The next time you buy calomel ask for

Calotabs

The purified and refined calomel tablets that are nauseless, safe and sure.

Medicinal virtues retained and improved. Sold only in sealed packages. Price 35c.

The Best of the New Things for Springtime

In the enthusiastic seeking of "lower prices" which seems to have become so general during recent months, there is danger, we think, of overstepping the bounds of true economy and mistaking the cheap and tawdry for the low-in-price.

This is one reason why you will find a visit to this store particularly helpful at this time, in fulfilling your plans for the new season.

No unworthy goods may find a place among the stocks, and we think you may safely rely upon our taste and good judgment in selection.

And while everything here is of the same high, dependable quality that has always been characteristic at MILLER & RHOADS, prices are now materially lower.

To-day the store is gaily decked out in its spring-time dress, splendidly ready to serve your every need, whether for articles of apparel and personal adornment or for the home.

Miller & Rhoads

"The Shopping Center" Richmond, Va.

Throughout the Church
THE NEW HYMNAL
is used to the great improvement of congregational singing

Trinity—Galveston

St. Paul's—Boston

THE NEW HYMNAL

WITH BOTH WORDS AND MUSIC

Single copies . . . . . $1.20 per copy
In lots of 100 or more . . . . 1.05 extended payment
In lots of 100 or more . . . . 1.00 cash

Carriage Charges Extra

St Paul's—New York

Published by

THE CHURCH PENSION FUND

14 Wall Street, New York

Trinity—Cleveland

R. L. Christian & Company

514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.

Leading Fancy Grocer

AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.
Catalogue mailed on application.

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health and, above all,

Provide yourself with Travelers Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank

Richmond, Virginia

Service

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business. That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE
CARPETS DRAPERIES

SAFES

L. N. COOKE SAFE & LOCK CO.
807 East Franklin St.
Richmond, Va.

Have You Made Your Will?

See G. Jeter Jones, Vice-President, about this now. All conferences confidential. Phone or write for appointment.

Merchants National Bank

11th and Main Streets, Richmond, Va.

"SAFEST FOR TRUSTS"

The Incas of Peru

had no equivalent to our modern safe deposit vault, so their treasures were looted by the rapacious followers of Pizarro.
Don't keep your valuables where they can be stolen, burned, or lost.

An individual box in our new steel vault will assure perfect protection.

PLANTERS NATIONAL BANK

Main and 12th Streets, Richmond, Va.

In Matters Pertaining to

Banking, Trusts or Real Estate we cordially invite your business.
Interest allowed on daily balances of Savings and Dormant Accounts.
We have many customers who do their banking by mail.

RICHMOND TRUST CO.

Capital and Surplus $1,200.000.

JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS, Chairman of the Board
E. L. BEMISS, President C. J. ANDERSON, Vice-President
J. D. CRUMP, Vice-President R. J. WILLINGHAM, Jr., Sec'y. and Treas.
DEANE MAURY, Trust Officer.

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary
J. M. Leake, General Agent
E. B. Addison, Vice-President
J. C. Watson, Treasurer
Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

Cuticura Soap Will Help You Clear Your Skin

Soap, Ointment, Talcum, 25c. everywhere. Samples free of Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. V, Malden, Mass.

O. Luetke's Art Works

Church Furnishings
IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.
st. 886. 323-332 7th Ave. New Yor

GIVE US YOUR OPINION OF

THE CHURCH AT WORK

The Church at Work was started as a medium through which to reach all of the

600,000 FAMILIES OF THE CHURCH and keep them informed of and interested in what is being done and planned to carry on the mission of the Church. It is believed that it is absolutely essential to do this in some way if the ground gained is to be held and if the Church is ever, as a whole, to prosecute her mission adequately.

What is your opinion?

If you believe this must be done, is The Church at Work in your opinion the best way to do it?

VARIETY OF OPINION

We are told, on the one hand, that The Church at Work is not distributed; that where distributed it is not read, and that even where it is read it is not of such a character as to meet the need.

We are told, on the other hand, that the paper is interesting and informing and is generally read and has proved effective in arousing increased interest where it has been distributed.

What is your opinion of the paper? What improvements can you suggest?

AS TO DISTRIBUTION

At first 600,000 copies were issued. They were sent in bulk to diocesan centers, there re-shipped in bulk to the parishes and missions and the parishes and missions were asked to provide distribution to all the families by adult visitors.

When it was learned that in many places there was not a thorough distribution it was announced that papers would be shipped to only these parishes and missions which would promise a thorough distribution. Such assurances have been made for a total of 425,000 copies, which is the number of the June issue sent out.

Did the parishes and missions which discontinued the paper refuse it because of the character of the paper or because of the difficulty of distribution?

If the publication of the paper is continued for the two-thirds of the Church which seems to desire it, how shall we reach the one-third of the Church which has declined to distribute it?

AN EXPERIMENT

The Church at Work is an experiment made in the effort to solve a problem of vital consequence. It has been only partially successful. Perhaps no single method can be fully and universally successful.

Do you know of a better method for use in the whole Church?

Do you know a method by which this present method may be supplemented?

We desire to know the mind of the Church. Please fill out the following blank and mail it to THE CHURCH AT WORK, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

We beg you to take this trouble for the sake of the work.

Presiding Bishop and Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church

Publicity Department, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City

THE CHURCH AT WORK

These questions are addressed to the readers of this paper, those who appreciate the value and necessity of reading a Church paper.

Should a thorough effort be made to reach everybody in the Church with information?.....

Can you suggest a better way than by The Church at Work?.....

.....

How shall we reach those who do not receive The Church at Work?.....

.....

Can you suggest a better method of distribution?.....

.....

Remarks:.....

.....

Name.....Parish.....

Address.....Diocese.....

Southern Churchman

DOMINUS FRUSTRA ISIN 1835

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., JUNE 4, 1921. No. 23.

AS a soldier who has spent a quarter of his life in the study of the science of arms, let me tell you I went into the British Army believing that if you want peace you must prepare for war. I believe now that if you prepare thoroughly and efficiently for war, you get war. Since I had to discard my first theory, I sought another solution of the problem of how to avoid war, and I think I have found my solution in the League of Nations.

---Major-General Frederick B. Maurice

EDUCATIONAL

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to
REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean
Petersburg, Va.

The Virginian Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-fourth year of this School for Boys opens September 21, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

St. Christopher's School

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND, VA.
A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.
Eleventh session begins September 21, 1921. Tuition in boarding department, limited to twenty-two boys, $650. For catalogue, address
REV. C. G. CHAMBERLAYNE, PH. D., HEADMASTER

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university. Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to
REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

SEWANEE MILITARY ACADEMY

53rd year. In an ideal spot, heart of the Cumberland mountains, 2,000 feet elevation. College preparatory; also equips for citizenship. Military instruction secures regularity, neatness, respect, promptitude. Student body are boys of character who are developed into manly men of purpose. 40-acre added domain. Vigorous outdoor life; all athletics. R. O. T. C. Episcopal. Early registration advisable. Catalog. Address The Principal, Sewanee, Tenn.

National Cathedral School

A Boarding and Day School for Girls. Fireproof buildings in Cathedral Close of 40 acres. College Preparatory. Advanced and Special Courses. Music and Art.
The Bishop of Washington,
President of the Board of Trustees.
Jessie C. McDonald, M. S., Principal.
Mount St. Alban, Washington, D. C.

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"We do not go to cowards for tender dealing."

The best remedy for self-conceit is to be well introduced to yourself.

Obedience to the known will of God is the highest evidence of sincerity and faith.—Ex.

There isn't much oil in the lamp of the Christian who is not happy.

"If you think I'd steal," said the tempted boy, "you don't know my mother!"

"There is such a thing as a living hope, and the object of that living hope is the living God."

No man has learned anything rightly until he knows that every day is doomsday.—Emerson.

We know where a man is going by the road he takes. There is only one road to the life which Christ is now living—it is the road along which He traveled.—R. W. Dale.

The real duty is neglected when we step over one duty to perform another. —E. J. Brown.

"Men sin for lack of strong, good intentions, which come by watching and praying."

Humility is like the veil thrown over the face of beauty, which heightens the loveliness it seeks to hide.—Archbishop Leighton.

Life is not a holiday, but an education, and the one eternal lesson for us all is how we can live better.—Henry Drummond.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,
REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.
A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. College preparatory. Boarding department 503 W. Franklin Street. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health; out-door life.
MISS ROSALIE H. NOLAND, Principal

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLES TOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art. Athletics. Open air classes. Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

HOBART COLLEGE For Men
William Smith College for Women

GENEVA, N. Y.

100th Year Opens September 20, 1921

Hobart offers a large number of scholarships to students preparing for Holy Orders.

RT. REV. CHARLES H. BRENT, D. D., LL. D.,
CHANCELLOR

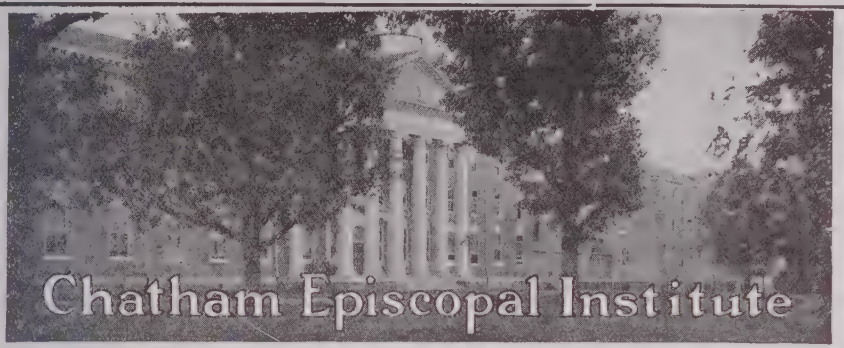
RET. MURRAY BARTLETT, D. D.,
PRESIDENT

For information address the President

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

The Ninety-ninth Session Open Wednesday, September 21, 1921

For catalogs and other information, address The Dean, Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia.



RUTH'S HALL.
Asbury Park, N J
A Boarding School for girls under the auspices of the Diocese of New Jersey. Terms $400 per annum. Limited capacity. Primary to College entrance. Address the Rev Hiram R Bennett, Rector, Asbury Park, N. J.

POSSE NORMAL SCHOOL OF GYMNASTICS.
Massachusetts, Boston. 779 Beacon Street. 33d year. New building. Courses of one, two and three years. Present conditions have created great demand for our graduates. Courses in Medical Gymnastics and Playgrounds. Summer Camp. Apply to THE SECRETARY.

MARY BALDWIN SEMINARY. For Young Ladies. Established 1842. Term begins Sept. 8th. In historic Shenandoah Valley. Students from 33 States. Courses: Collegiate (3 years), Preparatory (4 years). Music, Art, Expression and Domestic Science. Athletics, gymnasium. Catalog. Staunton, Va.

THE CATHEDRAL SCHOOL of Florida. Episcopal—a homelike school for girls. College preparatory and general course. Delightful winter climate. LILIAS S. BILL, Principal, Orlando, Florida.

EDUCATIONAL

A Girls' School with a Religious Atmosphere

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Pres. Rev. C. Orlando Pruden, D. D., Rector

A School which offers a thorough education at a moderate cost. Its location, on main line Southern R. R., is healthful and beautiful; the modern buildings are excellently equipped and surrounded by a ten-acre campus. The School maintains a gymnasium, with provision for outdoor athletics.

The curriculum embraces College Preparatory and Business Courses, Literary, Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Thorough preparation for all Colleges. Catalogue and views may be obtained by addressing

ANNIE MARION POWELL, M. A., Principal, Box 13, Chatham, Va

Have You Selected Your School?

Enrollments are now being made for the ensuing school year. Many institutions already have a waiting list. If you find it difficult to make a choice, the Southern Churchman will be glad to assist you. Address

Southern Churchman School Bureau

815 East Grace St.

Richmond, Va.

College of William and Mary

THE STATE COLLEGE FOR MEN AND WOMEN

Regular academic courses leading to Bachelor and Master degrees.

Special Courses: Two and Three-Year Pre-Medical; Teacher Training; Home Economics, Pre-Engineering; Pre-Legal; Business Administration; Finance, etc.

State scholarships for students preparing to be teachers.

Ministerial students admitted on same terms as Virginia students pledged to teach. Loan fund for worthy students.

For particulars, address

THE COLLEGE OF WILLIAM AND MARY
Williamsburg, Virginia

H. L. BRIDGES, Registrar J. A. C. CHANDLER, President

FAUQUIER INSTITUTE

FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES WARRENTON, VA.

The 62nd session begins September 29, 1921. Situated in Piedmont region of Virginia, 55 miles from Washington. A limited and thorough home school. Modern buildings, 5-acre campus. Catalog.

MISS NELLIE V. BUTLER, PRINCIPAL, BOX 17

Roanoke College

Salem, Va.

A standard college for men. In beautiful Valley of Virginia. Notable record for producing leaders for the Church and nation.

CHAS. J. SMITH Presidnet

STUART HALL

STAUNTON, VA.

1843 1920

FORMERLY VIRGINIA FEMALE INSTITUTE

Oldest girls' school in Virginia—Episcopal. Location healthful and beautiful. General and college preparatory courses. Loyal alumnae find here for their daughters the familiar atmosphere of culture and refinement, combined with modern equipment and teaching methods. Supervised outdoor sports. For catalogue, address MRS. H. N. HILLS A. B., Box P.

STAMMERING CAN BE CURED

YOUR MONEY BACK IF NOT SATISFIED

We leave it to you absolutely: if you say you are not satisfied, that settles it, you may have your money back. Not a single one to date who has come has asked that the money be returned. Write for booklet and references.

SCHOOL FOR STAMMERERS, Tyler, Texas

ST. FAITH'S

A HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

Saratoga Springs - - - New York

Thoroughness of Instruction
Vocational Guidance Definite Church Teaching
Invigorating Climate

Provincial School of the Synod of New York and New Jersey.
Very Low Rates. For catalogue, address

The Rev. Harry Clarke Plum, A. B., Prin., Box 356-S

Sweet Briar College

SWEET BRIAR, VA. STANDARD FOUR-YEAR COLLEGE COURSES

Students received on certificate and by examination. Unexcelled climate, out-of-door sports all year.

For catalogue and views, address the Registrar, Box 19.

EMILIE WATTS McVEA, A. M., LITT. D., PRESIDENT

HOLDERNESS SCHOOL for Boys

Five buildings. 20 acres. Prepares for Colleges and Technical Schools. Ranks with highest grade schools of New England, yet by reason of endowment the tuition is moderate. Modern gymnasium. Skating. All winter sports. 41st year.

REV. LORIN WEBSTER, L. H. D., Rector, Plymouth, N. H.

Jno. L. Williams & Sons

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds

Earn Extra Dollars in Your Spare Hours

You need no experience to be successful—You can learn as you earn. Let us tell you about our plan.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN is the oldest Episcopal Church Paper published in America. Every dollar received in subscriptions will be devoted to the improvement of the paper and the extension of its service in the work of the Church.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

Street.....

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson
Security Storage Company, Inc.

Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage

Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

You Can Send Your Boy or Girl to Any College in This State

At but small sacrifice to yourself through our "COLLEGE PLAN"

If you will begin to prepare while they are young

Ask or write for booklet

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK

Tenth and Main Sts. Richmond, Virginia

"The Bank with the Three Doors of Opportunity"

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor
Richmond, Va.

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS

Largest stock in the South
We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival

The Couper Marble Works
(Established 65 years)
264-268 Bank St., Norfolk,

J. & K. Lamb
23-25-27 SIXTH AVENUE NEW YORK
MEMORIALS IN STAINED GLASS
MOSAIC · MARBLE · STONE · GRANITE
CARVED WOOD · METAL · ETC.

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., JUNE 4, 1921. No. 23.

THE FUTURE PART OF WOMEN IN THE CHURCH.

From the accounts of the many Diocesan Conventions which have been holding their annual meetings in the recent weeks, it is evident that the question of the representation of women in the government of the Church is going to be one of the most living matters for the thought and decision of this present time. Some of the Dioceses have established a House of Churchwomen, which meets concurrently with the Diocesan Council. Some, as for example the great Dioceses of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, have already taken steps which lead directly to the representation of women in the Diocesan Council on equal terms with men. In other Dioceses commissions have been appointed to consider the whole matter, and to report their findings next year for such action as the Dioceses may choose to take.

It is obvious, of course, that the question opens up wide fields of possibility. Once the question of the representation of women in the control of the Church is seriously taken up, it will involve almost all phases of our present organization. It will not be a matter simply of whether women shall serve as trustees on Church school boards, or as minority members on committees having to do with diocesan missions and religious education. It will compel us to ask and to answer whether or not women shall be elected to vestries, whether they shall come to the Diocesan Conventions, whether they shall go to the General Convention of the whole Church. Sooner or later it may even bring into the field of living discussion whether or not women shall go into the ministry.

On these great subjects no one would wish to venture a hasty opinion. We need very patient and faithful study not only of general principles, but, so far as we can foresee them, of practical results.

There is, however, one consideration which we should take into account from the beginning. It ought to form the atmosphere in which the whole matter is considered. And it is this: until the very recent past women have found in the Church their chief sphere of activity. Only in this last generation have women gone out widely into the business world. Only a few months ago were they admitted to their full partnership in civic affairs. It used to be true that the fields most free for the energies of women were in the Church. That has suddenly become no longer true. Agencies are multiplying every day into which women can throw their full and unhampered power for public service. The appeal of these things will certainly act as a subtle competition with the appeal of the Church for the active devotion of her women. With no less instinctive love for spiritual things, women may nevertheless begin to find that they can serve more fully and more efficiently in things outside the Church than in the things which belong to the Church, if the Church still denies them full equality of participation. There is the distinct possibility, therefore, that the Church may lose the energies of her ablest women. She cannot ignore this danger. She must meet it wisely, and in time.

LET THE CHURCH SPEAK WITH POWER.

This is the time for the Church to show the reality of the weapons of the spirit.

On Sunday, June 5, one hundred and twenty thousand ministers are asked to preach to their people on the proposed conference for disarmament between America and certain others of the great nations, and to call upon their people, by the power of their public opinion, to help make this conference come true.

Immeasurable can be the influence of the God-fearing men and women of America at this hour. No Congress and no President can ignore the will of that vast multitude who will be in the churches of America on Sunday if that multitude thinks and speaks together. If the voice of organized religion in this country says that disarmament is something which it is determined to have considered seriously, there will be no trifling with it on the part of the government.

What, then, can we do in this matter?

In the first place, we can write individually to the President, expressing the support of the citizens of the United States of the resolution of the Senate. He is the highest dignitary, and he is also the chiefest servant, of the people. In the long run, the things to which he attaches supreme importance, and the things to the furthering of which he must give his best thought and imagination, are those things concerning which he is made to feel that there is back of them no mere perfunctory recommendation of a legislative body, but the alert and vital desire of tens of thousands of the nations.

In the second place, when that disarmament conference is called, we can follow its proceedings with intelligent attention. We can inform ourselves as to whatever recommendations it makes for joint action on the part of the United States and other nations looking toward disarmament, and we can express to our representatives in Congress our desire that whatever practical suggestions have been made shall be carried out in good faith and to the utmost.

In the third place, we can frame our own opinion concerning a need in the world of some permanent association of the nations so organized as to guarantee the gradual decrease of armaments, and to secure the peace of the world by the mutual conference and united action on those matters which imperil peace. The overturn of the administration which framed the League Covenant as written in the Treaty of Versailles makes it evident that America will not adopt that compact in the form in which it was originally written. But this still leaves the question open as to whether nothing shall be done, or much shall be done under another name to secure the participation of America in the constructive councils of the world, so that she may help shape the destinies of peace and war whose consequences of wreck and ruin, if she does not help shape them, she nevertheless cannot escape. If the sentiment of a great body of people in this nation recognizes the plain fact that in our world, as it is constituted today, no nation can maintain a solitary part, if the great majority are determined that for her own sake, as well as for the sake of humanity, America shall ally her wisdom and her strength with some genuine and continuing organization for world justice and world stability, then no matter what may be the particular name of this administration or of that, the essential end will be achieved. It is a question of the spirit we are of. It is a question of the sort of ideals that we espouse or repudiate. Do we believe, as was said of America in her name not many days ago, that we entered the last war not to save any interests of humanity, but to save our own skins? Are we willing that the nations of Europe, who, out of their dark abyss of blood and agony look to the great young nation of the West for light and for deliverance, shall infer that this cynical selfishness will be the spirit of America always; or do we deny with indignant scorn the outrage of those dishonorable words, and are we determined that now and in the years to come America shall stand for the power of a true ideal, for the hope of a better future for humanity, for the faith which believes that a nation shall find its greatness not in any hard self-seeking, but in its service for the good of humankind?

"IF, DRUNK WITH SIGHT OF POWER."

At this time, when the thought of Christian people is turned toward the hoped-for conference on disarmament and the development of a new spirit of international agreement which this might promote, there comes to us the echo of a voice which once spoke bravely on behalf of the Christian spirit even when men were intolerant with the passions of war. In the biography of Bishop Greer, to which on another occasion already we made reference, there is this passage:

"He probably stood, among the clergy of the Diocese, quite alone as a man of peace before our nation entered the war; and after America was identified with it, he was made to feel quite alone in many a company where bitter words, which seemed to him words of hate, were flung against the Germans. He was horrified at what Germany had done. He did not for one moment minimize the atrocious deeds which had ample evidence; but he believed that Christ's command to forgive enemies was without exception and literal. He feared the consequences of a bitter and unforgiving spirit more than he feared the sorrow and the penury which comes to those afflicted by war. He could not share the rosy dreams of men who prophesied that a hideous war would create a new world. Love, especially that love which is reflected from the perfect love of Christ, was the only constructive force in which he had faith.

"It is too soon by many years to tell how far he was right in his judgment. We, his brethren of the clergy, did not agree with him. We felt that the war had to be fought, and we were convinced that America must take its righteous share not only so far as possible in the sacrifice of men and substance, but also in that more deadly risk, the loss of our own loving souls. All this time we never doubted the Bishop. We recognized the splendor of his isolation. He was not afraid to stand for an ideal which was not only unpopular, but which in some cases led to flagrant abuse. The suspicion came to us time and again, especially when we heard the cheap and easy speeches which kindled applause, that he was seeing more deeply than the rest of us; that he cared nothing for the approval of men if he might scrupulously obey the still small voice. Because of repeated breakdowns and constant weariness of body, he must have known that his course on earth was nearly run; therefore we imagined that he might be seeing the events of earth in a light which was altogether of another world. Though we cannot see how, after certain events had taken place, any other course was open to the Allied nations than that course which they took, we cannot be so cheered by the aftermath of war as to believe that war is anything else than the most apt picture of hell which humanity thus far has been able to imagine."

As Bishop Greer's biographer notes, there may not be many who could agree with the Bishop in his opposition to the entrance of America into the war. That was a matter of judgment as to the choice which on the whole was highest in the midst of tangled possibilities where no absolute ideal was plain. But who is there among thoughtful men who cannot feel the haunting power of Bishop Greer's essential conviction—that the way of Christ's victory is the way of love, and that no nation yet has ever made trial of that to see what its power over hate and wrong might be? Even though in 1914 for the Allies and in 1917 for America, there seemed no choice left save that of war, is there not need that now in the time of peace we should be building another road? Dare we let these years go by without trying to create in our national spirit, and in our dealings with other nations, the faith that justice and conciliation and the will to look not only on our own things, but also on the things of others, can do for us more than armaments could ever do?

Book Notices

David Hummell Greer, A Biography by Charles Lewis Slattery. Longmans, Green & Co. Price $4.

This biography of Bishop Greer will bring to the reader a curious mingling of reward and disappointment, for from it he will receive some inspiring reflections of a noble soul, and also will be set to wondering why there are so many dim spots where the figure of the Bishop seems to be scarce reflected at all.

Because of the posts of importance which he held, and others which he might have held, Bishop Greer was one of the most eminent men of the Church in his generation. He was rector of Grace Church, Providence, rector of the great parish of St. Bartholomew's, in New York, and as Bishop of New York, the leader of the Church at the point where the most tremendous forces of American life converge. He was called also to Trinity Church to succeed Phillips Brooks, and was sought after for other bishoprics before he accepted his election in New York. This story of his life tells of his unusual influence among his fellows of the clergy, his gifts as a counsellor and leader of younger men, his power as a preacher to whose word great congregations came to listen. Back of such a record one would expect to see revealed the figure of a man with great intellect, with the constructive power of new ideas, a thinker and prophet along distinctive lines for his generation. It is possible that Bishop Greer was this to those who knew him man to man, but it must be said that the biography does not make this plain. Perhaps the biographer was handicapped by lack of material. There are practically no letters of an exceptionally revealing kind. There are few or no such extracts from journals or note books as made the biography of Phillips Brooks so marvelously rich in thought and inspiration. Sometimes the biographer himself seems to feel this lack of material by which he can make clear what went on in the development of Dr. Greer's mind and spirit, as, for example, when in the description of the controversy in the Church which led to the formation of the Reformed Episcopal Church, Dr. Slattery says of Dr. Greer: "There is no record that he was thinking of the details which agitated men all about him," and when, a little later, speaking of the far more momentous inner conflict through which Dr. Greer passed concerning his own intellectual difficulties of faith, he says of Dr. Greer's note-books, "Occasionally he jots down his reflections, but the deeper things of life are scarcely even alluded to." Further on in the book the biographer mentions a sermon preached by Bishop Greer in the chapel at the Theological Seminary in Cambridge, of which one of the professors remarked that even Phillips Brooks at his greatest had never preached so great a sermon as that. But the book contains no extract from that sermon, nor indeed any extract from any other sermon of such a character as to make convincing that supreme verdict.

To the general reader there may grow, therefore, the question whether perhaps Bishop Greer's eminence in the Church was due not so much to any extraordinary gifts of mind or imagination as to the very rare and beautiful goodness of the man's soul—a goodness which so wins always the hearts of those who rally round a leader whom they love that they see all the rest of his personality through magnifying eyes.

However that may be, it is certainly true that from this book one will catch the aroma of a rare spirit. Bishop Greer made Christianity winsome. Men loved him and loved the things for which he stood. Ministers, and those who are studying for the ministry, will find in this story of his influence much to gladden them in their own work. For his life was an exemplification of the message of the great Apostle, that above all other things in power are faith and hope and love.

B.

THE INCUBUS OF DISARMAMENT

By the Honorable James A. Frear, Member of Congress from Wisconsin

In the most amazing estimates ever proposed in any country in time of peace the Navy Department last session asked for an appropriation of $680,000,000, following expenditures of $736,000,000 for naval purposes during the fiscal year 1920 and $433,000,000 in 1921. A deficiency appropriation of $53,487,355 increased the total for 1921 to $486,766,929. The bill for 1922 passed by the House last session cut the estimates to $396,000,000. A hundred million dollars were added thereafter by the Senate Committee, bringing the total to $496,000,000, but it never reached a vote there, for it was killed by the courageous action of a handful of men in the Senate. The 1922 bill again has passed the House, and again carries $396,000,000.

This proposed expenditure involves the uninterrupted prosecution of the great building program of 1916, which, as originally planned, was to cost the country $544,700,000. That plan has already involved an expenditure of $538,270,000, we are told, and it will cost almost another half billion to complete. Indeed, with the added yards, docks and other facilities that it makes necessary, it is estimated the total cost will run to $1,500,000,000 apart from all other enormous current expenditures for naval purposes.

Our country has a navy, according to expert authorities, almost equal in effectiveness to that of Great Britain, with no colonies or distant dependencies to maintain or protect. We have a navy twice as powerful and expensive as that of any other country in the world, barring alone Great Britain, our ally in the recent war. Jingoes who want war live in every land. In Japan they declare our country is an international bully looking for war, while American jingoes see red whenever Japan is mentioned. Today mutually they would force two great nations to fly at each other's throats over the possession of an island 5,000 miles distant from our shores and less than three miles ssuare.

Demand for war and for big armaments frequently come from those who profit by wars, who risk no personal injury ,yet when war is over these interests generally demand repeal of any tax upon their wealth or profits and insist that enormous war tax burdens shall be shifted to the backs of the people through a consumption tax.

With feverish haste we are now building warships at a cost to the government of about $40,000,000 for each of the seventeen capital ships under construction, a tax of about $2 for the average family of five for each of those seventeen ships. This is more than twice the cost of the National Capitol Building for a single battleship or cruiser; over two-thirds of all government appropriations in 1920 for education and science combined—spent for a single vessel. If Congress finally appropriates $496,000,000 called for by the bill as passed by the Senate Committee last session, we place on each family in the land a yearly tax burden of nearly $25 for a fighting navy in times of peace.

It has been demonstrated that 92 per cent. of all our annual government expenditures are made for wars past, present and future, counting charges directly occasioned by war, while only 1 per cent. is spent by Congress for educational purposes. What answer can we make to this record of barbarism that rivals the worst pages of history, ancient or modern?

Our country is bending under a public debt of $24,000,000,000 due to the war, while our annual interest charge of over $1,000,000,000 is linked with railroad, army, pensions, war risk and similar expenditures—all legacies of the war—amounting to upward of two or three billions annually. In addition to this stupendous amount, before the naval bill passes the Senate we may be asked to spend nearly another half billion dollars for vessels that in a brief time will be of no more value than so many huge iron kettles. Long before another war is provoked by any other country the ships we are building today will new inventions and new war machines will have superne winventions and new war machines will have superseded those we now build. All this is done in the name of "national war insurance."

The man who recklessly swings a loaded weapon invites trouble. Toting guns is prohibited by law, because possession of superior force provokes use of guns. For forty years the Kaiser perfected his war machine, looking for trouble, which is always to be found when wanted. Seven short years ago Germany, Austria and Russia had the greatest armies in the world. For many years their taxpayers carried military burdens as national insurance against war, so they were told; yet today the territory of those countries has been parceled out among their more peaceful neighbors as one of the results of injudicious war insurance, while England, with her greatest navy in the world, built for insurance in like manner, would have been crushed but for the United States.

An ounce of international confidence and friendship is worth a ton of war material when it comes to insurance against war. In the past it has been considered unpatriotic to question any expenditures urged for the army or navy, but the country is awakening to the fact that the only tangible evidence of war now before us is found in the enormous tax budgets demanded by naval and military authorities everywhere, and in the maimed, crippled and blind soldiers whom four years ago we pledged this country should never be forgotten. Those who advocate demands on the Treasury for enormous army and navy appropriations are helping to maintain the present tax rates that rest heavy on a people struggling amid the industrial and social wreckage left by the last war. Expenditures such as are contained in the naval bill and the army bill before us encourage a policy of rivalry and aggression among the nations of the world. They invite strife and disaster for those who play the war game. Do we desire to lead in such fatal rivalry?

Nearly four years after the armistice Congress will be asked to vote four to five hundred million dollars in a bill for naval purposes for 1922 alone. The world lies devastated and prostrate; England, mistress of the seas for centuries, refuses to continue this mad battleship-building race, yet a powerful propaganda in our country demands more ships and still more ships at $40,000,000 cost per ship, dwarfing the combined naval preparations of England and Germany eight short years ago.

I quote a significant utterance voiced from poor, benighted Mexico. President Obregon, on April 27, announced his disapproval of spending $50,000,000 for the Mexican Navy, and said, "I believe modern countries should demonstrate their moral strength and not attempt to build up a display of brute strength. This money will be spent for instruction and for agricultural purposes." In the highly civilized United States we reverse that order, and at a time when agriculture is struggling to survive the calamity of war we levy a tax of $400,000,000 on industry and labor, including agriculture, "to build up a display of brute strength" which this fighting general condemns for war-worn Mexico.

The Scientific American, page 342, today editorially says:

"We have ascertained through our London correspondent, whom we asked to make a thorough investigation, that no capital ship of any kind is at present building in the United Kingdom either to British or foreign order; nor has the keel of a warship of any description been laid to foreign order since the armistice."

This reputable business journal condemns false stories of Japanese and British war activities and denounces "the altogether misleading propaganda which is being presented in the endeavor to stir up suspicion between great peoples."

"Americanism," "national honor" and "patriotism" are words to inspire, and self-protection is a first principle of life, whether for the individual or nation, yet it must be remembered those in the ranks who fight, suffer or sacrifice in war are those who ever bear the greater part of war's tax burdens, while cries to arouse national pride are not always instigated by unselfish interests or for unselfish purposes. If the voice of the people back home who are paying the enormous tax legacy of the war could be heard, what think you would be their opinion of nearly a half billion dollar naval expenditure three years after war had ended and a scarcely less cost for the army? Would they advise us to throw wide open the Treasury doors in order to lead the race in naval domination on the Atlantic and the Pacific? What would be their judgment?

THE BUILDERS OF THE CITY OF GOD

Part of a Sermon Preached at the Council of the Diocese of Virginia by the Reverend W. Russell Bowie, D. D.

In that assembling of the men of Israel, there on the wall, at Jerusalem when the trumpet blew, do we not find a dramatic and beautiful symbol for the meaning of such a time as this for us? Here, from our separated places, we come together in the Council of the Church. Here for a time we turn from our necessary concentration upon our little task to visualize the largeness of that mighty task to which the whole Church must be devoted. What are they for, those things which we are busy with from month to month? What is the aim and end of all our labor, and in what terms shall we express to ourselves the meaning of the Church?

1. As we try to interpret, then, our own spiritual task today in the light of the story of the building of the Holy City long ago, we recognize, first of all, the authority of the religious motive as a determinant of men's spiritual choices.

Here, in the facts in the story of Israel, we shall see what this means. These men who took upon their shoulders the task of restoring Jerusalem were not driven to that by any outward compulsion. They were not living even within sight of Jerusalem. They were descendants of that former generation who long before had been carried by the Babylonians out of Palestine to the East. The fortunes of their fathers had been swept here and there like broken ships upon those fierce tides of war and overthrow that ebbed and flowed across the kingdoms of their conquerors. They had seen Babylon fall and the baleful star of Assyria and Nineveh set in a sea of blood. They had seen the power of Persia arise, and in Persia, in peace and relative prosperity, they were settled now to enjoy the fruits of a friendly power. They need not have ever gone back to Jerusalem. The weary desert distances stretched between. Men of ordinary conscience needed no further excuse for aloofness from the destinies of the lands which they had never seen and which were for them only an ancient tradition of their fathers. But Nehemiah and the men who followed him deliberately left the safe advantages of Persia. Every prudential motive bade them stay, but a mightier instinct in their hearts compelled them that they go. They felt the authority of religious duty. Because they felt that there was a task which God had for them to do, they must make that task more compelling than any other conceivable inducement of their world.

This involved a double fact. It meant, in the first place, that they recognized the power of conscience when conscience spoke. It meant, in the second place, that they believed in the practicability of the thing which conscience thus bade them do. The Voice of God had told them something they must try, and the rest of their belief followed boldly from this. If they ought to try, then they could succeed. All appearances might be no matter how much against them, if the Voice of God commanded, the power of God would take care of the results. In faith they believed, and in faith they adventured.

It needs no argument to make us know that often the meaning of faith has been pitifully distorted. Men have talked of faith as though it were a mere intellectual thing, a sluggish lack of denial of that which authority and tradition pronounce to be true, unorthodox recitations of formulas of salvation. Men often worship as faith today what is nothing but the dead and sheeted form of what was faith for others, and has become nothing but a relic, wrapped in empty, sanctimonious honors. Faith is forever a vital and changing thing. It is the spirit which dares accept in each new moment of life God's newly communicated commandment as authoritative, and believe that the facts of the world can be shaped according to the living pattern which He reveals. That is what I mean when I say that from the old story we want as our first lesson today to learn the authority of the religious motive. Often even those who have to be the leaders of the Church listen timidly to the voices of their world. They shrink from some particular adventure of faith because they say that business judgment regards it as impracticable. They will not believe in the right of some program of social and economic readjustment to claim our daring loyalty because men who have influence in the congregation may say that such-and-such a thing is "radical," and coolly assume that therefore they have convicted it. Unconsciously, perhaps, to themselves they recognize every day the authority of other motives—the authority of prudence, the authority of an unimaginative selfishness which calls itself conservatism, the authority of complacency which calls itself common sense, the authority of letting-well-enough-alone—and they smother the authority of the Voice of God which forever has had within it the terribleness of a sudden trumpet, the fierceness of a consuming flame.

The danger of the Church in every generation is not the hostility of its world, but the favor of its world. The danger of the Church is that it may become domesticated in a beguiling captivity. Trace the history of religion where we will, and we shall see that this is true. The religion of Israel was corrupted when men succumbed to the threats or yielded to the profitable blandishments of the rulers who had favor in their hands. They fawned upon the selfish wickedness of Ahab. They hid the nation's sins beneath a flaunting patriotism when priests made terms with Solomon and Jeroboam. And the religion of Israel won again its grandeur only when there arose an Elijah, and an Amos, and an Isaiah, to lift the naked authority of the righteousness of God free from its enslavements. The Church of the early disciples went forth with its superb and almost incredible power because it had put aside all authority save the authority of the ideal of Jesus, so that men spoke of them instinctively wherever they went with the unconscious tribute of the crowd in Thessalonica—"They that have turned the world upside down have come thither also." Christianity had within it then the terrific moral dynamite that could break down old empires of evil custom and imprisoning tradition, and dare build instead the battlements of a city of God conceived according to the glory of the seer's dream. But that power was lost, and for long centuries smothered, when the Church made terms with the Roman Empire, and the favor and the flattery of emperors introduced new motives which became more authoritative upon the minds of Christians than the disturbing inner Voice of God. And it is not possible to see in our own generation the conflict between these influences? The Church may be taken possession of for her spiritual vassalage by the very things that come to her in the garb of benefactors. She may think that she is so dependent upon her rich men that she dare not think fearlessly toward any ideal of a juster social thinking that would interfere with the stubborn selfishness of vested wealth. She may become so afraid of disturbing the harmony of her little like-minded group that she will not bring into her preaching the message of

---

Throughout the time of trial one of the sustaining hopes of many people was the thought that this war was a war to end wars; that out of it would come some arrangement which would make for perpetual peace. But we see the same old strife for commercial advantage in the trade of the world; the same effort to acquire zones of influence; the same jealousies of national prestige; all of which breed war. And among individuals we see the same struggle for private gain, forgetting the spirit of helpfulness and self-sacrifice which prevailed during the war.

All of which is simply by way of suggesting that we do not yet see a new heaven and a new earth. Human nature today seems to be about as it was before the war. We are moved by the same hopes and fears, the same ambitions, the same selfishness. If we have experienced any change, we are tempted to say that it is a change for the worse. Our standards are no higher than they were, and certainly we are not living up to them any better.

We have been thinking on the surface. We have thought we might end wars by spoken words and written promises, forgetting the teachings of history which are that when the passions of unregenerated men are aroused, whether in individuals or in nations, the primitive instincts flame forth and all such promises become as scraps of paper. It is becoming increasingly plain that peace and justice and righteousness between men and between nations can be promoted by spoken words and written promises only when those words and promises spring from regenerated hearts. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he."

